whether his doctrines are Divine, or whether he is a mere pretender, "speaking of himself." What then is the preparation required? He wishes to do the will of God. He would gladly worship God aright, and submit to his will in all things. Yet he cannot pray at first with any reference to the intercession of Jesus. For he would think it sinful to do so, as long as he knows not "whether the doctrine be of God, or whether Jesus Christ spake of himself." Yet this man—we have the word of Jesus for it—"shall know of the doctrine." Consider also the free and generous promise of Christ, that "our heavenly Father will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." Suppose yourself to have been in the state of mind of the text just mentioned, and to have heard this gracious promise. Would you have thought of any intercession, of any thing beyond asking? And you would probably have asked; "O my heavenly Father, give me thy Spirit to teach me whether this man is sent by thee, or whether he speaks of himself." Suppose for a moment (God forbid that any one should suppose it in reality!) that, after having offered this prayer sincerely, earnestly, perseveringly, you were at last suffered to perish for lack of knowledge; that the Holy Spirit for which you asked was not given, because you asked it not (and how could you?) in the name of Jesus, the promise would seem to carry with it a want of sincerity, as having a condition attached to it, which was concealed from you, and which the very nature of your petition incapacitated you from performing, until further knowledge was given. I believe, that when Christ said, "Ask, and it shall be given you," he meant what he said, in the literal sense of the word. It is remarkable, that asking in the name of Christ, was a doctrine not revealed to the disciples, till shortly before his death, though they must often have prayed before, and that with acceptance. The Lord's prayer also contains no express reference to this doctrine, though doubtless every Christian in his heart, offers it in the one name, through which he looks for acceptance. Let us take the text above mentioned, to an assembly of Indians. Let us say to them, 'You know not what to think of our doctrine concerning Jesus. You would take him for your Lord and your God, if you were sure that all we say about him is true. We will tell you how to find this out. There is a promise in the book, out of which we preach to you, that God "will give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." The Holy Spirit is given to teach you about Jesus. If you will ask for this teaching, you shall have it; and then you shall know what to think of our doctrine.' They ask. In the name of Jesus they cannot ask. For the very point in question, the very thing which they ask God to teach them is, whether the name of Jesus is of any avail or not. They are impelled to ask by a "belief that there is a God, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Will the promise be made good to them or not? Or will this failing to pray in a manner in which they do not believe (that is, to act contrary to the reason which God himself has lighted up within them) annul the engagement by which God has bound himself, that all that ask should have? Oh! no. This is prayer; and it is praying with precisely that degree of "faith, without which it is impossible to please God." "To every one that hath, thus much shall be given, and he shall have abundance;" he shall be rich in faith. And this is as true to my mind, as clear as any of the promises of God can be. You say, 'Must faith be acting at the time?' I think the degree of faith mentioned in Heb. xi. 6, must. Yet even this, we know, may be a trembling faith, such as, "If thou canst do any thing, Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief." But, "the day of small things," the first prayers of a hitherto unbelieving sinner have something in them unspeakably interesting. And it is so delightful to feel, that the very least of the "small things" comes from God, and implies pardon and heaven, and all those great things which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard," that we cannot dwell upon them without transport. This is that "faith which is as a grain of mustard seed." Wrapped within its minute, dry, and unsightly husk is the embryo of the future tree, which shall expand and "flourish in the courts of our God." Oh! what a God of wonders! As we cannot look into the hearts of others, it is hard to know when the prayer is earnest and sincere. But if we could discern this, we might look at such a prayer with the same confident assurance that showers of blessings would follow it, as Elijah knew that there would be "abundance of rain," though there was nothing to be seen but a little cloud like a man's hand.'

This letter involves a question of much interest and no small difficulty. Miss Graham's sympathy with the case supposed, enabled her to fix a conscious grasp upon the subject, and to speak directly to the point with much force and clearness. The instance of the penitent Ninevites ignorant of the medium of acceptance might have been added to her Scripture illustrations of the argument. And we can scarcely doubt that the cry to a Supreme Being—'Ens entium, miserere mei'—"seeking the Lord, if haply they might feel after him, and find him"—may have proved the first dawn of light and love to some awakened conscience in a benighted world.

No other way to God than by Christ is here supposed, though an unconscious approach through him is admitted. For ourselves, however, who have been made acquainted with his precious name, no obligation is more important, no privilege more delightful, than the constant dependence upon it in every step of access to God. It covers all guilt, defilement, ignorance, and infirmities. It assures our confidence in the presence of a God of inflexible justice and unspotted holiness. Our persons and services, in themselves most unsuited to his awful majesty, are presented through this medium clothed with divine beauty, and commended in his sight as "a sweet-smelling savour." A clear knowledge of the person of Christ is therefore necessary as the basis of Christian confidence. The exercise of this confidence will be—not to apprehend him separately either as God or man, but to make his entire person the object of our trust. This intelligent and spiritual worship is as superior to mere external service, as the blood of the Son of God, by which we are brought into the capacity for it, is to the vile and corruptible things of earth.

The question under consideration however requires a wise mixture of decision and forbearance to determine its precise limits. While insisting upon the importance of a clear apprehension of Divine Truth, we would present the full Scriptural encouragement to souls emerging out of darkness with a simple desire to know the light; seeking the truth, yet knowing not where to find it. Let them wait in the twilight for the dawning day, humbly, prayerfully, earnestly. Sincerity in the diligent and persevering habit of faith will not be left in darkness. On the other hand it must be remembered, that the influence of the Holy Spirit, needful for every act of faith and prayer, stands in ordinary conjunction with revealed truth. Let us be aware therefore, lest by broad statements we lose sight of the great fundamentals of the Gospel, and forget "that there is none other name than Christ under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved," and that "life eternal" consists in the knowledge of him. Let us also carefully connect the general promises of the early dispensation of the Gospel, with the more full and clear light subsequently vouchsafed. The direction to which Miss Graham refers—"Ask, seek, and knock"—must ever be linked with the name of Christ. His name is our only warrant to "ask." Himself is the only way to "seek:" the only door at which we can "knock" with any well-grounded hope of acceptance. In the neglect of this theology, we should attempt to open a way to heaven without "entering in by the door." We should admit the unscriptural supposition of pleasing God "without faith." We should endeavour to maintain our complete acceptance with God without the continued application of "the blood of sprinkling." 'Take heed'—said the excellent Dr. Owen—'lest, while we endeavour to invent new ways to heaven for others, by so doing, we lose the true way ourselves.'

Miss Graham's discussion of the subject, in connexion with the experience of the intelligent Christian, is most satisfactory and edifying.

'I think I now quite understand you about prayer. My reason for speaking of the beginnings only of prayer was, that I thought no confirmed Christian could possibly pray without a reference to the mediation of Christ Jesus. But your observation, that we may pray without immediately referring to it, or even thinking directly of it, is very just, as in the case you mention of ejaculatory prayer. But I would ask you, my dearest friend, is it not an understood matter between us and our heavenly Father, that we are to have all things in the name of Jesus? Would we, if we could, receive even the least of our blessings through any other medium? Is it not the very joy of our hearts to have every thing, and do every thing through Christ; to believe that the Father loves us for his sake; accepts us in him; hears our prayers, not because they are ours, but because he offers them for us? And is this fixed, settled, deep-rooted feeling less, when in ejaculatory prayer there is no immediate reference to his mediation, than in our larger devotions, when we stop to make out our title more fully, and to dwell upon it more largely? It is delightful and profitable to do this; but yet I think the intention of our hearts is the same in both cases. If you were asked after one of these short prayers—'How do you expect or wish it to be heard?' would you not reply—'In the one name of my Beloved?' And would not the heaven of heavens seem less desirable of attainment, if by any possibility we could possess it in our own name, instead of the security of Jesus having entered before us and for us? I hope I am not wrong, and I am sure I would not object to repeating as often as possible to ourselves and to others our entire reliance upon his name. But I think, that when his mediation has become the very life and food of our souls, we need not torment ourselves with the fear, that such or such a prayer will not be answered, because I did not think of making formal mention of the ground on which I asked. Let me rather say—'God knows that I would not, if I might, have it answered in any other way. He knows what I mean and constantly desire; and, if through infirmity I may have expressed myself amiss or deficiently, infinite love will not misunderstand me.' If you think I have taken a wrong view, tell me, my dear friend. But I am confirmed in it by this circumstance. When I am in a truly spiritual state, the mediation of Christ is (as it were) so worked up into my being, that I am often, (except in stated prayers) not conscious of a direct reference to it at one time more than at another. Yet I think my mind never loses the idea. It is perpetually resting upon this sure anchor of hope. But when I am in a cold and careless state, (as at the present time) I lean upon it with an unstable faith. I am therefore much more often conscious of a direct reference to it. The shortest of my prayers have a sort of formality about them, from the cold repeated reference of the name of my Saviour. I do not know whether this is your case. I had rather have the thing so constantly in my heart, that I scarcely stop explicitly to allude to it, than lose the consciousness of it so often, (as I now do) that I am obliged to remind myself of it, in order to plead it with God. But I think that in all sincere ejaculations there is an inward, though perhaps almost unconscious, feeling of repose and delight in his name, through which alone we desire to have acceptance with the Father. I fear I have not expressed my meaning intelligibly. I have sent, as you desired, my thoughts without reserve; though I know too little of the spirit and power of prayer to qualify me to give my sentiments on so important a subject.'

The following letter on Prayer to the Holy Spirit, evinces much thought and spirituality.

'I feel very incompetent to give you any opinion on the point you mention about the Holy Spirit. Yet I have no doubt whatever in my own mind, that it is both right and desirable to pray to him separately and distinctly. I should be very much afraid, that the contrary opinion would gradually tend to undermine our faith in the Personality of the Holy Spirit; unless indeed it is meant by this, that we are to pray to the Tri-une God only, and not either to the Father, the Son, or the Spirit, considered as separate Persons. I have no doubt, as you say, that when we pray to the Father, we do worship this Trinity in Unity; and perhaps this is the most proper way of addressing our usual petitions. But it appears to me, that separate addresses are permitted, if not sanctioned in Scripture. And what I would earnestly contend for, (but that I fear I may be meddling "with things too high for me,") is this—If the Father and the Son may be separately addressed; then, not to allow of a separate address to the Spirit, is to rob him in some measure of his equal glory, and to do away with his Personality. I do not at this moment recollect any direct instances of prayer to the Holy Ghost in the Bible, though I think that there are many, in which he would appear to be the person addressed. But if Prayer comprehend adoration and thanksgiving, we often address him separately in the Liturgy, when we say—'Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost,'—a form of words, in which we imitate the Seraphim before the Throne, who cry—"Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of Hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory." The same separate act of worship is surely implied, when the four beasts, who rest not day and night, adore the Almighty, saying—"Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." Jesus commanded to "baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." Here again a separate act of worship seems to be implied. By baptizing in the name of each Person of the Holy Trinity, distinctly and separately repeated, I cannot but understand, that we separately invoke each of them to perform their covenanted part in the redemption of the baptized person. But I think, that it may at once decide the question, that we are said to be "the temple of the Holy Ghost;" and why he should come and dwell in this temple, except to receive our acts of worship, I do not see. Besides, all his offices invite us to pray to him. He is our Comforter; and this warrants us to ask him for comfort. It is his work to "shed abroad the love of God in our hearts;" to cause us to "abound in hope;" and to "take of Christ's and show to us." But surely "for all these things he will be inquired of by us, to do them for us." I had almost forgotten to mention that beautiful prayer, Numb. vi. 24—26, which I have always considered as a separate invocation of the Persons of the Sacred Trinity. May "the fellowship of the Holy Ghost" be with us; and may he fulfil his sacred office in teaching us what to pray for, and how to pray."

This question has exercised the minds of many sincere Christians. Perhaps an endeavour to present it in its full Scriptural light will not be unacceptable. The exclusive claim of the only true God to the worship of his creatures is one of the first principles of right reason and of religion. Upon this eternal and unchangeable ground our Lord denied to Satan the worship which he demanded of him. We may remark therefore upon the general subject, that the proofs of the Personality and Deity of the Holy Spirit are so decisive (though obviously this is not the place for their production,) that only scrupulosity of mind and judgment could refrain the honour of Divine worship on account of the withholding of a more explicit revelation. The Divine nature—not the distinct Personality—is the proper and necessary ground of worship. Each person therefore in the Sacred Trinity possesses equal and unalienable claims—not as a person but as God—to the trust, love, subjection, invocation, and every form and act of worship from the creatures of God. The Holy Spirit, therefore, 'with the Father and the Son, together is worshipped and glorified.'

As to the detail of the question, the worship of heaven as Miss Graham observes, appears to be given to him. At least he is never mentioned among the universal chorus of worshippers; which (considering his Personality) is some negative testimony on this point. He is represented as "proceeding out of the throne," being not only "before," but "in the midst of the throne;" his "seven eyes" marking his omniscience: his sevenfold influence, his Divine perfections. The thrice-repeated invocation of the heavenly host, while it proves his distinct Personality in the undivided Trinity, evidently includes his worship. "The Lord sitting upon his throne," and worshipped with most solemn and impressive adoration, sent by his own authority, and spake by his own mouth, that commission to the Prophet, which an apostle declares to have been delivered to him by the Holy Ghost.

The worship of the earth commences at the visible entrance into the church of God. The very first act of Christian worship in the administration of baptism is not only, as Miss Graham observes, a separate invocation of the Holy Spirit, but also a dedication of the baptized person to his service. For as the administration of this seal of the covenant in the name of the Holy Ghost is a direct acknowledgment of this Divine Person as conjointly with the Father and the Son, our covenant God; so it necessarily implies also the reciprocal obligations of faith, obedience, and worship. "The communion" or "fellowship of the Spirit" (one of the most enlivening privileges of the Gospel) must also, like the "fellowship with the Father and the Son," be maintained by prayer in the large acceptation of the term. For how else, but in worship, can a creature hold communion with his God. This worship St. John scrupled not to give to the Holy Spirit in supplicating from him, conjointly with the Father and the Son, a large supply of spiritual blessings upon the Church of God.

In Christian experience, the offices of the Holy Spirit—as Miss Graham remarks—when connected with his Divine Personality, naturally imply supplication. In reference to one of these offices, Scripture parallelism, together with the marked distinction of the Sacred Persons, exhibits St. Paul probably on more than one occasion invoking the Holy Spirit as the "God that heareth prayer." Nor indeed can we conceive of his presence in us as his temple, without all the devotional exercises of reverence and praise for his condescending love.

The part which the Holy Spirit maintains in the administration of the church, shows that his claim to immediate worship was fully acknowledged. It was after a day of public and special supplication, that he directed by his own authority the consecration of ministers to his immediate service. To whom then, may we ask, had the prayers of the church been specially addressed, but to Himself, who was manifestly the object, as well as the author of their consecration? And to whom did the worship resulting from this consecration belong, but to Him, who was the direct source and fountain of it! We need again only advert to his acknowledged power in the ordination of the ministers of the church, and to the exercise of his sovereignty in the appointment and restraint of their several spheres of labour, and in the distribution of His gifts, as a clear and scriptural warrant for the direct mode of address to Him employed in the Consecration services of our church.

The Christian investigator of the early Ecclesiastical Records will observe with delight this Divine worship fully pervading the rituals of the Primitive churches.* Our own church, closely following her sacred exemplar, has not confined this adoration of the Holy Spirit to her more exclusive Ministerial services. How often has the introduction of it into her Litany elevated the faith, and refreshed the spirits of her sincere worshippers! The frequent repetition of the doxology in her Liturgical exercises, is in the true spirit of the heavenly worship; and it may be a matter of just surprise, that any one of those who have constantly and joyfully united in this public ascription of praise to the blessed Spirit, should be exercised with scruples as to the Scriptural ground of the private duty and privilege of prayer to the same Divine person.

Miss Graham considered, and with some justice, that many Christians are defective in rendering due and equal honour to the Holy Spirit. Her own views of his personality were remarkably clear. 'I feel'—said she on one occasion—'"the love of the Spirit," as distinct from the manifestation of the love of Christ to my soul. Is this wrong?' Then she added—'I think I can account for the feeling; as I have made it a matter of special prayer, that I might have clearer views of the Holy Spirit.' She was accustomed (as we have already seen) to address Him in direct and probably frequent supplication. The Spiritual life indeed of the Christian is much employed in his reverential service. As "the sin against the Holy Ghost" (whatever that might be) included a wilful rejection of his faith, honour, and worship; so does every sin of "grieving" our Divine Comforter, and "resisting" his holy influence partake, according to its measure, of the same character. The antecedent obligation is therefore, sufficiently obvious. The Being against whom sin is committed, must be the worthy object of religious honour and service. All the exercises therefore of contrition and self-abasement on account of sin, are our humiliating but ready acknowledgments of the claim of the Holy Spirit to our dutiful obedience and worship. A full, distinct, and frequent confession, however, of our equal dependence upon his power and love is a primary obligation, and will result in a large supply of his heavenly grace, strength, and consolation.

Should some of the minor particles of illustration be thought to possess little or no positive weight, they may yet derive force and clearness from their connexion with more decisive grounds of evidence. From the main points, however, and from the whole view of the question, sufficient warrant may be deduced to satisfy perplexed and unsettled inquirers, and to quicken even the most intelligent servant of God to a more habitual acknowledgment of his duty, and enjoyment of his privilege in communion with the Holy Ghost. If a more explicit testimony still be demanded, we must recur to first principles, never more valuable than on these subjects. "It is written." What is written is sufficient. What is withheld is best withheld. Man would be "wise above what is written." Had more been revealed, more would still have been desired; and the appetite for what is beyond human research would have been more excited, not only without practical benefit, but to the great detriment of Scriptural knowledge. Enough is given both in substance and clearness to direct and encourage our supplications to the Divine Spirit for a full supply of his heavenly influence. But in this and every other approach to the doctrine of the Trinity, many questions must arise, and must remain unanswered. All that belongs to the inner sanctuary of the essence of the ever-blessed Tri-une God, is equally above conception and expression. The Scriptures inform us of his nature, but they do not reason about it. A divinely-guarded and sacred veil covers him from our view. And much thought upon this deep subject of Deity—irrespective of, and beyond, the sacred boundaries—either involves us in the labyrinth of metaphysics, or sinks us into the gross, low, and familiar views of an opposite school. Our inquiries into this subject must be conducted with the deepest caution and the most profound humility. All that belongs to God's own revelation of himself, must be received with unfeigned submission and contentment. To seek for "access through Christ by the Spirit unto the Father," is the rubric for Christian worship: and in a strict attention to this Scriptural directory, every act, thought, and desire of prayer will become a means of communion with each of the Sacred Persons in the Divine essence, "without difference or inequality." At the same time, as our minds are drawn to a separate contemplation of them (especially as seeking those blessings which belong to their respective offices in the economy of grace) an immediate address to either of them is fully warranted; always however remembering that, whichever person be the object of worship, the mediation of Christ is the only way of access, the only plea for acceptance.

Adverting now to topics of more general interest, we transcribe from Miss Graham's manuscript, a few remarks upon the subject of Infidelity as a fearful characteristic of the present day. They will be found to possess the usual marks of her sound, reflecting, Christian mind. Speaking of the importance of mathematical study as furnishing armour and discipline suitable to the present crisis, she remarks—

'Intelligent Christians are especially called upon to set themselves in strong array against the gathering forces of infidelity. This last enemy of Christianity is filling up his ranks from all classes of the community. The active diligence of his malignity naturally reminds us of the prediction—"The devil is come down to you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time."'

The deceitful and superficial character of the arguments employed by the great adversary is well exposed. 'They generally consist,' she observes, 'of a confused mass of objections, apparently formidable from their very indistinctness. Like objects seen through a fog, the superficial observer supposes them to be larger than they really are. But let us disentangle the artful confusion of words and ideas. Let us set apart each argument for separate and minute scrutiny. Let us analyze the boasted reasonings of the infidel philosophy. We shall find that they may be classed under two heads—Assertions which are true, but no way to the purpose; and assertions which are to the purpose, but they are not true. These form the materials of every plausible argument against Christianity. By this mixture of untrue and irrelevant matter with that which is true and pertinent, the understandings of the self-conceited and unwary are subverted. Strictly speaking, no assertion can be to the purpose which is not true. But it may be of such apparently pertinent application, as to lead us to examine less closely into its truth. On the other hand, if it be undeniably true, we sometimes forget to inquire (especially when many arguments of this kind are artfully interwoven together) whether it has any connexion with the subject in hand.'

In reference to the efforts necessary to resist this mighty spirit, she justly inculcates the importance of a well-furnished and well-disciplined mind, enabling us to meet the infidel upon his own ground of reason, and to fight him with his own sword.

'Whenever,' she observes, '"the enemy thus comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against him." He, who in his purpose of inscrutable wisdom suffers these "scoffers to come in the last age," will not fail to raise up men in his Church well-fitted to resist them. These champions of the cross must be men "strong in the faith," and "filled with the Holy Ghost." But, judging from the instruments which the Lord has employed in times past for his Church, we are led to expect that they will be learned in all the wisdom of their enemies—in earthly as well as heavenly wisdom. To oppose the subtleties of Arians, an acute and powerful reasoner was raised up in the person of Athanasius. A wise and learned Augustine was provided to quell the dreadful heresy of Pelagius. Luther, Calvin, Melancthon, and almost all the eminent Reformers, were men of profound erudition, and strong powers of argumentation. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise;" and he could, now, and perhaps may, see fit to correct the progress of infidelity by means of "unlearned men." Yet when we look back upon the instruments which he has heretofore raised up, and consider the many advantages of human learning which he has placed within our reach, it seems evidently our duty to use those means to the utmost; at least until the Lord shall give us some clear indication of a more excellent and acceptable way. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings our God ordaineth strength." Let us then seek to obtain the spirit and temper of a little child. But let us never forget, that, while "in malice we are children," it behoves us "in understanding to be men." '

* Hurrion's valuable sermons on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, and Drs. Berriman's and Waterland's Sermons on the Trinitarian Controversy, give a condensed and satisfactory body of evidence on this subject.

She thus happily brings a Scriptural illustration to bear upon her subject.

'David with a sling and a stone fought Goliath and conquered. This time he wanted no other weapon, for God had appointed him no other. But when on a future occasion he was sore pressed by his enemies, he went into the temple of the Lord, and demanded the sword of that same Goliath. "There is none," said he, "like that; give it me." Why should he choose a weapon, which he had seen fall powerless from the hand of the uncircumcised Philistine? Because he knew that in the grasp of the circumcised David it would do goodly service. The hand, not the weapon, had been in fault. Thus may we, if called by the leadings of Providence, avail ourselves of human means, and meet our adversaries hand to hand, with their own weapons. Only let us use David's caution. Let us not take the sword of the Philistine, till it has been consecrated in the temple of the Lord.'

The present face of the times in the judgment of all intelligent observers seems strongly to mark an impending crisis, as if the "Israel" of God "and the Philistines were putting the battle in array, army against army." We know on which side the victory is secured. Yet the conflict will doubtless be severe. Let the servants of God gird themselves for "the good fight of faith," with the whole armour of God. This is no time for slumber or inaction. A religion taken upon trust, "received by tradition from our fathers," provides no resource in the hour of trial. A "faith standing not upon the wisdom of man, but upon the power of God"—will be a defence, a stay, a ground of unfailing hope and consolation.

But on this subject we will give Miss Graham's own words in a letter to her cousin without date. It will be found to be a refreshing specimen of her mode of treating subjects which have lately been found so fruitful in speculation, in a practical and edifying application.

April, 1827.

'Amongst the reflections which I have made upon the Millennium, there are two which occupy my mind very much. I thought of them the whole of one day; one was founded upon this text—"And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end, because it is yet a time appointed." Does not one shudder with horror in anticipating the fulfilment of this prophecy? Who can need purifying more than we do? Who can say that these words are not addressed to us? How dreadful to fall in that time when the Saviour is about to appear! to fall in the very moment when our song of triumph should begin! to fall in the very midst of enemies, of persecutions, of infidelities, in that time when "the devil will have great wrath, because he knoweth that he will have but a short time" to trouble the faithful. But I think that perhaps God has inspired me with this fear, that I may pray against so fatal an event; and this is my reason for communicating it to you. When I was almost overwhelmed with this reflection, these sweet words came to my heart, and made me think of you,—"Two are better than one." Since in this instance the Scriptures and our hearts agree, I beseech you not to separate yourself from me. Let us love each other always, and pray for each other, that we may not fall. But if unhappily one of us should fall, may the other be ready to raise her up again. If I should fall either into the love of the world, or into infidelity, or into any other sin, do not give me up. Do not think I am a hypocrite. Think that it is to "purify and to try me;" and pray, that if you fall, I may act in the same way towards you. But in the midst of the thoughts which these sad ideas gave me, these words came for my encouragement,—"They that are with the Lamb are called, and chosen, and faithful." You know how precious these words have been to me. But I now saw them in a new point of view. They appeared to me a plain promise introduced exactly at that time to console the saints under their difficulties, by assuring them that they will be a little troop, "called, chosen, and faithful," against whom no enemies will be able to prevail: that they will have a degree of faith proportioned to their sufferings and necessities. In short, in describing the character of this elect band, I wish to believe, that it describes what we shall be found, if we arrive at that period. If already we are "called and chosen," shall we not then be "faithful?" Let us plead this promise. It speaks to me like a voice from heaven. It answers every fear, every uncertainty. Would God choose and call soldiers who would be unfaithful to him? Will not our Captain teach us to follow him whenever he will have us to go? When I say to myself, 'Poor and feeble creature, what will you do in that time of distress and temptation? Faith, which cannot resist a single vain thought, how will you resist the united efforts of the world, the devil, and a wicked heart?' Then I answer, 'Yes; but has not God said, that the saints in that day shall be "faithful and chosen" by Himself, who cannot choose amiss? Rest upon his word; if he sees that you are not fit to fight in the battle of that great day, He will not call you to it; and if he call you to it, it is his part to give you the fidelity which will be so necessary.'

Miss Graham's remarks on the subject of Prophecy will be interesting, and furnish occasion for some observations suited to the present time. Having insisted upon the importance of mathematical study in reference to the progress of infidelity, she applies the same train of reasoning to the excitement to the study of Prophecy, which she justly remarks to be one of the prominent characteristics of our day.

'There is yet another subject,' she observes, which, though at present but partially considered, bids fair, ere long, to engross the attention of the Christian world. I allude to the study of prophecy. "Seek ye out of the book of the Lord, and read," is the Divine command; "no one of these shall fail, none shall want her mate." I am particularly led to advert to it in this place, because I have heard with inexpressible pleasure, that these inquiries have already been useful in thinning the ranks of infidelity. The inducements of this study are indeed greater than in any former age of the church. The coincidence between prophecy and its fulfilment is in these latter days grandly conspicuous. It is such, that "he who runs may read." The winding up of the whole seems to be near at hand. The last prophecy must ere long, find "her mate," in the last event of humanity. Prediction is almost swallowed up in accomplishment. Happy are those, who, with reason enlightened by a ray of divine intelligence, can trace the wonderful coincidence, which subsists between what God has foretold, and what he has done; whose thoughts stretch forward in awful, yet fearless anticipation of what God is about to do!

'But to attempt any discussion of the views that are held upon this subject, would be foreign to the purpose of this little treatise. If we would enter fully into the prophetic writings, we must, like Daniel, "set our faces unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplication." My object is to hint to the youthful student, who may probably be hereafter engaged in this most interesting contemplation, the extreme importance of having his imagination under the strictest discipline of reason. If ever the "spirit of a sound mind" was necessary, it is so in the investigation of the future prophecies. A more than mathematical accuracy of definition, of statement, and of argument, should be carried into all that is said or written upon this subject. When I consider the extraordinary spirit of inquiry that is now beginning to spread; when I think I perceive that these inquiries are not only justified by Scripture, but are themselves a part of prophetic fulfilment; and when I joyfully anticipate that "many shall run to and fro" on this subject, "and knowledge shall be" wonderfully "increased;" it is at such times that I most deeply feel the importance of intreating the young Christian diligently to cultivate, in a spirit of prayer and faith, all those parts of education, which especially tend to impart soundness, penetrativeness, and energy to his reasoning powers.'

Whatever may be thought of the somewhat novel connection of prophecy with mathematical study, it would have been well for some of our modern interpreters to have disciplined their minds to the principles of this more severe science. Much crude and dogmatical statement would have been restrained, many painful absurdities would have been excluded, and much perplexity spared to the path of the sincere, but unfurnished inquirer. The prophetic study is indeed, as Miss Graham observes, one of the characteristics of our day. The church is awakened to the full and dutiful acknowledgment of her Lord's command; "Search the Scriptures." Indeed, apart from the authority of this express command, the universal "spirit of prophecy," as "the testimony of Jesus," while it furnishes the true key of interpretation, gives it an imperative claim upon our attention and regard. The succession of events most deeply interesting and solemnly instructive passing before us through the medium of the daily press, also strongly marks our immediate and personal concern in this Scriptural research.

Many Christians are unduly repelled by the difficulties and uncertainty which confessedly belong to the subject. But "the prophets," though they could not understand, felt it their duty and privilege to "search." "We have also the more sure word of prophecy," with the injunction that "we do well that we take heed to it," and with a special and most encouraging promise to stimulate our investigation.

The precise extent of the claim of this study must however be variously estimated. In all cases, indeed, the consideration of fulfilled prophecy is a component of Christian evidence to our own minds, and will furnish the "answer, that we should be ready always to give to every man that asketh us a reason of the hope that is in us, with meekness and fear." The study of unfulfilled prophecy; if it be a general duty, is not in all cases the immediate duty. It must be subordinated to the primary concern of a personal interest in the Gospel. To a mind awakened to serious inquiry on its own state, yet but slightly tinctured with conviction, and imperfectly directed to the Saviour, the presentment of the claims of unfulfilled prophecy for consideration is a most mischievous evil. The soul is diverted from the main object of contemplation and pursuit. A speculative taste is gratified in the place of the practical influence of the truths of the Gospel. This "ignorance of Satan's devices" enables him to get advantage, if not to the ruin of the soul; yet to the "corruption of the mind from the simplicity that is in Christ." And indeed under all circumstances, attention to prophecy must be regulated, in some degree at least, by the leisure, opportunities, and advantages severally belonging to us; not failing to pay due regard to Scriptural proportion, as well as to imperative obligation. That exclusive study, which occupies the place of Christ crucified in doctrine, and forms a substitute for the various exercises of experimental and practical habits; is greatly to be deprecated. Besides the evils with the young inquirer just adverted to, it keeps out of sight many important subject of obligation and interest included in the sacred canon. It has originated many of the schisms now unhappily dividing the Church, by the substitution of "doubtful disputation" for substantial truth, greatly to the hindrance of Christian privilege, devotedness, and consistency.

Admitting, however, the general importance of this study, the temper in which it is to be conducted is a matter of the first moment. The instance of Daniel produced by Miss Graham, exhibits the finest specimen of the Prophetic Interpreter or Student. Such diligence of research in prostration of soul, accompanied with such sanctity, humility, faith, and perseverance, will under the most unfavourable circumstances of external destitution be honoured of God. The exercise of these holy graces will form a safe-guard against the delusive influence of human speculations, and will enable us to improve the results of Divine teaching for the high purposes for which they were vouchsafed. The investigation of prophecy will thus become a cheering support to us in the anticipation of trials, and a quickening stimulus to the discharge of our immediate responsibilities.

The warranted expectation however of human help may probably have been overrated. Though in this, more than in any other age "many have run to and fro"—yet it may be doubted how far Miss Graham's hopes have been realized by an increase of "knowledge" commensurate with the extent of research. The march of Christian intellect has been in most cases retarded by a defect of spiritual or intellectual qualifications. Some of the more elaborate and practised writers want that unction and spirituality, which evidence a mind Divinely-instructed for this "search into the deep things of God;" and this deficiency of the stamp of heavenly influence, materially weakens our confidence in the results from their subsidiary intellectual advantages. Other writers of a more decided evangelical school are too sparingly furnished with those resources of erudition and intelligence, which doubtless were intended to reflect valuable, though subordinate, light upon the prophetic page. Some again of the same school, have taken up crude and indigested views—the result of imagination, impulse, or excitement, rather than of matured judgment and consideration; while the dogmatism and self-sufficiency of others give no proof of Divine suggestion, and offer no satisfaction to the inquiring mind. There is probably no accredited writer in the various prophetic schools, who has not contributed his quantum in clearing up difficulties, and throwing light upon some department of the subject. Yet it may be doubted whether a connected and comprehensive scheme of the Divine system has yet been satisfactorily developed; and in the different schemes that have been proposed, much Christian discernment is required to separate in them what is solidly established, from what is unsubstantial and speculative. Human helps must therefore under all circumstances be subsidiary—not primary. God's book must ever maintain its own supreme place. The scattered rays reflected from different parts of its prophetic system (such as the comparison of the Books of Daniel and John) and centering in one point, will often furnish a strong and clear light for the direction and encouragement of the Christian student. We feel therefore great confidence in recommending a Berean search of the scriptures as the ground-work of prophetic investigation; not omitting to avail ourselves of the industry and intelligence of accredited writers for the expansion of our views, and the elucidation of our difficulties; but at the same time exercising our judgment in dependence upon our heavenly Teacher, again to compare the exposition of their systems with the light of the sacred book. In this process of inquiry we are persuaded, that "the wise shall understand," (even though they be "way-faring fools") as far as is consistent with the Divine will, and necessary for their duty and comfort; and for the rest they may well be content to wait for the full splendour of the light of the heavenly word.

May the writer without presumption be allowed to suggest a few hints relative to the clear interpretation and profitable study of prophecy?

1. Let the special need of Divine influence be primarily considered. Far be it from the writer to underrate the intellectual qualifications. He is well aware of the treasures of erudition, that have been effectively applied to this most important subject. He would have the whole field of prophecy traversed with all the mind and research that can be brought to bear upon it. But he cannot forget that the teaching wisdom belongs to God; and that it is the irradiation of his holy light, which can alone illumine the dark places in this, to us, uncertain track. Let the interpreter duly weigh his special and weighty responsibilities. How large a portion of the grace and "wisdom that is from above," does he need, to induce that waiting spirit so acceptable to God; to restrain the rising of dogmatism, spiritual self-will and conceit; to repress "private interpretations," so inconsistent with the comprehensiveness of scripture prophecy; to guard against giving his own mind in the professed desire only to interpret the mind of God; to take an entire view of the whole range of prophecy, instead of contracting his interest to a few favourite points; to forbear with the decided views of his opponents; readily to retract his indigested opinions, and to yield his prejudices to the influence of more correct and enlarged apprehensions; habitually to connect every view with the glory of his Saviour, and the extension of his kingdom! These are confessedly responsibilities of no ordinary moment. They forbid trifling with the subject, as if its clear light were revealed by some momentary inspiration; they realize the urgent need of "the Spirit of wisdom and revelation," to "enlighten the eyes of the understanding;" and they inculcate a habit of dependence, supplication, seriousness, and that reverence, which Lord Bacon so justly describes as indispensable to the profitable consideration of the subject. In the defect of this spirit, successive systems of prophecy have been ingeniously woven; the interpreters "come together," and bring before the church their several hypotheses and conclusions; and "every one," as at Corinth, "hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation." It cannot be doubted, but this defect of Christian simplicity is one main cause of the indeterminate apprehension of the subject. Who does not see how needful is "singleness of eye," the gift of God, to reflect light upon the mind; while an "evil eye," affected with some natural bias, leads us in the review of the results of human ingenuity to exclaim, "How great is this darkness!"

2. Let a forbearing spirit be inculcated in this research. The importance of this spirit in an intellectual view is sufficiently obvious, as a guard from the prevalent evils of self-conceit. Its influence in every department of sacred truth; especially in the field of prophecy; is of yet higher moment. The writer's own studies in this field have brought him to the fixed conclusion; that many of the controverted points (those, for example, connected with our Lord's second Advent,) are embarrassed with difficulties on both sides, sufficient to preserve wise and humble men from dogmatizing on either part; and to excite mutual respect and forbearance, rather than what we are too often constrained to see—"brethren grudging one against another." The event indeed is a doctrine of faith, absolutely certain. The time and circumstantials being imperfectly revealed, are matters of forbearance; on which all, even the most sober, interpreters have been constrained in the course of investigation, in some points of more or less moment, to retract, modify, or restate their views. Indeed, prophecy, according to the Scriptural definition, is "a light that shineth in a dark place," yet not surely the light of "perfect day;" and well would it be for us, if the confession of our ignorance would find vent in the Apostle's adoring contemplation; "How unsearchable are his judgments! and his ways past finding out!" We may indeed justly expect clearer light to dawn upon us, as the consummation of the grand events draws on. Meanwhile we must combine diligent study with cautious application. We must be content for the most part with the statement of general views and results. If the events are clear, the time, mode, and means of their accomplishment are often undefined. We are assured, that none of the Divine predictions can fall to the ground; that the events contemplated in them are the fruit of the Lord's superintending love to his church, and that they will all issue in the final advancement of his own glory. In this recollection it is most suitable to cultivate that truly Christian spirit of patient expectancy which in child-like humility, not in slumbering indolence, is content to leave to the Lord the unfolding of his own purposes.

The writer may be permitted to observe, that a less determinate fixing of dates of the several prophetic eras offers large room for the exercise of this forbearing spirit. Prophets with all their warranted confidence were modest. They never spoke without a clear commission: "Thus saith the Lord." Interpreters of prophecy are not always so modest. The confident mode of calculation which is sometimes adopted, might lead us to suppose not only that the several periods, but also that their commencing points, were, like Daniel's weeks, absolutely revealed. To a few of the most important eras, dates more or less probable, but not absolutely decisive, may be assigned; and in periods of less moment, experience has fully shown, how unsatisfactory all attempts to fix the precise periods of events have proved and are likely to prove. Our Lord, while he reproved listless indifference to "the signs of the times," rebuked with no less decision this presumptuous interference with his Sovereign prerogative. 'If ever,' as Miss Graham admirably observes, '"the spirit of a sound mind" is necessary, it is so in the investigation of the future prophecies.' Wise and holy men of God will learn to speak with caution and reserve upon subjects obscurely revealed. General views are sufficient for the ground and encouragement of faith. And the cloud that still covers this mystic history of futurity, abundantly shows, that the end of prophecy was not to make us prophets; but to "set us upon our watch-tower," as diligent and humble inquirers, seeking to "have understanding of the signs of the times, that we might know what Israel ought to do," and to expect.

Indeed this designed darkness subserves various and important uses. It furnishes a needful and wholesome check upon human speculation. Had the Great Author of prophecy intended it as the rule of life, he would doubtless have written it with a sun-beam. In its present mode and character of revelation it is however admirably suited; not indeed to indulge unwarrantable curiosity, but to exercise our faith, to call forth our Christian graces, to enliven our hopes, to quicken our anticipation of the ultimate triumph of the kingdom of Christ; and meanwhile that we should mark with soberness the gradual development of progress towards this glorious consummation. It is far more profitable; instead of making a framework for ourselves; to be looking in the Lord's best time for that clear reflection of light in the fulfilment of prophecy, which will awe even the most inconsiderate to conviction. "This is the finger of God. What hath God wrought?"

3. Let the subject be ever considered as a practical study. It is a sign of an unhealthy excited temperament, if the prophetic parts of scripture be more interesting than the preceptive, that is, if we are more conversant with matters of uncertain interpretation, than with the subjects that relate to our immediate duty. If the prophetic study be dissociated from its practical character and consequences, our prepossessed fancy is far more likely to give the interpretation than the Divine Spirit. The blessing belongs to those that "keep the things that are written in the words of this prophecy." The fruit of Daniel's research was that which is most specially needed at the present eventful moment: intercession for the church and for the land; Habakkuk went to his watch-tower, not to speculate in idle curiosity, but, as we have before hinted, to be in readiness to hear the valuable lessons of reproof and instruction that were designed for him. Supposing that the period of accomplishment is far distant, yet there is a large preparatory work of prayer, exertion, and Christian devotedness, urgently pressing upon us. And far better shall we be employed in girding ourselves to the discharge of the practical obligations of prophecy, than in minutely tracing out the conjectured period and mode of its fulfilment, and in attempting to narrow its wide and comprehensive sphere by uncertain application to the little particularities of our own time and place. Is there no danger while fixing the dates and describing the circumstantials of the grand coming events, lest we forget that every page of prophecy is a direct personal revelation to our own souls, and lest we too slightly regard those clearest predictions of the sacred page; the promises of God to his people, and his threatenings to the unbelieving world?

How much has been lost to the church by a speculative contemplation of the prophetic view of the doctrine of our Lord's second advent! If, instead of filling up (from the resources of imagination more than from the substance of Scripture) the outlines, the faith of the church had been singly fixed upon the glory of this consummating event, and intensely exercised in the glow of expectancy, how different would have been her aspect at the present moment! What a bond of union would have subsisted among her members! What an atmosphere of love would have pervaded her territory! What a spring of holy consecration would have been in extended activity! It ill becomes servants, looking for the return of their absent lord, to spend themselves in discussing the mode and circumstantials of his coming, when they might be far more suitably employed in preparing the house for his reception, and in readiness to give an immediate answer to his welcome knock.

The obscurity that hangs over the precise period of our Lord's coming is indeed a most wise and gracious dispensation to invigorate the church in every age with the high privilege and obligation of looking for this triumphant crisis. Whatever views therefore tend to divert the attention from the present duties connected with this anticipation, are the unscriptural delusions of man's conceit. This spirit of constant expectancy may be considered as the perfecting feature of the Christian character. It concentrates all the practical and animating exercises of the Gospel. What an encouragement does it supply to the assurance of faith! What a stimulus to activity, devotedness, abounding love, heavenly conversation, sobriety of spirit, readiness of habit, and watchful preparation for eternity! What support does it furnish in the hour of trial, whether from the immediate visitations of God, or the persecuting enmity of man! What materials does it give for personal edification, compassionate labours for the unconverted, and mutual exhortation and comfort in the church of God! How cheering is the prospect which it holds out of complete transformation into the image of our beloved Lord! What patient hope and joyful anticipation does it bring into the waiting soul! So eminently practical—so richly consolatory—is the believing and habitual contemplation of the coming of our Lord! Indeed when we realize the hope of body and soul at this blissful era being equal participants of the eternal redemption—the happiness of every member of the body consummated in the complete glorification of the whole body—and the church, "filled with all the fulness of God," presenting to the universe the entire "fulness of Him, that filleth all in all"—we may well conceive, that never was an event so joyful known on earth since the fall of man. We wonder not that "the whole creation," now "groaning and travailing together in pain" under the ruins of sin—should then be awakened to joyful exultation in its "deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

This scriptural privilege of expectancy was however inculcated upon the church, while the event which it contemplated could only be seen through the long vista of some thousand years. It does not therefore necessarily imply the approach of the grand crisis. Yet the view which has just been given of it, includes all the essential principles of sanctification and of happiness. We cannot therefore but see sufficient reason for the large space which it occupies in the enforcement of Christian obligation, and the prospects of Christian hope. Our Divine Saviour is brought eternally near to his people. His perfect likeness is the immediate consequence of his vision. His glory is their everlasting joy.

It is painful to reflect, that a speculative study of prophecy should have so materially injured the influence of those prospects of the church upon her present duties and privileges. The minute descriptive details, that have been sometimes connected with the coming of Christ in his kingdom (not to speak of their doubtful scriptural authority, and their closer alliance to earth than to heaven) have a strong tendency to repress a spiritual contemplation of this great event. Even the details given in the prophetic books are much under the veil. Interpreters expound them according to the principles of their different systems; and after all their diligence and labour, much is left unexplained, or resting upon conjectural support. In these things the writer is content to "walk by faith, not by sight." All that is necessary is revealed. We shall be as happy as God can make us. As to any precise knowledge "it doth not yet appear what we shall be." And such knowledge we want not. It exhibits a far more enlarged expectancy to be assured, that it will be something that we neither know nor can know—interminable bliss without sin, and with Christ. Our happiness centres in the certainty and glory, not in the circumstantials, of the event. And surely the "shaking of earth and heaven," which seems to be at hand, will quicken the cry for our expected Lord—'Come quickly. Take to thyself the kingdom, and reign with all thy saints.' The waiting Christian, in these times of special trial of the church, "lifts up his head full of joy and expectation. Faith overcomes the tremendous thought of wrath and judgment, as the harbingers of his coming; and still the cry is re-echoed to the solemn declaration,—"Surely I come quickly: Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

3. On Christian Experience and Practical Religion.

Miss Graham's correspondence, flowing in an easy and natural strain, will be generally interesting. Even where no striking features are visible, an affectionate earnestness, tender sympathy, and a direct application of the first principles of the Gospel to the several cases of her friends cannot fail of being observed.

The following letter appears to have been written to a friend, newly awakened to concern for her eternal interests.

Nov. 1826.

'I fancy that you have for some time past felt a conviction that religion is something more than you used to think it, more than the world in general seem to think it. But yet, perhaps, you do not see very clearly, what more it is that religion requires of you. You see, that there is nothing in this vain world capable of satisfying the desires of your immortal spirit; but you do not clearly comprehend what there is in religion to satisfy all our desires. You seek the Lord; but you do not yet feel as if you had found Him. You probably spend much time in reading the scriptures; but sometimes they seem obscure and unintelligible, sometimes dry and uninteresting. You often pray; but do not always find either comfort or sweetness in prayer. Sometimes you feel as if you could give up every earthly enjoyment for one glimpse of that "love of Christ which passeth knowledge;" and at other times it seems to you very foolish and unreasonable to pretend to more religion than other people. This is what many feel, who are beginning to be very anxious about religion. I cannot help indulging a strong hope, that you will soon find in the love of Jesus all that you want to make you happy; only let me beg of you to seek him simply, under the conviction that we can neither do nor think any thing good without Him; that "every thought is evil, only evil, and that continually;" and that, while we continue in this state, we cannot understand the things of the Spirit of God, because they will appear "foolishness to us." The change which every person must undergo, before they can truly receive Christ as their Saviour, is described in terms no less striking—"Ye must be born again." "If any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature; old things are passed away; behold! all things are become new!" In other parts it is described as a change from death unto life, "from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God." But I will not multiply instances. Surely such a change as this cannot be the cold, worldly, heartless religion, with which the generality of people sit down satisfied! Surely it is a change we have no power to make in ourselves. When God "breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life," it was a wonderful act of his creating power. But when he breathes spiritual life into the soul of one "dead in tresspasses and sins," this seems more wonderful; and yet this is what we vainly think we can do ourselves. But if we can be once convinced, that we are so utterly worthless and sinful, that none but Christ can save us, then we shall go to Him for every thing. If we want repentance, wisdom, holiness, salvation, all these are His to give; He promises to give them to every one that asks Him. O be much in prayer to this precious Saviour! He has declared, that none shall seek Him in vain. Those who leave off trusting in themselves, and cling with a single and undivided heart to the cross of Christ, and "count every thing else but loss, so they may win Christ and be found in Him"—what words can describe their blessedness! How true it is, that those who seek happiness in any thing except Christ Jesus, are "hewing out to themselves broken cisterns that can hold no water!" Come then, my most dearly loved friend, come with me to "the fountain of living waters"—come to Him who has said—"If any man thirst, let him come to me, and drink"—as if he had said—'If there be any poor sinner, who has begun to find out that the pleasures of this world cannot quench his thirst after happiness, if he long for something less vain and empty and unsatisfying, let him come unto me.' Do you desire to give yourself to Christ, to make him your all in all? Then let not any fears or misgivings keep you away from him, for he "waits to be gracious" to you. Your sins need not keep you away; for he came to call sinners. He calls Himself the friend of sinners; and indeed, till you are taught by His Spirit, how exceedingly sinful you are, you cannot prize Him as you ought. Let me intreat you often to dwell on the "precious promises" of Scripture. Remember, that "in Him all the promises are yea and amen;" and if we plead in His name for the fulfilment, the truth and faithfulness of God (who cannot lie) stand engaged to perform them for us. There is one in particular which seems to me full of encouragement; it describes so fully the state of heart we want, and promises to give what it describes to those who inquire of the Lord. See Ezek. xxxvi. 25—37.'

The next letter is of a later date, and implies a more distinct advance of Christian knowledge in her friend.

'Let me use the privilege of friendship, and entreat you to look less at the dark side of your prospects, and more at the unspeakable mercies with which God has favoured you; particularly that he has given you the greatest blessing he has to give, in calling you to become his reconciled child by faith in Christ Jesus. And having given you an interest in his Son, "shall he not with him freely give you all things?"—all things that are good for you, my dear friend. If therefore your wishes are not satisfied, it must be because it is not for your good to satisfy them. Your lot has been chosen out for you by one, who is infinitely wise and kind, as the very best for your present and eternal happiness, and "He doeth all things well." You will ultimately find peace in religion; I am sure you will; and in the mean time is it not a blessing, that you are not permitted to take up your rest here, and find the false destroying peace, which so many experience in worldly enjoyments? What if you were to ask God in Christ's name for the fulfilment of such a promise as this—"Behold I will bring in health and cure, and I will heal him, and will reveal unto him the abundance of peace and of truth" would he deny you? Considering that no promise of Scripture "is of private interpretation"—not meant for one part of the church, or one age of it, but for the whole flock of Christ now, and every member of it, and therefore for you—considering too, "that all the promises of God are yea and amen to us in Christ Jesus;" and that Christ himself has said—"If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will give it you"—what encouragement have we to take these promises to God in prayer, to wrestle with him, and declare with holy confidence—"I will not let thee go, except thou bless me!" Oh! he would bless you; and his "blessing maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it." My dear friend, you must come to God thus, and "give him no rest," till he grant you the promised blessing. You must not take a denial. May the Spirit of prayer be abundantly poured out upon you! It is our privilege to take our sins and sorrows, and cast them upon Christ: he has already borne their agonizing weight; why should we groan under them? "Cast thy burden upon the Lord." Would that I could act as I advise! But I fall very, very far short. Even my desires after this state of mind are miserably faint and cold; but let us both take comfort in the reflection, that we are accepted in Christ; "complete in him;" beloved, not for our deserving, but for his; and his are "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." When we fail, Christ remains the same; and it is for the sake of what he has done, that God will accept us; not for any thing we can do; or we might indeed go mourning all the day long.'

These letters mark the general tone of Miss Graham's correspondence in affectionate counsel and scriptural encouragement. The case to which they primarily refer is among the most difficult and delicate within the compass of Christian instruction. No service is more valuable to the sincere but unintelligent inquirer than to enter into his case with tenderness, forbearance, and anxious consideration of his difficulties. Vague and ill-defined directions throw little light upon his path. Even the primary and immediate counsel, guiding him to the Saviour of sinners, needs a present and particular application to his individual state. His difficulties will indeed vary according to his simplicity, sincerity, and earnestness.

But under all circumstances, the instant duty of believing in Christ must be inculcated. No deficiency of spiritual apprehensions must be allowed to hinder immediate attention to "this work of God."* The Gospel was not intended to answer the question—"What shall I do, that I may inherit eternal life?" But it affords a satisfactory reply to a question more nearly interesting to the condition of a sinner—"How can man be just with God!" It opens by the instrumentality of faith a free, immediate, universally accessible way to favourable acceptance with our offended God. No perplexing course of preparatory discipline is required. All are invited without limitation, without delay. Infinite mercy and grace are provided for infinite need. Only those that feel will ask; and all that ask shall have. Thus a sense of sin is the prerequisite, without which no man will come (for "the whole need not the physician;") but it is no part of the warrant to come. The Scripture has no where prescribed any uniform rule, or measured out the precise extent of necessary conviction. All constitutions are not formed alike; and therefore pungency is no certain proof of sincerity. Many are brought without a process of painful exercise to a simple and clear reception of the truth.

The soul is as welcome to Christ at the first moment of invitation as at any successive period; and protracted conflict manifests only the stubborn power of unbelief; a sin, which the Spirit of God will not fail to apply as matter of humiliating conviction. To insist therefore upon a determined measure or intensity of well-defined conviction as a preparation of faith, is an infringement upon the freeness and simplicity of the Gospel. The law also, as the instrument to produce this conviction, must be used in immediate connection with Christ. He is the life; and if he be not set forth at the commencement, there will be only the temporary and unsatisfactory change from a state of indifference to a state of bondage, without any effective principle of holiness or of privilege, and the man will be satisfied without that entire simplicity of faith and self-dedication so indispensable to salvation. Even in the exhibition of Christ, the mind of the inquirer must be diverted from a too minute and anxious analysis of its own exercises of faith to a fixed contemplation of the glorious Person presented to view. The emphasis of the invitation is, "Look—Come unto me." The first sensation of rest will be connected not with a precise knowledge of our own feelings, but with an entire dependence upon the work of Christ. Though self-examination is intimately connected with the prosperity and advance of the Christain life; yet it must never be employed to originate our peace and hope in the Gospel; but to ascertain the reality of our hope; to detect false confidence and backsliding; to bring to us the warranted enjoyment of "the testimony of our consciences," in regard to the consistency of our profession; and to mark our progress in knowledge, experience, and practical devotedness. One further point, connected with the case of the inquirer is of indispensable moment. He may be assured that there is no indefinitely future period; no "day of the Lord's power" more favourable for his acceptance than the present; and that no deficiency of knowledge can acquit him of the obligation of an instant surrender of himself to God. This very moment the Lord demands his unreserved faith, and his whole heart; and every delay brings a fresh charge of guilt, widens the distance, and increases the difficulty.

* John vi. 28, 29. This instant duty of believing is however questioned by some of our modern religionists—either as seeming to imply a natural power to believe, or as inconsistent with the manifest inability to believe without a divine principle. But our Lord inculcated the duty upon the unbelieving multitude in this passage in answer to their professed inquiry upon the subject of duty. He subsequently enforced it upon the same class of hearers (John xii. 36, with 37, 40.) Besides—as sin is the neglect or resistance of obligation, if faith be not the duty of the unconverted, unbelief is not their sin—consequently—not what the Gospel repeatedly declares it to be—the primary ground of their condemnation (John iii. 18, 19, xii. 48. xvi. 8, 9. 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11.) This system of measuring duty by ability, and of admitting inability to cancel obligation, equally annuls every bond of love and obedience, by which man is connected with his God, but for which he is no less incapacitated than for the spiritual exercise of faith. It argues also a forgetfulness of the justice of the divine requirements, and of the responsibility of that sinful inclination, which constitutes the principle of his impotency to comply with them. The commission of the Gospel is an universal call both to repentance and faith (Mark i. 15. xvi. 15, 16. Acts xvii. 30.) The cross of Christ is held up to the whole world. (Isaiah xlv. 22.) The Holy Spirit employs its awakening and attractive influence as the means of quickening sinners to life. (John xii. 32.) Thus the grace of God is glorified, while the unbelief of man excludes him from the free justification of the Gospel, and consequently leaves him without excuse.

The following letter, written about two months before her death, gives an interesting view of her own search after truth, and marks a discriminating apprehension of the Gospel.

Stoke Fleming, Oct. 1830.

'I am grieved that you should for a moment imagine that I think our dear ——— must be lost, because she does not subscribe to the doctrines of Calvin. I do not myself so much as know what all Calvin's doctrines are, or whether I should subscribe to them myself. I have read one book of Calvin's, many parts of which pleased me much, I mean his Institutes, which Bishop Horsley says ought to be in every clergyman's library. Further than this I know nothing of Calvin, or his opinions. I certainly did not form one single opinion from his book, for I had formed all my opinions long before from the Bible. You may remember my telling you that some years ago I declined greatly, almost entirely (inwardly) from the ways of God, and in my breast was an infidel, a disbeliever in the truths of the Bible. When the Lord brought me out of that dreadful state, and established my faith in his word, I determined to take that word alone for my guide. I read nothing else for between three and four months, and the Lord helped me to pray over every word that I read. At that time, and from that reading, all my religious opinions were formed, and I have not changed one of them since. I knew nothing then of Calvin. I have said so much, dear ———, because I think it a very wicked thing to do, as you seem to think I do, to call Calvin or any man "master on earth," or to make any human writer our guide in spiritual things. Christ only should be our master, and his word our guide, and his Spirit our teacher; and that Holy Spirit will be given to us if we ask for it. But I suppose by the doctrines of Calvin you meant the doctrine of predestination, which Calvin, in common with many other of God's saints, believed and preached. My belief and settled opinion about predestination, you will find expressed more clearly than any words of mine can do in John vi. 37, 39, 65. Rom. viii. 28—30. Rom. ix. Eph. i. 3—6, 11. 2 Thess. ii. 13, 14. 2 Tim. i. 9, 10. Titus i. 1, 2. 1 Peter i. 2—5. 1 John iv. 19. Rev. xvii. 8. John xv. 16. I also join in every word of the 17th Article of our church; so much so, that if asked my opinion about predestination, I should give it in those very words, from the impossibility of finding any others, which in so short a space expressed my meaning so well. But this article is only of human authority, therefore I should bring forward the proof from the Scriptures of that God who cannot lie. I have just given you a few texts as they struck me. They are, I believe, enough for my present purpose: but detached texts lose much of their power: it is the whole sense of the whole Bible that should determine us; and since "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, (for they are foolishness to him)," let us pray to become spiritual, "that we may know the things that are freely given us of God." The above texts will give you an idea of my opinion. Indeed some of them are exceedingly plain, and strong, and full, in their account of the doctrine. I endeavour to receive them as a little child, in their plain literal meaning.

'But to return to our dear ——; I think the doctrine of election essential to the comfort and consistency of our walk with God: because I deem it essential to receive the whole Bible, and every truth contained in every part of the Bible without partiality or gainsaying. But I do not consider a belief in the doctrine essentially necessary to salvation. I do consider a simple trust in the atonement and righteousness of Jesus Christ as absolutely necessary to salvation. If then, dearest ——, your beloved friend and mine too, (for I do most sincerely love her) possesses this simple reliance on the death and obedience of Christ for salvation, doubt not that she will be saved; though she may not yet have been able to receive those high and humbling doctrines which very few Christians do receive in the commencement of their course, and which some cannot to the very end thoroughly embrace. Many, however, I think embrace the actual doctrine, though they cannot bear the words predestination, election, &c. A strange dislike, since both words happen to be taken from scripture. My beloved —— would have been quite distressed, had I supported the doctrine of predestination in my conversations with her under the name of predestination; and yet we often conversed on the thing itself and subjects connected with it; nor did I find her ideas differ greatly from mine. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, Jesus Christ." All who are built on this foundation, who are thus founded on the Rock of Ages, must be secure. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." Acts xvi. 31, &c.

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii. 36. See also John iii. 15, 16, 18. v. 24. vi. 40,-47. xi. 25, 26, &c.'

The two next letters are of the class of those which were formerly adduced in illustration of her clear apprehensions of Scriptural truth. The first letter introduces some incidental notices of interest. It seems to have been written to the correspondent, whom she had formerly addressed on the subject of Christian study.

Stoke Fleming, Jan. 4, 1827.

'My own dear Friend,

'Every letter I receive from you gives me fresh cause for thankfulness, and increases my hope, that you have learnt of Him who teacheth, and will certainly never leave you till he has given you that "joy and peace in believing," which all His children sooner or later experience. I trust that the love of my God to you will be a constant source of thanksgiving and self-abasement to me; for Oh! what thanks can I render to Him, for the love with which He is now calling you out of the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of His dear Son? And how can I ever be sufficiently humbled, when I reflect how unfaithfully and inconsistently I have acted towards you? One instance in particular is now fresh in my memory. You once asked me to write to you; and I put it off from day to day, till at last, I wickedly persuaded myself that I could not do it at all. I hope you will forgive this cruel neglect, "as God for Christ's sake has forgiven me;" and that we shall be enabled henceforth, to love and help one another in His strength, and for his sake.

'Dear ——, how can you say that I am your dearest friend, and only comforter? I glory in the thought, that you have a Friend, whose love is stronger than death, and a Comforter, who is able to make you rejoice with joy unspeakable; and to whose blessing and influence we must refer it, that such poor, helpless, and sinful creatures as we are, can ever be of the slightest use in helping or comforting each other. I know you long to call Jesus your friend, and the Holy Spirit your Comforter; and where does this longing come from? Not surely from your own evil heart; for from that corrupt source can proceed nothing but hatred or indifference to God and His ways. Besides, it is a feeling you once knew nothing of. Believe me—rather believe the Scriptures when they say—that every desire of the soul after God, is inspired by Himself, and is the fruit of His own free love in Christ Jesus—"I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with loving kindness have I drawn thee." "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you." "No man can come to me, except the Father which hath sent me draw him." "All that the Father giveth me shall come to me; and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." Now, do you not feel yourself drawn towards God? Does not your heart sometimes choose Christ in preference to every earthly blessing? Do you not come to Christ in prayer, beseeching Him to receive you? And do not the texts I have mentioned, with a thousand others of the same import, warrant the inference—that you "come" to Christ, because "the Father has given you to Christ," and draws you to Him; that He "draws you with loving kindness, because he has loved you with an everlasting love;" and finally, that He will "never cast you out?" My dear friend, I would not, indeed I would not, flatter you with a false hope. I know of nothing so melancholy as the way in which the world say—"Peace, peace, to themselves, when there is no peace"—no rational ground of hope. But the hope of a soul convinced of sin, renouncing all trust in its own righteousness, and casting itself on the mercy of Jesus, cannot be a vain or presumptuous hope; because it is founded on the word of God. You say, you feel so wicked and so worthless, that you dare not hope. Now till you felt yourself to be both exceedingly wicked and worthless, you could not be a fit object of Christ's grace, who says—"They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." I know that many, when they first come to a sense of their own sinfulness, think something in this way: 'Christ will never receive so vile a sinner as I am; I must repent, and pray and try to make myself a little better; and then perhaps I may deserve his favour.' Alas! they know not that repentance and prayer are his free gifts, and instead of praying for the pardon we receive, are themselves a part of it. Would it not have been as reasonable for the leper to have waited, till he could cleanse himself from his leprosy; the blind man, until his sight was improved: or the sick of the palsy, till he could take up his bed and walk, before they would come to Jesus to be healed? The first chapter of Romans, from the 18th to the 32d verse gives an awful description of the state of every man's heart by nature; and though education and the restraints of civilized society have prevented the breaking out of sin in the dreadful and open way in which it was indulged among the heathen, still I think every person awakened to a sense of sin, will perceive in it, as in a glass, their own image; at least they will acknowledge, that the seed of every sin is in their heart, especially that most unnatural and truly diabolical sin, of "worshipping and serving the creature more than the Creator." And lest we should imagine that living in a country where God is known, and joining in acts of outward religion can make the heart really better, till it is converted to God; the Apostle goes on, in the second and third chapters, to prove that the Jew is no better than the Gentile; that "there is no difference; every mouth must be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God." And it is immediately after having given us such an awful view of our state, in the sight of God, that he goes on to hold out free and unconditional salvation, to all who simply trust in the death and righteousness of Christ. But I doubt not, you will soon perceive to your comfort, how very free the offers of grace in the gospel are. I cannot forbear mentioning one more instance; it is in the parable of the two debtors in the seventh of Luke—"And when they had nothing to pay, he frankly forgave them all." It is when we are brought to this feeling, that we "have nothing to pay," that our hearts are in a fit state to receive with eagerness and delight the "frank forgiveness" of our Saviour; then we give Him all the glory of it. Surely you and I feel ourselves to be in the situation of the debtor who owed most. We have nothing to pay; and sometimes I think I can even rejoice in this extremity of poverty; since it hides pride and boasting from me, and makes the mercy of God appear so divinely infinite. I do not know, that you have any reason for fancying that you shall die young; but though the thoughts of death are useful to all, and delightful to those whose sins are forgiven for Jesus' sake; I think we ought rather to be willing to live as long as our heavenly Father pleases, in hopes of being the means of bringing others to him.

'I am glad you like your pupils so much. I feel incompetent to give you any advice about them: I believe the great thing is to pray much for them, that they may have that grace, which alone can make the Sabbath a delight. We should also pray with them, and let them see that we are very anxious about their salvation, and that, though we attach much importance to their progress in other things, we look upon them all as nothing in comparison with the knowledge of Christ. Children sometimes take much pleasure in answering a few simple questions on a chapter they have read; and in this way very little children may be made to comprehend a great deal. Many of the parables, types, and emblems in Scripture are particularly adapted to their capacities, and afford them great delight. I have seen a little child, who would have been tired to death with a serious discourse, listen for a long time with unwearied attention, whilst being told in its own childish language, how Christ compared himself to a vine, and his people to living branches; or how Christ as the good Shepherd, "gathers the lambs with His arms, and carries them in His bosom." While explaining these things, they should be taught the text or texts referred to; that so a portion of God's own word may be fixed on their hearts. I think, however, there is nothing more important than to stop as soon as the attention of our little hearers seem to tire. Sometimes the eldest may be set to teach the youngest some verse or hymn. Scripture prints also form a very good resource for Sunday employment. Children are so artless, that we can soon perceive what pleases them most; and whatever kind of religious conversation or employment seems particularly to interest them, should be brought out on Sunday, to make it as pleasant a day as possible to them.

'I hardly know how to say a word against Jeremy Taylor; he is a great favourite of mine; but I cannot help thinking his views of the doctrine of Christianity savour too much of monastic severity, and too little of the simplicity which is in Christ Jesus. The times he wrote in may account for these inconsistencies in the writings of so holy a man; but I think they are calculated to increase the melancholy of any one who is unhappy about religion; because there is something so obscure and confused in his ideas upon many important points. I must now, my dear ——, bid you farewell; I need not tell you what pleasure it gives me to hear from you; nor how earnestly I wish, that you may find the peace and comfort you are seeking. My earnest prayer is that the promised "Spirit of truth" may be with you, to "guide you into all truth." The weaknesses you own to me are exactly what I have felt, and do feel myself; but God will overcome them for us, and enable us to "bring every thought into subjection to the obedience of Christ." I am sometimes afraid, that my using so much Scripture language, may appear like cant or affectation to you; but I do it, because, when I express myself in the sense, and as much as possible in the words, of Scripture, I have less fear of misleading you, or of mixing my own earthly ideas with the pure and heavenly truths on which we are conversing.'

Again—

Stoke, Jan. 22, 1827.

'Though I have not yet heard of you, I am sure that all things are going on well with you, since the very God of love is become your God, and will be your Father and guide for ever. May you know more and more every day of his forgiving love, and be led to feel that you are with Jesus, "who has loved you, and washed you from your sins in his own blood!" O my dear friend, my heart is full of joy, when I think that the Lord has taught you to seek happiness in Him. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness"—says this precious Saviour—"for they shall be filled." Therefore from his own words I have a warrant to call you "blessed;" and if he has given you himself, I care not what else he takes from you; knowing, as I do, that you can want nothing that is good for you, while the Lord of life and glory is yours. What a blessed prospect lies before you! The same Spirit, that has been showing you the vanity and sinfulness of your own heart, will not stop short there. No: He will "guide you into all truth; He will take of the things of Christ, and show them unto you:" He will "shed abroad the love of God in your heart:" He will, in His own time, "fill you with joy and peace in believing;" He will bring you on "from strength to strength," and "from glory to glory," till at length He removes you hence, to that heaven, where you shall see Christ as He is, be like Him, and dwell with Him for ever. Now you have nothing to do but to live upon the fulness of Jesus, casting away your own righteousness, which is no better than filthy rags: your own strength, which is mere weakness; and your own wisdom, which is foolishness with God. You must put forth the hand of faith, and lay hold of the righteousness of Jesus, which He offers you as His free gift, Rom. v. 15, 21—His strength, which is sufficient for you. 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10. Eph. vi. 10. Phil. iv. 13. 1 John iv. 4—and his wisdom, which is also freely yours for Christ's sake. 1 Cor. i. 30. Only go on asking him for more, more, still more of his precious love. He cannot deny it you; for he has said, "that whatsoever ye shall ask in his name, he will give you." You cannot ask too much; for think of the great things the apostles asked, Eph. iii. 14—19. yet he concludes all by saying, "Unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think." Dear ———, is not ours a happy lot? "If God be for us, who can be against us? Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth: who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died; yea, rather, that is risen again; who is even at the right hand of God; who also maketh intercession for us." Here is our anchor of hope—Christ died; Christ is risen; Christ intercedes. When Satan, or our own evil conscience accuses us, we are too apt to look for comfort to something in ourselves. In this we shall always be disappointed; if we look to Christ, we never shall. May he teach us by his own Spirit how to live by faith in him. I long to hear from you, and to know whether you have yet been able to find peace in God. This precious gift will, I know, be bestowed upon you. Do tell me all you feel, and let me often have a letter from you; for, believe me, scarcely any thing can afford me greater pleasure.

'I pray that your communications may always bring me the happy news, that you are more and more devoted to our dearest Lord, in whom, may we, my dearest friend, become daily more united. There is a common friendship which is very delightful; but there is a communion of spirit, peculiar to those who love the Lord Jesus; and this is what I trust He will grant to us; for it will last, when common friendship has been long withered by the hand of death. May you be blessed with every spiritual blessing, and rooted and grounded in love. This is the prayer of, &c.'

The next letter exhibits accurate discrimination, and a high standard of Christian Experience.

'I was much interested, my dearest friend, in what you said about mingling earthly with heavenly feeling. It is a difficult question, and one which I am sure I am not fit to answer. Only I think, we may in some degree know whether our love is of the right kind or not, by asking ourselves whether it really is God that we love in our friends, and in our communion with them: whether we love those that are in Christ, incomparably more than those who are not in him; and whether after all we could give up the society of the very best and dearest of them all, rather than lose one particle of God's favour. Surely we may love our friends, and that most dearly, for God requires it of us; but then "he that loveth father or mother more than him, is not worthy of him." Love to our friends seems the purest earthly feeling. Yet I think, if we find ourselves enjoying devotion in its social privileges, more than in personal communion with God, our devotion cannot have been altogether of a spiritual character. But while we lament over the weakness and inconsistency, which spoil our holiest actions, and defile the sweetest affections God has given us, let us take comfort in the thought, that "we have not an high priest, who cannot be touched with a feeling of our infirmities." "He knoweth our frame, he remembereth that we are dust;" and (what should raise our gratitude to the highest pitch) he himself has been made dust, like unto our miserable dust in all things, except sin, on purpose that he might be able to "have compassion on the ignorant, and on those who are out of the way." There is such a clear view given to us in the Epistle to the Hebrews of the twofold nature of the Lord Jesus, that I derive unspeakable comfort from studying it. Scarcely any book makes me see so clearly that he is the Lord God, "dwelling in light inaccessible, whom no man hath seen or can see;" and yet that he is "bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh;" able to enter into my feelings, to pity my weaknesses, and to sympathize with me in my temptations. O if we could but dwell upon this wonder more! it is "the wisdom of God, and the power of God." "Angels desire to look into it;" "the spirits of the just" are for ever learning more about it; and I know of nothing so likely to make the souls of God's people here like those who are above, as the continual contemplation of this marvellous love of God, in manifesting himself in the flesh. Dear M., how soon we shall see him face to face, "whom having not seen we love!" Let us seek to become intimately acquainted with him here. Let us be often conversing with him, and always near to him, that he may not have to say to us; "I never knew you." He will never say this to us; but our watchful enemy may in some dark hour suggest such a thing to us; and then how delightful to be able to refute such a suggestion, by the memory of all the intimate communion we have enjoyed with Jesus; to be able to appeal to this dearest friend himself, that so far from never having known him, we have known, desired, loved nothing else in comparison of him. Would that this were my case now! But I feel as far away from Jesus, as if he were quite a stranger to my soul. My heart seems but to backslide; and I cannot help continually thinking of that bitter complaint of Job's: "O that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness." Still I know that God "will heal my backsliding, and love me freely;" for though I am changed, "he changes not." But how strange it is, that our hearts should ever be so alienated from God, after having once known how sweet it is to love him! Surely the character of long-suffering, so often given to God in the Scripture, has never been manifested by any one in so many instances as to me. Let us not forget, dearest M—, to pray for one another, "that our hearts may be knit together in love, and unto all riches of the full assurance of understanding," that we may daily increase in the "knowledge of him, whom to know is life eternal."

The interesting tone of Christian simplicity which the following letter breathes, is worthy of remark.

August 4, 1825.

'You will perhaps be surprised to receive a letter so soon after my last. But I feel this morning an irresistible wish to write to you, to which I was moved whilst praying for you; and in the strength of Jesus I will speak to you only of him. Perhaps I shall to-day receive a letter from you: I shall be very glad, because I am so anxious to know that you have devoted yourself in the fullest manner to him, who gave up his life for you. My dear ——, I do not know whether you are feeling with me; but it is a cheering hope to me, that I, who have so often encouraged you in the greatest sin which a redeemed soul can commit; that of indifference to the service and love of the Redeemer may now be an instrument in his hands to animate you to very different feelings. We have given way to a very unfaithful spirit in our fears, and in our repugnance to speak in his name. Let us only believe, that when he grants us the inestimable privilege of carrying to any one the blessed news of his gospel; "it is not we that speak, but the Spirit of our Father which speaketh in us." This feeling that we are nothing, but that he is every thing in us, would give us a confidence full of joy, and at the same time without pride. It is indeed the height of happiness to follow him like a little child, to live in Christ and out of ourselves. Oh! had I but a constant sight of his love! but he "is faithful, who will stablish us, and keep us from evil." Let us confide in him; let us tell him that we are not able to move a single step towards him, that we cannot love him, nor believe in his name. His goodness will allure us, his power preserves us, his strength will be given us in exchange for our weakness, and we shall find an indescribable delight in being able to do all in Christ.'

To her cousin she writes in this affectionate and encouraging strain:—

November 27, 1827.

'Let me tell you, my dear friend, how sincerely and affectionately I sympathize with you in the feelings you express with regard to the most important of all subjects. My dearest cousin, go on seeking. There are pleasures, rivers of pleasures, whereof the true Christian drinks with unspeakable delight; and in his own time Jesus, the good Shepherd, will lead you to these fountains of living water. Already he, who "called his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out" from the world of sin, has called you by his own word, speaking to your soul. Do but be willing, as Levi, "to rise up, leave all, and follow him;" and you will find that he will lead you in the pleasant and peaceful way. For every vain pleasure that he calls upon you to give up, he will give a thousand solid and real pleasures, which it hath not entered into the worldling's heart to conceive.'

The next letter, written to her cousin, marks the instuction, obligation, and encouragement connected with the hour of "trouble," that time "to which man is born," and, when to the unhumbled and unsanctified mind, the resources of the world often aggravate suffering, instead of contributing support.

March 20, 1825.

'Our meeting, my dear friend, must be deferred to a future time, if ever it takes place in this world. But there is another meeting, to which we may safely look forward, if we are the children of God through Christ Jesus; and this will be in the presence of our best and dearest friend, who so loved us, as to "purchase us with his own blood." How happy, how very happy it would make me, to know that my much-loved cousin was making it the grand object of her life to seek for salvation through the all-sufficient Saviour; and that we were united, not only by the strong ties of relationship and affection, but also by that bond of the Spirit, which makes all the redeemed people of Christ to be of one heart and one soul! Let us pray for this one thing, to be devoted to the Lord Jesus; it is heaven begun on earth. The severe trial with which it has pleased our gracious God to afflict us, has given us an additional reason to write vanity upon all human hopes and expectations: and I hope I may say, that it has driven us to seek for comfort in those things which alone can give any real relief to a mind under the pressure of grief. Painful indeed it is to speak about any thing, which brings with it such afflicting recollections. Yet I feel, that I cannot and must not leave it till I have entreated you, my beloved friend, to join me in seeking a "friend that sticketh closer than a brother," whom no length of time, or adverse circumstances can take from us. Into his gracious ear we may pour all our complaints; "in all our afflictions he will be afflicted." And one glimpse of his love will enable us to rejoice in the midst of tribulation. But there is one condition: "Give me thine heart." He must have all or none. A divided heart he will not accept. A heart that indulges in any one sin, that cleaves to any one worldly vanity, can never be the residence of his pure Spirit; he must have the whole heart; every thought, every faculty, every affection must centre in him. And who is able to perform this condition? I am sure neither you nor I can; for we are carnal, and "the carnal heart is enmity against God." Well then, my dear ——, let us simply believe on him to effect all this for us. Let us come to him as sinners; for "His blood cleanseth from all sin." Let us come as wretched, and poor, and blind; and he "will fill our minds with joy and peace in believing," will give us "gold tried in the fire, that we may be rich," and will cause his Spirit to shine into our dark hearts, "to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." True, we cannot love him of ourselves; but he can compel even our hearts to love him. O may he reveal himself to your soul, and give you such discoveries of his amazing love, as may constrain you to make him your "all in all."

In another letter on the same subject, we find her taking her chair by the side of her afflicted friend, and, like a true daughter of consolation, "comforting her with the same comfort, wherewith she herself had been comforted of God."

January 18*th*, 1828.

'My very dear Friend,

'A letter from —— informed me of the very heavy trial you have sustained. I did not like immediately to intrude upon your feelings; and since then, illness has prevented my writing. How I have longed to be with you, and share your grief, though I am sensible of my inability to afford you any consolation. But I could at least have mingled my feelings with yours, and told you, what however you need not be told, that your losses and afflictions must ever be in a measure mine. My beloved friend, would that in partaking as I most sincerely do, of your sorrow, I could in any way lighten or alleviate it! But I rejoice in the thought, that faith has united you to one, who is the God of comfort; and his Spirit is the Comforter. May he shed abundantly of his precious influence into your heart and your dear sister's at this trying time! May he "lift up the light of his countenance upon you" both! and that will turn your mourning into gladness. Perhaps this bereavement will lead you nearer to Jesus; for we have an unfailing promise, that "all things shall work together for our good." "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, even as a father the son in whom he delighteth: as many as I love, I rebuke and chasten." And then how sweet to be assured, that "in all our afflictions he is afflicted," that in all our troubles he is near to help; that in all our bereavements he is ready to fill up with himself the painful dreary void, which is made in our hearts. My beloved friend, I do not say these things to you, "because you know them not, but rather because you know them," and are, I trust, at this time living upon them. How vain were it to speak to you of earthly comfort under the heavy loss you have sustained! But this is the very time, when God's children often drink deepest of heavenly consolation; and I trust it is thus with my precious friend. I know that our heavenly Father has afflicted you in very faithfulness; and though for the present your chastisement must seem "grievous" indeed to you, yet hereafter it shall bring forth in you "the peaceable fruits of righteousness." In the mean time may you be taught to lay hold on the gracious invitation to "call upon God in the time of trouble!" Make David's words your own—"From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed; lead me to the rock that is higher than I." "What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee." "My soul trusteth in thee, and in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast." "In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee; for thou wilt answer me." And may you, my dear friend, be able to apply to yourself the words of our God—"Behold, I have refined thee, but not with silver: I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction." "I, even I, am he that comforteth you—as one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you." "In a little wrath I hid my face from thee for a moment; but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy on thee, saith the Lord thy Redeemer." I would not obtrude my own words on you upon an occasion like this. But I may hope that the Spirit of truth will bless his words to your comfort; so I fear not to tire you with the repetition, for they are always new—"O God, thou art my God." Here is a balm for every wound; yes, he is your God. Wisdom and tenderness shall form the basis of all his dealings towards you; and he, who is so wise and so tender, is engaged to do you nothing but good all the days of your life. I did not mean to have written so much, knowing that even the sympathy of friendship may sometimes be an interruption to our own feelings. But I now leave off, begging you to accept the warmest affection of, &c.'

How delightful is the confidence which Miss Graham here expresses in the support of the simple word of God in the hour of affliction! Though her letter affords some of her own beautiful thoughts, yet her main effort is perceptible throughout; not to strain her mind to force out something original or striking, but to bring forward the encouraging promises of Scripture, as far more powerful than the product of her own thought. This is honouring the word of God.

The next letter relates personally to herself, and gives a lively description of her state of mind, with a happy transition from her own playful spirit, to a more serious and edifying strain.

April, 1827.

'I am sure that I am very old for my age. It is not common at twenty-four, to live upon the past as I do; most people would rather feed upon pleasant hopes of the future, but that is a thing I never do without trembling. It is not that I have the least doubt of every thing being ordered for my happiness; but I dread passing my life in this painful uncertainty, and I think this requires more faith than to pass it in the most severe affliction. Besides, I am afraid of living in a kind of tertian fever; for either I am very hot or very cold. I am incapable of an equal temperament in any thing. A person who knows me this month, would not know me the next. I do not know myself; God knows me; he knows all my weakness, all my vanity; however, all this does not cause him to forsake me. When I stray, he seeks me; when I return, he receives me with tenderness; when I doubt, he assures me; when I am unhappy, he consoles me. Surely he can give me strength to devote myself wholly to him, and not to turn away again from his ways.'

Another letter affords a beautiful illustration of her spirituality of mind connected with the recollection of her literary pursuits.

Chudleigh, Sept. 1827.

'You are then at ——, where you lead a very pleasant life, but where you are not happy, because he who is your happiness no longer cheers you with his presence. I also am very gay. I am here to my heart's content; and I am not happy, because I cannot find my God—my beloved. I find that we "are the salt of the earth;" but that this "salt has lost its savour, and is no longer good for any thing, but to be thrown away and trodden under foot of men." But the infinite compassion of Jesus will not suffer it to be so with us, and therefore he causes us to feel incessantly bitter inquietudes, which will not suffer us to rest without returning to him. In the meantime we are both in a new place, which we shall perhaps never see again. Shall we quit this place without leaving there some savour of the name of Jesus Christ? It is delightful to be able to create recollections as exquisite as those awakened by the beautiful images of Petrarch and Tasso. But it is much more delightful to remember every place, where we have seen some soul converted to God; this recollection will solace us at a time when all the delights of our Tasso will appear but a vain dream. I do not say this, because I feel as I speak. I see it in my understanding, but it does not reach to my heart. However, I speak, because I desire to feel it, and that you should feel it too. I wish to love Tasso, and other studies, only for the love of God, and to give all to his service. But I love them too much for myself; and yet I do not think it would be right to give them up, since they may one day be of use to me.'

We will now present a few letters, which will introduce us to a nearer view of the exercises of her own mind. She appears to have been deeply harassed, in common with the great Apostle, with that painful conflict, which his own inspired pen has so graphically described in Rom. vii.—a chapter, which—though unintelligible to the world, and even to the merely external professors of the gospel—unfolds more or less of the secret history of every Christian's heart. The following letter, of an early date, marks her mind exercised in the painful sense of her own deficiencies, while anxiously engaged in the pursuit of that knowledge, which was the basis of all that was valuable, both in her intellectual and spiritual character.

June, 1823.

'No—I have not yet regained my peace of mind. It is a guest which will not dwell in a soul so weak and vain as mine. I have again read a passage in Mason. But I find, that although self-knowledge is the most excellent kind of wisdom a man can possess, yet there is a sort of self-knowledge, which only debases and hardens the soul; and this is exactly the kind with which I am furnished. And whilst true self-knowledge introduces order and light into the soul, as when the sun enlightens the earth; the self-knowledge which I possess rather resembles the lightning which shines for a moment, and shows all the desolation which the storm has produced, and which itself increases the desolation. To know oneself miserable, but not to be willing to use the means of being happy; to know oneself a sinner, but to flee from and abandon the Saviour of sinners, has been a true description of my feelings."

To her cousin she expresses some grounds of thankful recollection for Christians, who are called in "the days of their youth" to the service of their God and Saviour.

'My dearest ——,

'I seem to have so much to say to you, that I scarcely know where to begin. I am not now afraid of indulging in a little effusion of my feelings to you, as they begin to sit less heavy upon my heart. I begin to feel a sort of assurance, that it will ere long be "with me as in months past, when the candle of the Lord shined upon my head." Yet I cannot tell you that I enjoy any thing of really spiritual feeling. Oh! that has been too long stifled to awake at once to anything like life and vigour.* Dear ——, let us be more careful than we have hitherto been, not to quench the spark of Divine life in our hearts, not to suffer the love of the world to enter where the Holy Spirit has deigned to erect a temple to Himself. I must tell you the thought which struck me yesterday, and roused me more effectually than any thing for some time past has done. It was a sense of the blessedness of being called in our youth to the knowledge of God, now that our feelings are fresh, and our habits unformed; before we have entered into the pleasures, company, and temptations of the world. It seems as though we had through the mercy of our Saviour, been turned into the broad path of destruction while yet upon the threshold—before we could have a long and weary way of sin to retrace. Are not these mercies, which call for our warmest gratitude? Shall I tell you another light, which then struck me more forcibly than I had ever felt it before? Is it not a blessing to have been enabled to enter decidedly upon a life of religion, before we had formed any connexion contrary to it? Now every thing seems open before us. The narrow path has been for us divested of half its difficulties; and great will be our sin and misery, if we walk not in it with a cheerful devoted resolve, that every future step may be for his glory, who first led us into it.'

The next letter displays the jealous though exquisite enjoyment of her sources of legitimate pleasure in the work of God.

Hastings, July 1823.

'I am no longer sad, unless a pleasure too profound for laughter or gayety can be called sadness. There are times when I feel unhappy, because I am so happy—because I can derive such exquisite enjoyment from objects which pass away in a moment, whilst the things of eternal duration make only a light and free impression on my soul. I cannot however forbid myself from enjoying the delights, which here present themselves every minute to my mind; and you must pardon me if I fatigue you with many absurdities.'

The following allusion to her early attainments cannot fail of interesting the reader.

'There are periods in the life of every person, which have respect only to the intellect, but which affect however all the rest of the life, and to which may be traced up almost all the intellectual qualities which that person possesses. It appears to me, that the period to which my mind recurs with the greatest pleasure is that, when I began to learn Milton as a simple act of memory. What a low and unworthy motive! However, when my soul began to open, to understand a little his noble ideas, so entire a change was made in my inclinations and taste, that I can hardly believe myself to be the same person.'

---

* The writer feels it right to notice this sentence as a subtle form of legality, very prevalent with young Christians, and not unknown to exercised Christians in a higher stage of maturity. The chastisement of the rod is indeed numbered among the rich provisions of the Everlasting Covenant; and usually the Lord makes the backslidings of his children the instruments of his salutary correction. [Jer. ii. 19.] But let us never seem to dictate to him the mode of his discipline, and especially let us not limit the absolute and unbounded freedom of the gospel, which opens the way of immediate and complete acceptance to those who deserve a more protracted banishment from his favour. The expectation of an indefinitely distant return paralyzes the present effort; while the freeness of mercy opens the door of instant hope for the most hopeless. [Isa. xliii. 23, 25,] and indeed produces the constraining motive to the first step of penitence. [Ib. xliv. 22.]

The next letter gives a profitable application of Scripture, together with an interesting train of remark.

June, 1823.

'One text of Scripture has lately dwelt much upon my mind, and seemed like a sentence of condemnation upon my worldly-mindedness and inconsistency. It is that short but expressive description of the conversion from sin—"And he rose up, and left all, and followed him." Oh! what a warning, and yet by me unheeded warning! does it seem to rise and shake off these fetters of sloth and inactivity—to leave all, even the dearest friends, the most deeply-rooted habits, which can come in the way of this grand end, and to follow Jesus through affliction and difficulties, in all the meek simplicity and lowly dependence of a little child. May he give us strength thus to follow his loved footsteps! May he enable us to walk hand in hand, mutually encouraging and supporting each other, till we come to the presence of his glory, there to abide for ever! I well know the feeling you mention with regard to another world. But when thinking of this, I am unfortunately apt to reverse it, and to consider the past as a painful dream, and the present something too disagreeable to be real; while I look forward to future hopes and schemes, till the dreams of my imagination assume the shape of delightful realities: and in stretching forward to them, I forget, that it is only in the sober and continual routine of present duties, that I can hope to attain those delightful expectations.'

Her seasons of prayer appear to have been, in common with all Christians, times of severe conflict. The following extract, after alluding to the blots that too often deform the profession of the Gospel, alludes to this point:

Torquay, April 12, 1825.

'How many ways there are of dishonouring the Christian profession! some by ill humour; we by coldness; some by immoderate zeal; others by the fear of man. Oh! my dear friend, let us seek to ornament our profession; let us seek in the unlimited compassion of our good Shepherd pardon for our past extreme lukewarmness, and Divine strength to shake off the drowsiness which oppresses us. Not only the prayers which I offer for myself, but those which I offer up for you, seem to be covered with a cloud, through which they cannot penetrate. My prayers did I say? I do not pray—I am frightened when I think of the state in which I am. If you are in a more spiritual frame, when at the feet of the Saviour, remember her who is gone so far away.'

To another of her correspondents she thus writes.

April 30, 1827.

'I can hardly tell you what a strange state I am in—one minute longing after holiness so intensely, that I feel as if I should die if I did not get it: the next so full of vain thoughts, that I hardly know what real spiritual holiness is. I never had such clear views of the extreme depravity of my heart and life. Every day I learn something new about my helplessness, blindness, and dreadful wickedness. But though I can spread these things before God in prayer, I cannot mourn over them; or if I do, it is from a sense of my misery—not from a view of him whom I have pierced. Well! I know this hardness of heart is a part of the complaint under which I groan, and which will be removed by the great Physician. But I am sometimes confounded by the seemingly contrary answers I receive to prayer, though in the end I feel the dealings of God with me to have been wise and just. For instance; after having prayed much for a sense of sin, I seem to have been left to the power of it. I feel left to strive with a great enemy, who tramples me with the greatest ease under his feet. Let me not unjustly murmur against my dearest and wisest Saviour. For he leaves me not long at the mercy of my cruel adversary, but appears on my behalf often when I have the least expectation of it. One thing distresses me very much. It is so strange. I have for some time past scarcely ever enjoyed a spiritual sabbath. I often enjoy a sabbath on week days; but when Sunday comes (I mean the last three or four) all my spiritual feelings go; religion seems the dullest thing in the world, and vain thoughts the pleasantest; I cannot tell you how the comfort of the day is destroyed. It was the case the whole of yesterday till quite night, when the accidental opening upon this little verse of Toplady's brought back the loveliness of Christ to my thoughts with such sweetness, and filled me with such longings after him, that for some time I could not sleep;

Less than thyself will not suffice,
My comfort to restore:
More than thyself I cannot crave,
And thou canst give no more.

O to be "filled with all the fulness of God!" to have "Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith!" to be temples of the Holy Ghost! To know that this is mine; and yet for want of faith I so often make my heart as a cage of unclean birds. My dearest friend, I have chosen this verse for my portion, my treasure in this world and the next. I recommend it to you; and I know God will give it to us, and abundantly fulfil our wishes above all that we can ask or think—Ezek. xliv. 28. What a glorious portion! Hard as my heart is, and blind as my eyes are, I see and feel a little of its excellency: but then so often my soul forgets her joy, looks back upon the world, and shrinks from the choice, which a few minutes before seemed so unutterably desirable.'

At another time she writes in the same strain.

May 15, 1827.

'I think I would give up every prospect of worldly happiness that I have, or ever can have, to have these vain thoughts crucified and nailed to the cross of Jesus; and yet often, the more I want to be delivered from them, the more obstinately I cleave to them, and I am so tired of praying against them. But the everlasting covenant fills me with hope and comfort, "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts."'

The next letter shortly afterwards is of a similar character. The spirit of tender carefulness that marks the closing allusion is worthy of special remark:

Stoke, June 2, 1827.

'I never wanted something to awaken and alarm me so much as I do now. I think I could be content to have some very great affliction, if it would but restore me to communion with God. I told you how much vain thoughts had tempted and annoyed me. When I last wrote to you, I felt confident of being soon made "more than conqueror through him that loved me." But I have lately left off striving against them; and now having turned "the house of prayer into a den of thieves," I know not how to cast them out again. Oh! that Jesus himself would drive them from his temple, though it be with a scourge. With regard to ——, I feel it more and more my duty to send my letter. But what I have written has been given to me, and I am afraid to finish it, lest I should in my worldly and unbelieving frame, mix something of my own with it.'

Yet her deep self-abasing apprehensions were not—except, possibly, at seasons of temptation—tinctured with despondency. From the tone of many of the preceding letters it is evident, that she knew the fulness of her resources in the promises of the Gospel: and in her prostrate humiliation of soul she did not cease to plead them to the uttermost of her warranted expectations. Thus she writes to her friend:

'—— and I, and all took the sacrament yesterday. I never felt so much—"the remembrance of these our misdoings is grievous; the burden of them is intolerable." Is it not great and free love, which has made that a burden to us, which was once our delight; and that intolerable, which we once drank up like water? But what puzzles and alarms me is, that it should be sometimes intolerable, and yet not forsaken; and sometimes at the moment when I feel it to be intolerable, the struggle to give it up is more intolerable. The only thing that makes me feel a holy hatred of sin, is the thought, that, even when it seems sweetest to me, the eye of Jesus beholds it as an evil and a bitter thing; and I shall soon look upon it as he does. It is "that abominable thing which he hates." It is that abominable thing which my wretched abominable heart loves. But then I do hate myself for loving it: and I do not know any thing I would not thank God for depriving me of, if it would tend to make me see sin as he does. I know this is the way you feel. Then let us take comfort in the thought that Jesus has done something for us, and to us who have (though so little) more will be given. "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it;" this often gives me comfort, (as indeed the whole of the eighty-first Psalm does:) but then we can no more open our mouths than we can fill them. God must open them wide, and fill them too. I feel so much comfort in thinking that we cannot open our mouths too wide; we cannot be too greedy of heavenly food, nor too grasping of heavenly riches. It is not presumption, but faith and humility, to expect that God for Christ's sake will fill our earthen vessels with an eminent measure of his heavenly treasures; and the greatest eminence in Christian grace is to lose sight of self, to be willing to be least of all—to be nothing, and to look upon others as nothing, except as they are in Christ, and to look upon Christ as every thing. But oh, how far am I from this! Yet I do not despair, I have had glimpses of it. I trust it shall one day be the settled temper of both of our souls. Pray for me, and pray that I may be enabled to pray for you.'

The darkness and conflicts of her mind, were doubtless much increased by the active power of the enemy operating upon her enervated health. It is delightful, however, to mark the cheering irradiations of sunshine breaking in upon her, as marked in the following letter.

November 21, 1826.

'My beloved Friend,

'I can almost say in the words of Scripture which you love, that the winter of my soul is gone, and that the sweet season of the springing of flowers, and of the singing of the birds is come, and that the voice of the celestial dove makes itself heard. I again begin to know what it is to walk, "as seeing him, who is invisible." But do not suppose that I am in a very spiritual state. But the least ray of the light of his countenance appears immense, after so many weeks passed in darkness and rebellion. Oh! my ——, let us exert every effort to find again the lover and the beloved of our souls. Who knows but his own time may come, in which he will fully reveal himself to us? Let us pray for each other, that we may be wholly separated from the world and from ourselves, and more closely united to Jesus, in whose strength we shall be able to do all things. I cannot feel that deep repentance that I ought to feel for my repeated transgressions. But even in this I see the Divine love, because every strong emotion affects my health.'

Her views of the power of faith in prayer were most enlivening. 'I never pray' said she one day to a dear friend 'without a promise.' On that promise she was enabled to rely with entire confidence. Referring to the fulness and power of the Apostle's prayer, Eph. i. 17, 18, and to that sublime doxology, chap. iii. 20, 21, she added, 'What a prayer was this! How comprehensive! How much are we encouraged to ask for! Why then do we receive so little, but because our hearts are not sufficiently enlarged? We are wanting in faith. We do not expect enough from God. We are straitened in ourselves. We are not straitened in God. How much more should we receive, if we "continued instant in prayer," and "prayed without ceasing." We are like the king of Israel, who, when commanded by Elisha to smite on the ground, provoked the wrath of the man of God, by smiting only thrice, and then staying. Whereas, had he smitten five or six times, he would not only have gained a temporary advantage over his enemies, but would have utterly destroyed them. Thus in our prayers we are contented with small success. We do not continue enough in the exercise. Even when our hearts have been somewhat enlarged, we have been too ready to desist, and rest satisfied without persevering, till we had received yet larger supplies of Divine grace.'

To another friend she wrote in the same enlarged spirit of Christian expectancy:—

May 15, 1827.

'I see something of the love of Christ, which I would not lose for worlds. But neither do you or I see half that may be seen of it even in this world, if we ask in faith. Only let us not be afraid of expecting too much. Let us stretch our prayers and expectations to the very uttermost of what "we can ask or think;" and as sure as God is truth, we shall receive "exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think." We shall receive all that Jesus can ask or think.'

Her views of Christian assurance, as set forth in the following letter, were clear and scriptural.

July 4, 1827.

'My mind is in a state of declension and deadness to spiritual things, which is the more awful to me, from having enjoyed much communion with God a few weeks ago. I know not how to describe this state better than by saying, that prayer seems to be my burden; and evil thoughts my element; and that, instead of maintaining a continued conflict against this inclination, I feel a kind of obstinate hardened disposition in my mind, leading me to yield rather to Satan than to God. But even during all this time, my evidence of being a child of God, though not brought with any realizing sweetness to my heart, yet remains quite clear and unclouded to my understanding. But my evidence is this—not that I am now in a spiritual frame of mind (though that would be a delightful confirmation of it)—but that—let my state be what it will,—still I cannot forget, that I have cast myself a thousand and a thousand times upon the mercy of God in Christ Jesus. I have committed my soul to him; and, though I am unfaithful and unbelieving, yet I know that he abideth ever faithful, to keep that which has once been committed to him. Besides—I have told him again and again—and that with agonizing earnestness,—what a weak backsliding heart I have entrusted to his care; and that, if he does not hold me up, I shall fall. And now can I think that he has forgotten all my prayer for keeping, and all his promises of keeping me, and that he means to let me fall for ever? Oh! I cannot think so. I cling to my assurance, and cannot but think, that as Christ—and Christ alone—is the foundation of it, it must be well-founded. I must think (I would say it with reverence) that God would cease to be "a faithful Creator," if he could give up a soul that has been so often confined to his keeping. There is one verse, that in the darkest and coldest seasons comes with comfort to my mind. I know that I have often asked my Heavenly Father for bread. Shall I think he has given me a stone? I have asked him for the Spirit of truth. Shall I think he has put me off with the spirit of delusion?

This letter illustrates the true character of Christian confidence, as exclusively based upon the word of God. It is independent of external excitement. It is the reliance of faith upon the immutable engagements of Divine faithfulness. Much that passes under this name is the assurance of feeling, rather than of faith. The consolations of the gospel are believed, not because they are declared, but because they are felt. Hence, when the comfort is lost, the ground of confidence is destroyed. This, however, is an inversion of the Scriptural rule—walking by sight, not by faith—unlike a tried saint of old, who, when "walking in darkness, and having no light," had learnt to "stay himself upon his God"—"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him."

Any encouragement however to be drawn from a past operation of faith must be carefully connected with its present exercise. Its first effort indeed linked the Christian's heart in indissoluble union with his Saviour. Yet the principle must not be confined to a single act, by which at some former time he came to Christ. It is rather the continued habit of the soul, by which he is "coming" to Christ in constant motion. In Miss Graham's case, the earnestness and intensity of her mind clearly marked the active though unconscious influence of the habit of faith, even while her recollection was fixed—perhaps too exclusively—upon some former and determinate exercise.

But was Miss Graham warranted in her strong assurance, in a state of conscious and acknowledged backsliding? When we consider the character of her religion—self-suspicious, jealous of declension, earnestly longing for communion with God, content with no ordinary measure of conformity to the Divine image, we shall not be disposed to accuse her of presumption, or of a loose and careless profession. Hers was not a paralyzing security—a self-indulgent repose—but an habitual quickness of spiritual discernment, and dutiful watchfulness. It was probably her intense solicitude for higher conformity to her Lord, that induced her, like holy Bradford, to pass this severe judgment upon herself, in the deep consciousness of her infinite distance from the ultimate point of attainment, and her sometimes apparent contrariety to it. Iniquity felt and iniquity allowed, are essentially different. When allowed, the soul is benumbed and blinded in comparative unconsciousness. When hated, the sensibility of its defilements is so keen, and the apprehensions of its guilt so afflicting, that even in a state of conscious acceptance, the soul is constrained to "write bitter things" against itself. The prostrate humiliating confessions of that holy saint of the Reformation just alluded to, in no degree hindered the peaceful rest of his soul upon the engagements of the faithfulness and love of his God.

We could not indeed but strongly discountenance an assured confidence in a state of open sin, or in any habitually allowed inconsistency with a Christian profession. Yet we are persuaded that a personal assurance has often proved the only chain of love that has restrained the backslider from total apostacy—from saying—"There is no hope—for I have loved strangers, and after them will I go." Often too has it been the appointed means of conviction and recovery from backsliding. A realized sense of a Father's love in the tenderness and wisdom of merited chastening has pierced many a rebellious child with contrite sorrow, and has brought him back to his Father's feet with simplicity, gratitude and confidence. He is humbled and encouraged under the most distressing consciousness of backsliding by the remembrance, that the principle and warrant of assurance is not in himself, and that his ground of confidence is unchangeably the same. 'I see,' said Miss Graham on one occasion, 'that God is my God in covenant. He is unchangeable, though I continually vary.'

The duty and importance of an elevated enjoyment of scriptural privilege, are delightfully inculcated in the following letter.

'What a privilege (she observes, speaking of a blessed saint now in heaven), has Mrs.—— to be walking so closely with God, and enjoying so much of his presence! "Oh! that I" thus always "knew where I might find him, that I might come even to his seat!" But I never had so little of his presence as now, and if it sometimes returns for a moment, the emotions of my mind seem almost more than I can bear, so that I dread, even while I long for, their recurrence. The true remedy for all this would be, that settled quiet peace, which is the effect of the righteousness of Christ. But this I want faith to lay hold of as my own. I have been surprised lately at the slighting and almost suspicion, with which friends appear to look upon spiritual peace and joy, as if it were rather a snare to be guarded against, than a privilege to be sought after. Yet surely—"Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, rejoice," is as much a command as—"Thou shalt not kill—Thou shalt not steal." And I know nothing except this "joy of the Lord," which is said to be "our strength," that can so fill the heart, as to leave no room for rejoicing in self or in the world. And do you not think, that the more of this holy joy is "shed abroad in the heart," the more godly sorrow will dwell there? At least I find it to be so. They seem to me to be inseparable companions in our experience on earth. Were I to mention the sweetest ingredient in the cup of joy or sorrow (I scarcely know which to call it), that we are permitted to taste of here; it would be the melting of the heart, which springs from that immeasurable unworthiness, which gives us some faint conception how low Christ has stooped to save us! Why then should it be thought presumptuous to desire an abundant measure of the very thing which we are commanded to have? Why should this desire for "the peace of God which passeth all understanding," be construed into a dependence upon frames and feelings?

'Sometimes I think we might have almost as much joy as there is in heaven, if we had but a holy boldness to ask for it, and to receive. We are not straitened in Christ; "but we are straitened in our own bowels;" so that, because joy is an undeserved guest in a heart defiled by sin, we dare not receive it as a lawful guest, though this heart has been cleansed with the blood of Jesus. But what will it be, my dearest friend, to open our eyes upon that world, where "perfect love casteth out fear" for ever! I try to conceive it sometimes, but I cannot. There is nothing I find so difficult, as to imagine entire deliverance from the spirit of bondage. What will it be, to be "face to face" with Christ; to "see him as he is;" to "see the King in his beauty," in "His own glory, in his Father's glory;" and yet to look upon him without fear! We had need have these earthly tabernacles taken down first; as they never could sustain it. And yet this is that death, at which even renewed human nature shrinks; though, if we could view it aright, it is but the shutting out of fear, and the letting in of perfect love for ever.'

It is indeed to be feared, as Miss Graham has observed, that there is a class of professors among us, who depreciate the glowing exercises of Christian feeling. Their religion is rather of an intellectual, than of a spiritual character. They reason, explain, demonstrate, vindicate. But they are cautious of extremes. They realise the seriousness, importance, and restraints of the gospel, rather than its high privileges and constraining obligations. The exercise of their judgments, from this defect of a deep influence of spiritual religion, materially checks the healthful and animating glow of their affections. Their views of the fundamental doctrines are generally orthodox, and they maintain a correct external deportment. But they appear to have a scanty enjoyment of that new-created taste and element of pleasure, which is connected with the revelation of the glory of God to the soul. They seem to be little conversant with the varied exercises of a devotional habit of mind—such as holy delight in communion with God, lively contemplation of the Saviour, spiritual meditation and enjoyment of the sacred word, and heavenly aspiration of soul. Their ordinary Christian conversation is restrained from that intimate and free communication of spiritual sympathies, which infuses mutual warmth, refreshment, and energy in the endeavour, like Jonathan and David, "to strengthen each other's hands in God;" to unite in a closer intercourse with our Divine Saviour, and to invigorate our purposes of consecration to his service.

Such persons seem too little to consider the strong and important connexion of religion with the affections. But it is only their lively and powerful exercise that is at all proportioned to the vast expanse and grandeur of the subject. We find, therefore, religion in heaven, where it exists in the most refined purity and perfection, is much engaged in the delightful affections of joy and love, and in the fervent expressions of these feelings in everlasting praise. The scriptural exhibition of religion in the records of the most eminent servants of God, and in the rich display of the promises of Christ, is of the same glowing character.

The religion of the "man after God's heart" was a religion of the affections. Every natural affection of his soul was filled with God. In his book of Psalms, written with the pen of inspiration for the public use of the church, we behold him—not describing the proper individualities of his own experience; but leading the worship of the universal church in the expression of deep humiliation, holy admiration, fervent love and joy in his God, earnest thirstings and pantings for his presence, delight in his ordinances, devout acknowledgments for his unbounded mercy, and exulting triumph in his faithful love. The book of Canticles also—however we may refrain from a minute consideration of some of its imagery—exhibits those vigorous exercises of spiritual affections, which are consonant to the experience of the lively Christian, and which excite in him no common measure of admiring, trusting, and grateful love to his Divine Saviour. The corresponding New Testament development of Christian privilege embraces those high and heavenly blessings, which draw out the affections of the soul into exciting employment—such as "peace with God," constant "access" to his presence and favour; rejoicing in hope of his glory; glorying in tribulations, as the path-way thither; "the love of God, shed abroad in the heart; and the enjoyment of God through our Lord Jesus Christ;" all of which are presented to us in a single view, as our present portion and source of happiness.

If therefore we acknowledge the gospel in its faith and obligations, while defectively apprehending and estimating its privileges—if our judgment has been informed and established without a full and habitual exercise of the affections, we stand convicted of an imperfect reception of Christ, and of possessing only a partial interest in his unspeakably rich enjoyments. The class of professors, to whom we more immediately allude, are little aware of the extent of loss to their own souls, or of evil to the church, from their neglect of seating religion more deeply and powerfully in their affections. The spiritual tone of their religion is materially deteriorated. The refreshing influences of the ordinances is weakened. The Holy Comforter is restrained in his intimate communion with their souls. A want of tender sensibility for the most part characterizes their profession. The careless but discerning world mark no perceptible elevation of heavenly character, and are led to think that the promised privileges of the Gospel are a delusive paradise. And professors of their own class gladly take shelter under this lower standard of the cross, as a respectable Evangelical religion, precluding them from many inconvenient sacrifices, to which a more decided exhibition of Christian devotedness might have subjected them.

This restraint upon the affections, brings us therefore into a lower atmosphere of the gospel, unvisited with the full power of its holy influence. This may readily account for that conformity to the principles, habits, and conversation of the world, which to a considerable extent is connected with an Evangelical profession. The enlivening power of faith, operating through the medium of the affections, would secure a triumphant victory in every form of worldly conflict, and enable the disciples of Jesus boldly to confess their Master's name, to glory in his cross, and to delight in his service. But this is the "one thing" that is too often "lacking:" and for which, as a principle of entire consecration to Christ, no substitute can be found.

Let us not however, while insisting upon the connexion of the gospel upon the affections, be supposed to advocate a religion of impulse or sensation. We are aware that excited feelings are no proof of holy affections. Much that passes under the name of religious feeling, is the ebb and flow of the animal emotions, wholly unconnected with the spiritual principle. Those emotions alone are of Divine origin, on which practical holiness are engrafted; and which are not sought for the pleasurable excitement of the moment, but as a medium for the exercise of heavenly affections, and for the exhibition of self-denying obedience. We remember also, that the first excitement of a religious feeling, is very different from that feeling as a fixed habit of the mind under the controul of a sound judgment. The example of the primitive Christians lead us to combine intelligence and energy with feeling, and therefore to suspect the most delightful emotions, which do not bring the steady light from heaven into the daily path, which do not communicate vigour, activity, and decision to the character, and that are not connected with a dedication of the whole man to the service of God. Religion is the dominant practical principle in the soul; and its practical results are the legitimate evidence of the genuineness of the principle. Any encouragement from the past exercise of the affections, irrespective of their present practical influence, must therefore be discountenanced. And even this influence satisfactorily ascertained must be controlled by the dictates of a spiritually enlightened judgment. We would call the judgment into constant exercise, under the influence of Christian motives. We would regulate "the Spirit of love," under the controul of "the Spirit of a sound mind." We would have "love" always to "abound in knowledge and in all judgment." Only let it "abound yet more and more." Let it not be chilled, damped, fettered. Let us guard against that frosty elevation of intellect, which seems to regard religion as an Alpine plant, the growth only of a cold climate. Let us not separate it from that exciting glow of love, in which we are quickened to a sense of our obligations, sustained under our daily trials, and are raised in our present privileges and prospective anticipations above the baneful influence of "the course" and spirit "of this world."

Constitutional causes must however be well considered—while insisting upon the strong influence of religion upon the affections. Intellectual character is not always embued with natural sensibilities; while on the other hand a sympathetic tone of character is easily excited. It is obvious that both these require larger measures of Divine influence—the one, that the man may enter into the delight of Christian feeling—the other, that natural tenderness may be braced up to firmness and stability: in both cases—that they may judge each other charitably. But "the love of God must be shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost," or we are not, we cannot be, Christians.

We would beg however shortly to advert to depreciation of scriptural privilege of a very different character. There are some who stand even upon lower ground than intellectual professors. They are satisfied with a small portion of spiritual enjoyment, and even that this modicum should be occasional, not constant. They have no conception of any internal religion answering to the wrestling vigilance, by which "the kingdom of heaven is taken by force." The warmth of first impressions subsides as a matter of course; not however into a matured and solid effectiveness, but into luke-warmness and inertion. If they be the children of God in a Laodicean state, they will probably be roused by sharp afflictions, to a zealous and penitent profession of their Master's name, and by this wise and loving dispensation, be quickened to hear the voice of their Lord, and introduced into the full enjoyment of communion with him. It is however evident, that every form of the indulgence of sloth, every allowance of unbelief, and the influence of obscure apprehension of the gospel, operate prejudicially to the interests of the church and of true religion. For thus religion is presented to the world in a false and unattractive garb. The standard of holiness is lowered in the defect of that enlivening sense of redeeming love, which conciliates, engages, and captivates the heart. Little is known of that support of the promises of God, which over-balances all difficulties, real and apparent, and adds more to the enjoyment of life, than suffering can take away. This evil will be generally traced, except in cases of moral delinquency or constitutional weakness, to the secret root of self-righteousness. The simplicity of faith in the contemplation of its great object is obscured by an undue and unevangelical dependence upon evidences. These, though they have their legitimate use as the confirmation of our hope, must have no connexion with its foundation. When the perception of clear evidence is deficient (as in times of temptation especially is often the case), faith, leaning upon his ever-changing support, becomes uncertain, unsettled, and unfruitful. Whereas under the darkest destitution of internal sources of comfort, the offer, invitation, encouragement, and promise of the gospel, addressed to sinners is an unfailing and sufficient warrant, such as nothing in ourselves can make more complete. Let then faith be distinctly and explicitly exercised. Let clear apprehensions of the ground of comfort be diligently sought. Let the testimony of the word, not the feelings of our heart, be the foundation of our hope. Let Christ be regarded as the only fountain of life, light and consolation. Thus will "Grace and peace be multiplied unto us through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord."

We close this section with giving at some length, and with interesting variety of illustration, Miss Graham's sentiments upon Conformity to the World; a subject of vital moment to the integrity, consistency, and fruitfulness of the Christian profession.

The first letter commences with a few remarks, not immediately relevant to the subject, but which will be read with interest.

Stoke, Feb. 21, 1827.

'It seems to me that all the Lord's dealings with his redeemed children speak this language—"Cease ye from man." Put not your trust in any earthly comforter. Lean not on any arm but the arm of your Beloved. "For the hearts of the people" of this world "are full of idols." Self is the great idol, that is loved and honoured more than God. Then comes a multitude of lesser things, all subservient to this one; and if some little corner in the heart is reserved for God, or if the shadow of a throne is set up, where he may sit on solemn occasions, at the pleasure of the great idol, then they think all is going on well; and God loved as much as he could reasonably expect to be loved by creatures who have such a press of business on their hands. But, my beloved friend, we may not do so. God has purchased us for his own inheritance, will have our whole heart and our whole dependence; and though we must rejoice in the friends he gives us, yet we must not think we cannot do without them; or that we should go on better, if we had more of their help. Christ is all-sufficient, and teaches, comforts, and reproves in his own time and way, and by his own means, without any need of our direction. In looking back to every event of my life, since I have known something of the grace of God, I find that there never has been any thing on which I very much depended, but God has straightway removed or embittered that thing, or in some way made it useless to me, till I returned to place my whole dependence on him. But let us not accuse our dearest Lord of acting unkindly towards us in sending these disappointments; for he only takes away other helps and props, to make room for himself. He loves us too well to suffer any rival in our affections.

'I have read your letter over and over, and scarcely know how to answer it, or what to make of it. O that you had some better counseller than I! for I know not how to advise you. I fear lest you should think me strict and gloomy, if I tell you all I think; but I will tell you, since you desire it; and I know that God is able and willing too to give you joys so much superior to every worldly amusement, that you will wonder you could ever think them worth a thought. I must say then, that the world and worldly amusements, appear to me quite inconsistent with the character of a real Christian; and that we never can enjoy happy converse with God till we give them up. The Christian is described in the Scriptures, as "the temple of the living God." Now where the holy God takes up his abode, surely that heart must be sanctified and set apart from every common use, wholly devoted to his service. But can God and the world reign in the same heart, or as it were reign by turns? Shall we admit the Lord of glory in the morning, and shut him out in the evening, while we are going to a ball or a play? for we may be well assured he will not go with us there. The spirit of the world, which reigns in such places, is quite opposite to his Spirit; and "the friendship of the world," which is there sought, "is enmity with God." I know this would be called uncharitable; but I do not wish to be more charitable than the Bible: and surely experience proves it to be true; for go into any fashionable assembly whatever, and there begin to speak of those things of which we ought to talk, "when we are sitting in the house, and when we walk by the way, and when we lie down, and when we rise up;" and see if politeness itself can suppress a smile at your strange and unwarrantable impertinence, in forcing the attention of the company to subjects, which they are met for the very purpose of forgetting.

No, my dear friend, that cannot be a proper place for a Christian, where religion is the thing that must not be named; and where even something in our hearts will tell us, that such subjects are out of place. Neither can you say, your own heart may be as well employed there as elsewhere; for the very sweetest meditation on heavenly things (if we could thus meditate in the midst of vanity) would be spoiled by the thought, that there were none who enjoyed like communion with ourselves; and we should soon have to "seek with Joseph a place to weep in," to weep over our companions and friends, who are thus "feeding on ashes," delighting themselves in things which cannot profit. The fact is, when Christians are at a place of worldly amusement (if Christians are to be found who will venture themselves so unguardedly into Satan's strong places,) they must either have heavenly thoughts (and then the amusement would appear so vapid, disgusting, and uninteresting, that they would never be able to stay it out:) or else, if the amusement is an amusement to them, it fills their hearts with a crowd of vain thoughts, shuts out Christ, and lets in self and the world, and so prepares room for doubts, and fears, and much bitter repentance, before the Spirit will again shine upon a heart which has so wantonly despised his grace.

But many will say—'All this may take place if we stay at home;' our worldly hearts may let in many intruders there; and we may be compelled to own, that we should have been as well at any place of public resort, as in our own room, with no one to talk to but our own heart. This, I confess, is our shame and misery, that we are so often entangled in vain and worldly thoughts. But surely it does but make the argument stronger against indulging in any thing which tends to foment such thoughts. If we are so weak, why go into temptation, against which the strongest have not been able to stand! We may fall into a worldly frame of mind in the absence of any worldly pleasures; but, because we have got a cruel enemy within, shall we go and expose ourselves to the attacks of the enemy without? Let us at least have the comfort of not having gone in quest of our misery. Temptations enough will come to us; let us not go to them. Besides it seems to me but mocking our Father which is in heaven, to say one hour—"Lead us not into temptation"—when we have coolly made up our mind to rush into it the next. From the evil of such a temptation, can we hope that he will deliver us! Let me draw your attention to the sweet precept of our Lord—"Let your loins be girded about, and your lights burning; and ye yourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding; that when he cometh and knocketh, they may open to him immediately!" Now, dear ——, I am sure you would not choose, that your Lord should come for you, while engaged in worldly amusements; nor would you feel, that he found you watching; nor would you be ready to "open immediately;" but would rather ask time to collect your scattered thoughts, and trim your wasted lamp. If we were to ask the blessed in heaven, or the tormented in hell, what they think of such employments, would not the one smile with pity at the question, and the other exclaim with rage—'O that I had but one of those hours you are thus throwing away! You should see whether I would let the precious moments pass in such vanities as these!' Forgive me, if I have said too much. Indeed I should tremble for you, going into such a difficult situation, if I did not know, that God can take as much care of you there, as in a more retired place.

'I do earnestly desire, that the blessing of a single eye and undivided heart may be yours. There is no comfort in being an undecided Christian; and Christ himself has declared that such a character is hateful to him. But this will not be the case with you: He who has helped you thus far, will go on leading you by the hand, till he has brought you to glory. You ask me—'How we are to wean our hearts from the world?' I know no other answer, but that which the Scripture gives. A believing view of Jesus must make the world look dark and insignificant: and whenever we begin to love it too much, we have only to apply to him, who has said to us—"Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world;" and his mighty power shall be put forth to enable us to overcome it also. I used to make many resolutions against a worldly spirit, and try many ways to break myself of it; and these resolutions were repeatedly broken; but now I have but one way; I try to take my heart to Jesus, believing that the victory is already mine for his sake. 'Lord, thou hast promised that "sin shall not have dominion over me." Thou hast said, that every one that is "born of thee overcometh the world." Fulfil thy gracious promise, and make me "more than conqueror" in thy might! Thou hast "given thyself for my sins, that thou mightest deliver me from this present world;" and wilt thou now leave me to be taken captive by this evil world? O dear ——, the faithful God must become like unto lying, promise-breaking man, before he can refuse to help his servants, who thus cast themselves on his word of promise; and disclaim all wisdom, strength, and goodness but his. The world and the things of the world, as "a strong man armed, who keepeth his goods in peace," must continue to have possession of our hearts, till Christ, who is "stronger than" the world, break in, and claims the house of the strong man, as a mansion for his Spirit to dwell in. Cast yourself then without fear upon the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus. The more worldly and wicked you feel yourself to be, the more he is concerned to show his power and faithfulness in saying you from your worldliness and wickedness.'

The next letter upon the same subject was written shortly afterwards to another correspondent, whom she regarded with the most lively affection, as having been made instrumental in communicating to her soul the knowledge and love of her Saviour.

March 22, 1827.

'You must, I think, have misunderstood my meaning about worldly company and amusements. Let us but have a right motive for doing so, and I think we may safely go into any company whatever. The word of God affords us two valuable rules for all our actions, and if we could set them always before our eyes, I believe we should seldom be at a loss as to the conduct we ought to pursue. "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God. And—whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God and the Father by him." Let us then always ask ourselves, before we set about any study, or employment, or enter into any company—'Am I doing this "to the glory of God?" Is it my sole, or at least my principal motive? Can I "do it in the name of the Lord Jesus?" Can I boldly say—it is such an action as he would approve of? And can I look up to him all the time I am doing it, for his sanction and blessing!' If you can answer this question satisfactorily, the action, whatever it be, must be right; and there can be no danger attending the performance of it. If, on the contrary, your mind recoils from even asking such a question, be assured there is something wrong in it, and that you would do well to give it up. It is a hard lesson to our carnal hearts, but one which the love of Jesus can make easy to us; that from the moment we take refuge at the cross of Jesus, and are "washed from our sins in his blood—from that happy moment we are "no longer our own," and must make it our one business to "glorify God in our body and spirit, which are God's." This seems to me the great and marked distinction between the Christian and the worldling. The one lives to himself; the other "to him who died for him and rose again." The one consults his own pleasure, ease, and safety, "leans to his own understanding," and seeks his own glory. The other prays that his will may be quite swallowed up in the will of Jesus, "ceases from his own wisdom," and makes "Christ his wisdom." He no longer "receives the honour which cometh of man;" but desires that Christ, the Author of all his good things, may have all the glory of them. His fleshy nature, or—as St. Paul calls it, the old man—strives hard against this, and would lead him to please and honour himself again; and this is the great conflict between the flesh and the spirit, which makes the Christian life so truly called a warfare. This conflict has already begun in you, my dearest friend, and will never cease, till death takes you from sense and self, to where you shall see Jesus as he is, and wonder that you could ever prefer any thing to him. No wonder you find it a hard and strange conflict. Parting with self-seeking, self-honouring and self-righteousness, is far more painful, than cutting off a right hand, or plucking out a right eye. "With man indeed this is impossible; but with" Jesus "all things are possible." Taking this consideration with us then, that Christ—not self—is to be the end of all our actions, and that "whether we eat, or drink," or speak, or go in or out, or are alone or in company, engaged in study or recreation, we must "do all to the glory of God," and "in the name of the Lord Jesus"—I think it will give us a very different view of our duty as to worldly company and employments, from any that worldly wisdom or policy can give us.

It cannot be, however, for the glory of God, that we should show ourselves morose and unsociable. The friends and relations we have are his gifts, and therefore must not be despised or neglected. Besides, we ought to bear in mind, that the redeemed of Christ are "the salt of the earth," "a peculiar people," created anew in Christ Jesus for the very purpose of "showing forth his praises;" and how can we do this, if we shut ourselves out altogether from the world? It is false humility, which makes us say—'I can never do any good,'—for the meaner the instrument, the more is the glory of God displayed in doing good with it; and as it is all God's doing and not ours, we have no reason to be proud of it, but rather to be abased at the sight of our own unfitness. I own to you, that I consider it the greatest blessing to a worldly family to have but one Christian among them (though I know they think it a sad interruption;) for who can tell but God may hear the prayers and tears of that one, and make him or her the messenger of peace to the rest? Thus far then, I think it must be right to go into worldly company, in the discharge of relative duties not plainly inconsistent with the word of God; or to avail ourselves of any providential opportunities of Christian usefulness. Let us however be careful, that our own spiritual state is not affected by it; for we can never be required to enter into any thing to the hurt of our own souls. But on the other hand, my dear friend, I think, if we really love Christ, this occasional mixing with worldly company will be rather a sacrifice than a pleasure to us. For think, what it is to go amongst worldly people "in the name of the Lord Jesus," and "to the glory of our God." Even if we do not feel ourselves called on to speak to them directly on the subject; still, if we keep this aim in view, in how many little things must we show that our sentiments are opposite to theirs! and if they know that we profess religion, we may be almost sure, that they view us with secret dislike and contempt; for "the carnal heart is" and always will be "enmity against God" and his people. I have seldom been into worldly company, without feeling either very uncomfortable all the time I was in it, or very unhappy as soon as I came out of it; for if God enabled me to keep his glory in view, the sight of so many souls perishing in a vain confidence of their own safety; the sense of my inability to speak properly to them; the consciousness that in many cases at least they would gladly have dispensed with my company, all these things could not but make me uncomfortable—not unhappy; because, supposing that I was in the clear path of duty—in the midst of vain company and sad reflections, I could still hold communion with Jesus. But when I lost sight of this great end, O dear ——, I wish I could point to you the anguish I have endured, that you might avoid dishonouring your Saviour as I have done! Very, very often this has been my wretched case:—'What will people think of me, if I set up to be so much better than others?' This ensnaring question has often made me put on a levity of sentiment and manner, which I did not at first feel, but which, persisted in, has become real; and I have been in heart as well as in appearance, the worldliest of the worldly. And when even I have returned home, God has often seen fit to visit this sin, by leaving me still to backslide in heart, and to be "filled with my own ways;" and when I have come to myself, (for he has never quite left me, nor ever will,) how can I describe the bitterness of thinking, that I had done dishonour to the cause of my only friend, lost the sweet sense of his redeeming love, missed many opportunities of saying a word which he might have blessed, and by my light and foolish conduct given occasion to the world to think, that religion was a thing in word only, not in power!

'I have told you my experience; but I believe it is more or less what every Christian feels; only few have been so very guilty in this respect as I have. Even now, though I know, that all these sins are washed away in my Redeemer's blood, I cannot reflect without the deepest self-abhorrence on the vain and foolish conduct I often indulged in at ——, particularly the sin of evil speaking, which I gave way to there more than any where. I might add that of sabbath-breaking. Do not think that I mean to lay it to their charge; O no, I only mean, that by going into the society of worldly people, if I may so say, without my armour on, I became as vain as they; and much more sinful; because I sinned against light and grace. Surely then, if we consider these drawbacks, worldly people will not be our chosen companions; and we shall go among them when we do, as a duty rather than a pleasure.

'With regard to the theatre, and amusements of this kind, Christians must have little to do, if they can find time for them. But if they could find time, I confess I am at a loss to see what business they can find there. Are not the sentiments usually uttered in such places quite in opposition to the precepts of God's word? Are not pride, vain glory, self-destruction, hatred, dissipation, unlawful attachments held up to our admiration in many theatrical compositions, considered as trivial faults in most of them, and detested upon right principles in none? You profess as a Christian to make Jesus your happiness. What can you find here to bring you into communion with him? You profess to make his glory your aim. Can you then sit with complacency, and hear a company of your fellow-creatures, with immortal souls, uttering sentiments which only tend to make them despise Christ and his ways? But I will leave the subject, dear ——, only adding, that I do not wish you to give up this amusement from what I say, but from the settled conviction of your own mind, after prayer for Divine teaching. If then you find, that you can neither "do it to the glory of God, or in the name of Jesus," I will not try to dissuade you from it. I was once induced to attend 'Matthews at Home,' and shall never forget the sensation I felt, when he told us how his father, who was a good kind of man, but too religious, had tried to keep him from coming on the stage. When I looked round, and saw the merriment expressed in every face, I could not help saying to myself, 'This is no place for me; there are no lovers of Christ here; for "charity rejoiceth not in iniquity," as these poor deluded people are doing.'

'And now, my dearest friend, I have proposed many privations to you; and what have I to offer you in return? Nothing but the love of Jesus; nay, that is yours already; for if you are enabled to give these things up, it will be—not that he may love you, but because he has loved you. The blessed spirits above want nothing else to make them happy; and we soon hope to taste their happiness; but if it cannot make us happy here, then heaven itself would not make us happy. O let us pray for this love. Let us cast off the spirit of bondage, and not come to God as slaves who must serve him; but as his redeemed children, who love to serve him, and who find his "service perfect freedom." Let us pray that more of "the love of God may be shed abroad in our hearts." Let us beseech the Holy Ghost to "take of the things of Jesus, and show them to us." Let us study all the sweet relations, in which he has revealed himself to us in the Scriptures, Father, brother, friend, husband, lover. Here is perpetual and rational study for us; and the more we follow it, the sweeter we shall find it. It is but a little ray of this love that as yet has warmed my heart; yet I can tell you, dearest and most beloved friend, that it is worth renouncing ten thousand worlds for. The Lord Jesus has sometimes drawn near to me with such unspeakable sweetness, that I have thought all the lovely relations of life, father, husband, friend, had no beauty in them, except as they served to shadow forth the immense love of our reconciled God in Him, and the near and intimate communion to which he admits his chosen and redeemed people. O my friend, he has chosen you! What a wonder of love is here! He has redeemed you, at the price of his own precious blood, "from this evil world." Will you linger in it any longer? God forbid! May the Spirit of God "fill you with such peace and joy in believing," as may make the world and the things of it appear to you in their true light! Remember, this is not your home. We are "strangers and pilgrims" here. Let not the world see, that the joys of the love of Christ, and communion with him, are not enough to occupy us, without having recourse to the many vain and trifling ways they have invented of killing time, and driving eternity out of their thoughts. If we want strength, there is fulness of strength and grace treasured up for us in Jesus; and we have only to seek it by earnest prayer. I wish you would pray for more experience of his love to you. This would convince you more than all the arguments in the world of the vanity of every thing, which can tend to divert your mind from him. In seeking his love may you be able to say with Jacob—"I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." I shall look for your next very anxiously. Do not let the words 'affected,' 'precise,' 'hypocrite,' 'enthusiast,' 'fool,' 'madman,' and many other epithets, which perhaps you will hear lavished upon the followers of the Lamb, discourage you from making his cause and people your own. I cannot but remind you—that "all who will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution." Not perhaps open persecution now, but ridicule, dislike, sneering, either open or secret must be your lot, if you determine to "be not conformed to this world." We must not think it hard, or be angry or disheartened, if these things come upon us; for our Master was "a scorn and a derision to all around him."

'Do not cease to love me, and think of me always, dearest ——, as your most affectionately and entirely attached.

'P. S. I earnestly join in your wish, that this may be the commencement of a new and blessed period of your life. May every future year see us walking more closely and more humbly with God.'

In a third letter to her cousin about a month subsequent, she again reverts to her Scriptural Rules.

April 20, 1827.

'I feel exceedingly at a loss, my dear friend, how to answer your interesting question—"What is the meaning of giving up the world?" For I do not consider, that giving up the world consists in renouncing its amusements, its company, its pursuits, so much as in putting off its temper and spirit, that we may put on the spirit and temper that was in Christ Jesus. When the spirit of the world is thus exchanged for the spirit of Christ, the amusements and gaieties of the world, must (not perhaps all at once, but gradually and surely) come to be extremely vain and unsatisfying in our opinion. For though the word "communion with God" is considered as the mere creation of an enthusiastic imagination, yet if we will allow the Scriptures to be true, we must allow that there is such a thing as "holding fellowship with the Father and the Son," as "walking with God" day by day "in perfect peace," as "having Christ living in us," and "his Holy Spirit abiding in us;" for by this, and by this only can we know that we are in Christ, even by his Spirit which abideth in us. Now let us suppose a person enjoying —not the flights of a false and self-seeking devotion—but real, sober, scriptural converse with God, and that daily; must not this be a happiness superior to any the world can give? See what David thought of it—"As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: Thou, O Lord God, art the thing that I long for. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth I desire besides thee. My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times. In God is my salvation and my glory; the rock of my strength, and my refuge is in God. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips, when I remember thee," &c. &c. And so in a thousand songs of love has David left on record what he thought of "communion with God." What must have been Job's view of the subject, when he said—"My friends scorn me, but mine eye poureth out tears unto God. O that I knew where I might find him! that I might come even to his seat! I would order my cause before him, and fill my mouth with arguments!"—Isaiah's—when he said, "O Lord, the desire of our soul is unto thy name, and to the remembrance of thee! With my soul have I desired thee in the night; yea, with my spirit within me will I seek thee early!" But I need not multiply proofs of what seems to need no proof—that communion with his Creator is the best, and noblest, and happiest thing of which a creature is capable. Then will not they who enjoy this communion, very carefully avoid whatever may tend to rob them of it? They will soon find that converse with the world (unless as far as duty or necessity lead them to it) is not compatible with converse with God: for if they conform to this world's habits and opinions, they deprive themselves of all scriptural claim to hope that God dwells in them, and they in him. But if on the contrary, they are "transformed in the spirit of their minds," they will soon find that the world will dislike or ridicule them. But until we are delivered from the spirit of the world, I cannot see how we can reasonably be expected to see any harm whatever in the customs of the world. Let the world that dwells and rules within be deposed, and the world without will soon lose its undue influence over us. But, dearest ——, let us "stick to" the Scriptures as our rule and standard in every thing, (thus our doubts upon every subject will be quickly satisfied); and let us study them with prayer, that he, "who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, would shine into our dark hearts, to give them the knowledge of the glory" of the gospel of God. We shall not ask in vain; for "God giveth wisdom liberally, and without upbraiding." May he give you that "wisdom which is from above;" since not all the wisdom of this world can find out God. There are in the sacred word two rules, which, if kept in view, might be a lamp to guide our feet in the darkest and most perplexing moments—"Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." "Whatever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Now in going to a ball, or a play, merely to indulge my own vanity, or gratify my own inclination, I could not say—I am "doing this to the glory of God"—I could not set about it "in the name of the Lord Jesus;" therefore as a Christian, I think I have no right to do it at all. But if any one could go to the glory of God, I cannot dispute their right to going. In visiting my friends, and spending a little intercourse in social converse with them, I have no feeling of this kind to draw me back; for God has given us our friends, and therefore requires us to be active in every social duty; and religion has done little for us, if it has taught us to be more morose and unsociable; for the very soul of religion is to live not to ourselves, but to others. Still I think as far as we can, we should choose our friends rather among the friends of God, than among the friends and followers of the world. You mention music;—so far from thinking it wrong in all cases, I think in my own, it is absolutely a religious duty to pursue music, as far as my health will permit; and I think the same with regard to you. But supposing we had no particular object in studying it, still I think that music, as affording a pleasing and innocent source of amusement to ourselves and others, cannot be considered wrong, though I should think it wrong to give more than a very moderate time to it, or to let it encroach upon any other duty. For a real Christian—to say the least of it—has so great a work in hand; so many really important and interesting objects daily solicit his attention, excite his energies, and set every faculty of soul and body to work; that he or she can have very little time to throw away upon mere amusements. I have given you my opinion as well as I can, bacause you asked me, not because I wish or expect you to be guided by it; for I am persuaded, that if you continue searching the Bible with earnest prayer, God himself will lead you into every good and pleasant way. I have known many religious people, who have not seen the necessity of separating themselves entirely from the world at first; but I never knew any one who did not see it at last. Let me then close this subject, dearest ——, by calling to your remembrance that encouraging invitation in Corinthians: "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty."

These letters will, we think, be admitted to discuss this important subject with much Christian wisdom and spirituality. Here are no harsh sweeping denunciations, but a plain reference to the rules of Christ; to the general principles, taste, and spirit of the gospel; and to the test of conscience and experience. Two particulars are worthy of special remark—her principle, and her rules.

Her principle is the superior attractiveness of the gospel, as the only effectual opposition to a worldly spirit—'A believing view of Christ'—as she justly observed—'must make the world look dark and insignificant.' The merchantman would never have suffered his "goodly pearls" to be snatched from him; but the first sight of "the pearl of great price" was sufficient inducement to him gladly to relinquish them. The apostle would never have yielded up his good name in the church with all his other sources of gain to the persuasive power of argument. But "the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord" once manifested to his soul, made what before was his all, now "loss"—yea—"dung" in his sight. Thus in every case, simple faith is the principle of Christian decision.

It is often a ground of self-delusive complaint—'If we were less entangled with the world, we should reach to far higher attainments in the excellency of this heavenly knowledge.' This is doubtless a truth. Yet the converse is perhaps the most accurate and important statement. It is because we know so little of Christ, that we are so much entangled with the world. Here we have the radical principle of the evil laid open. General and superficial views of our glorious Saviour offer but a feeble resistance to the mighty, subtle, and incessant operation of a worldly spirit. Deep, self-abasing, and spiritual apprehensions of the gospel must be perseveringly sought for, and maintained in constant exercise under Divine teaching and grace. To the heart thus attracted to Christ by the active contemplation of faith—the world in its most alluring forms, will ever be a crucified object, an object of shame and revulsion. And if this heavenly contemplation be followed out in all his relations to us of infinite tenderness and love, how will it cover us with shame, that a moment should ever have been found for any other object of paramount desire, affection, and interest! We must however carry this powerful principle of faith into all the particulars of practical application. We must not forget the supreme authority of the Scriptural commands for non-conformity to the world; nor must we refrain from rebuking whatever appears to us in detail, to be inconsistent with these commands. But except our remonstrances are grounded upon the full and clear principles of the gospel, we shall—instead of "laying the axe to the root of the tree"—only prune the branches for more luxuriant fruitfulness. The worldly taste may be restrained—but not subjugated; and the heart, if it be even partially drawn from the world, will be turned to self-righteousness, not to Christ.

As to Miss Graham's rules, it is a vain attempt to fix precise limits to every particular act. Yet the Scriptural rules which she has adduced, may be brought to bear upon every difficulty; and if the application of them will not make us infallibly right, it will at least preserve us from being materially wrong. The force of relative obligation as an ordinance of God is in clear conformity with these rules, and as such is strongly inculcated by Miss Graham; while at the same time it is never made an excuse for overstepping the line of demarcation, and always placed in connection with faithfulness and decision of conduct. The point of worldly conformity commences, and the habit of it is strengthened, in the neglect of Christian simplicity of profession. Either these rules are not spiritually apprehended, or they are not conscientiously regarded, or there is a want of intelligent capacity to apply them. Many young inquirers of unformed habits and unexercised profession have lost their slight impressions of religion in an unguarded association with the world. And how many more established professors have by unspiritual habits become unconsciously conformed to the taste, maxims, or society of the world, even while they have "escaped its" external "pollutions." We would earnestly recommend the application of these rules to every step and point of contact with the world. Let them be the test for the daily "trial of our spirit." Let us cultivate that tender susceptibility of conscience, which impressed this devoted child of God with poignant sorrow and humiliation in a single instance of overstepping the boundary, or neglecting the rule, of her Christian profession. We are persuaded that this habit of mind diligently cherished, would issue in the conviction, that the points of necessary or hopeful intercourse with the world, are not so frequent as were imagined; that the rational pleasure of its society ill compensates for the painful loss that is felt in the secret retirement; that positive evil belongs to unnecessary communication with it; and that increasing circumspection is needed even in the path of duty. The responsibility of maintaining our profession will be more deeply felt; and a path of retreat sought for, where that profession seems to be impracticable. We shall walk not by expediency, but by rule. Self-indulgence will yield to the dictates of conscience, and double-mindedness to the simplicity of the gospel. "The eye being thus single, the whole body will be full of light." Religion will assume a different caste. It will be marked by a holy and heavenly stamp. It will be—not a system of restraints—but a religion of privilege—the strictness of its rules wholly divested of moroseness, and forming an effectual safeguard of its consistency and fruitfulness. Thus God will be seen in his true character, as "having pleasure in the prosperity of his servant," who needs not to be beholden to the world for that happiness, which it promises to its votaries in substance, but gives only in shadow and delusion.

The length and seriousness of this important discussion may be happily relieved by a sprightly effort of Miss Graham's imagination, bearing immediately upon our subject. It was written impromptu in her friend's manuscript book. The picture was probably suggested by her residence on the sea-side.

February, 1830.

"Thy people shall be my people."—Ruth i. 16. 'I have sometimes thought, that the Christian, who willingly casts his lot amongst those to whom the doctrine of the cross is foolishness, and sits down in the world as if he were of the world, is like the foolish little bird that should build its nest in the mast of some tall ship. At first it seems a place of security and peace; but soon the vessel looses from its anchor, and the little songster is borne away it knows not whither. The trees and flowery hedges, and bright sunny meadows, are fast going out of sight. Fain would the poor bird spread its wings and regain them: but how can it leave its nestlings, its treasures, which it has confided to that strange and troubled dwelling! No, no; its all is launched into the deep; and with anxious constant care it must hover round the dear nest, and seek for strange and scanty food for its young. And at first the vessel may glide smoothly on, while the wind gently plays with its sails, and the sun lights them up to a snowy whiteness, and the gilded waves break in sparkles round the stately prow. Then the little visitant pours forth its sweet song, and gladdens the sailor's heart by the fond tale it tells him of happiness and home. Yet all the while it is only lamenting its desolation, and pining after the pleasant haunts in the green wood, and the dear companions, by whom its notes were answered from bush to bush, till the very boughs waved in joy to their merry strains. But O! poor bird, if a storm arise, how wilt thou flutter round thy nestlings, and tremble lest they should be swept away by the pitiless waves, or chilled into death by the piercing winds! Yes, little trembler, thou hast placed thyself and thine offspring in a perilous situation; nor is it thou that canst save them, but thy Father and ours, without whom not so much as a sparrow falleth to the ground. He it was that took care of thee, when thou wast safely lodged in thine own leafy branches; and he can take care of thee now, can teach the rude sailor to respect thy helplessness, and hush the stormy winds, that they ruffle not a feather of thy wing. And thus, Christian, if thou hast wilfully withdrawn thyself from the shadow of that tree, which spreads forth its branches for all the fowls of heaven to dwell in; if thou hast made thee a home away from the Lord's people; many a bitter hour of loneliness and desolation shalt thou have, while thou art "singing the Lord's song, in a strange land. Thou shalt rue thy folly, and be humbled for it. Yet be not utterly cast down, but still trust in thy God, who will not fail to rebuke and chasten, but will never leave thee nor forsake thee.'

4. Her sentiments upon miscellaneous subjects.

We now conclude this long series of quotation, with some extracts of a more miscellaneous character.

It is delightful to observe all her views of science, extensive and accurate as they were, to have been received and enjoyed through a heavenly medium. Whichever way she looked in this wide expanse, her eye was transfixed in the contemplation of the unsearchable mysteries of redeeming love. We may instance the following sketch of Christian Astronomy—extracted from her manuscript. Speaking of the withering influence of Mathematics upon the pleasures of the imagination, and having (as we have already seen) suggested the study of classical literature, as furnishing some antidote for this evil, she further adds on this point:

'It is scarcely possible to pursue mathematics to any extent, without being led by them into some of those sciences, of which they form the vestibule. Astronomy, for instance, presents a field for the largest and noblest exercises of the imagination. The stars, 'the poetry of heaven,' afford not only perpetual employment for the reason, but unbounded scope to the fancy. The objects of astronomical study display a sublimity, which exalts the imagination; a mystery which humbles the intellect, a wisdom which enlarges every faculty of the soul, and a loveliness which soothes every feeling of the heart. They have, like their Divine Author, "heights, depths, and breadths"—unfathomable—inscrutable. Here we may soar, as upon the wings of angelic intelligence. Here we may expatiate, till our minds are lost in infinity. But with what unutterable astonishment does the Christian astronomer gaze upon the innumerable host! He is conscious that God is all around him. His mind is possessed by one idea—the presence, the immense, the all-pervading presence of the God who made and upholds all these. For an instant he forgets his own littleness, and becomes vast as the objects of his contemplation; for there are moments when the human soul seems to expand into something of its original grandeur. But the humbling consciousness returns, as soon as his full heart will give him leave to think, and he shrinks into insignificance. It is nothing to be the least, the meanest of the creatures of God. But to be a fallen-creature—this bows him to the dust. Sin has made him an outcast from the beautiful creation, an alien from the creating God. An holy God is on every side; and he is not holy.

'But yet his thilling awe is cheered with joy, hope, and love. "The day-star arises in his heart;" and now every other star has a voice, "a still small voice; and tells a tale of love, which the angels delight to hear: a mystery, "which the angels desire to look into."

'He who made us is "the God of thy salvation." He is "thy Beloved and thy Friend." Thus hath the God who made the heavens, who ordained the moon and the stars, been mindful of man, visited him in his low estate, and "crowned him with glory and honour." '

"Praise him, ye heavens of heavens. Praise him, all ye stars of light." Christians! you can "sing praises with understanding." All ye that love the Lord, praise the name of the Lord. "Praise the Lord, O my soul."

While this sublime science has been perverted (as in the French school of philosophy) for man's contemptuous rejection of his Maker, it is most refreshing to observe the magnificent illustrations, by which "the heavens," viewed through the medium of Christian philosophy, "declare the glory of God." In this field of elevated contemplation the eye of faith "leads us up from nature," not only "to nature's God," but to the Christian's God—the God of his salvation. Here we discover what the "eye" of reason "has not seen, nor hath ear heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man," untaught by God. If, as our poet of the Night has decided, 'an undevout astronomer is mad,' even the devout man of science is not in the full possession of his faculties, nor in the enjoyment of the clear perception of the objects of his delighted observation, except he has been instructed in the higher school of Divine science, and enabled to trace in the Maker of the starry frame his God and Saviour—his faithful, unchangeable, Almighty friend.

We pass to another field of science of more general interest. Miss Graham's Musical Tract, already referred to, will, it is believed, be found to give an accurate sketch of the principles of its own department of the science. Its style is buoyant with life, beauty, and power. It occasionally mounts almost to the magnificent prose of John Milton or Jeremy Taylor. Take the following as a specimen:

Speaking to her young pupil of the importance of practising, she sends her to the woods and groves for a stimulating example of industry.

'I can tell you that the little musicians of the grove do not attain their wild and delicate modulations without practice. When I lay in bed last summer, unable to speak or move for many hours in the day, the song of the birds furnished me with an inexhaustible source of amusing observation. I could not but feel grateful to the melodious little creatures, who beguiled me of half my pain, and made the weary hours of sickness fly away upon wings as light as their own. As if led by an instinctive sympathy, numbers of blackbirds and thrushes came to build their nests round our garden; and the woodpigeons, which had been silent the year before, renewed their soft notes in the high trees by the parsonage lawn. However, they were shy, and I thought myself fortunate, if once or twice in the day their gentle cooing found its way to my ear. But there was one thrush, whose notes I soon learned to distinguish from all the other thrushes; indeed his skill seemed to exceed theirs as much as Cordoba's* exceeds yours or mine. Every morning I listened for his voice, which was sure to precede the matins of all the other birds. In the day time, his brilliant tones were mingled and almost lost in the general melody; but as soon as the sun was preparing to set, when the blackbirds had either sung themselves to sleep, or were flown off to keep up their festivities elsewhere, then was my thrush's practising time. He was kind enough to select a tree not far from my window, while the other thrushes placed themselves at a respectful distance, and edged in a note here and there as they could. He opened the rehearsal with a number of wild trills and calls, which I could not well understand; only they were very sweet and cheering to me; and he would pause between each, till a soft response was heard from some distant bough. But when he had fixed upon a little cadence which pleased him, it became a more serious business. Strange to say, I could always tell when this would be; for what pleased me particularly was sure to please him; so true is it that nature has given the same perception of melody to man and to birds. He would chant it over in a low tone two or three times, as if to make himself sure of it; then he carolled it out with triumphant glee; then stopped short on a sudden, as much as to say to his rivals—'Which of you can imitate my strains?' Their notes sounded most sweet at various distances during these little intervals; but they seemed conscious of their inferiority to my favourite, who would suddenly break out into the very same melody, upon which he had doubtless been musing all the while, enriching it by some little note or trill, the wildest and most touching that ever came into a thrush's heart. I needed neither concert nor music-master, while I could listen to the untaught, but not unpremeditated, harmony of this original professor; nor could I quarrel with the sickness which had been the means of developing another link in that mysterious chain, which binds me to the rest of creation, by opening my ear and my heart more than ever to the language of universal nature. But I often wished to have you with me, that you might hear how much pains the birds are at to charm us with their warbling. It is pretty also to hear the young birds commence their small and faultering strains, which grow clearer and louder, till they are no longer to be distinguished from the rest. True, it is their profession, and we have many other things to think of; but what time we do give to the study of music, we should give it with our hearts, as they do.'

For effective playing she gives the following sensible rules, interspersing them with her own happy illustrations:

'I have told you that to play a piece effectively you must comprehend it well. You must also feel it deeply. It is impossible to excite lively emotions in another's breast, while your own remains untouched. There are two rules, which may assist you to attain quick perceptions of what is correct and beautiful; and (with the help of the mechanical rules I have given you) to bring those perceptions out in your own performance. The first is, to cultivate a constant habit of listening to natural sounds. Every thing in nature has a melody which goes to the heart, and from which we may gain some new and delightful ideas. I have called your attention to the song of birds. Then there is the bleating of flocks, and the lowing of distant herds, and the busy hum of insects. Above all, the modulations of the human voice afford us a perpetual source of observation. From thence we may gather the expression of every stormy passion which agitates, and every tender affection which sooths the heart. Nor can we listen to the fairy tones of children, their light-hearted carols, their bursts of tiny merriment, their mimic griefs, and simply told stories, without imbibing some new and charming combinations of harmonious expression. If music brings no lovely thoughts and associations to your mind, you are learning it to very little purpose. If it does, an intimate acquaintance with the music of nature will invest the expression of those thoughts with a grace and refinement, which the most persevering practice will fail to impart. Take lessons of the winds and of the waters, and of the trees; of all animate and inanimate nature. So shall the very spirit of sweet sound and expression enter into your bosom, and lie there, ready to pour itself forth upon the otherwise low and mechanical music, which the pressure of your hands produces on the instrument. One of Handel's finest pieces is said to have been suggested by the labour of a blacksmith at his anvil; so successfully did he watch for the harmony, that lies wrapped up in the commonest sounds.

'The next rule I shall give you, is to listen attentively to skilful performers; noticing particularly what emotions are excited in your mind by every passage; and by what means they contrive to produce the effect which pleases you. The gratification we derive from listening to music, is similar to that which poetry imparts to us. Both these delightful arts call into being a thousand beautiful imaginations, tender feelings, and passionate impulses. But in reading poetry, we are delighted with the thoughts of another person; and though a beautiful idea will give us new pleasure every time we recur to it, still this pleasure is little varied, and depends on the conformation of the poet's mind, rather than of our own. The delights of music are of own creation. We become for the time poets ourselves, and enjoy the high privilege of inventing, combining, and diversifying, at pleasure, the images which harmonious sounds raise in our minds. The selfsame melody may be repeated a hundred times, and inspire each time a train of thought different from the last. Sometimes it will call forth all the hidden stores of memory—absent friends, voices long silent in the tomb, lovely scenes, pleasant walks, and happy hours, come back to us in all their freshness and reality. Then the future opens its dreary prospect, gilded by hope, and chastened by a mournful tenderness. The exile is restored in glad anticipation to his country; the prodigal sobs out his penitence on his father's bosom; the child of affliction is safely lodged in that mansion where sorrow and crying are unknown. Sometimes the past is forgotten, the future unheeded, the mind wrapped up in the present consciousness of sublimity or beauty. Forms of delicate loveliness, things such as dreams are made of, float before the mental vision, shaped into something of a walking distinctness. Thoughts too noble to last, high and holy resolves, gushings of tenderness, alternately possess our minds, with emotions all equally different, and equally delightful. The poetical inspiration of Alfieri seldom came upon him, but when he was under the influen-

* An eminent musical professor among the Spanish refugees, to whom she expresses herself indebted for much valuable instruction.

Haydn's symphonies were all composed so as to shadow forth some simple and affecting story, by which the author excited and varied his own feelings, and wrought them up to that pitch of solemn pathos, or animated gayety, which to this day inspires all who hear his music with corresponding emotions.'

The Christian tone and descriptive beauty of the concluding paragraphs will be generally admired. They are in the style of her favourite writer, Jeremy Taylor.

'The expression of sacred music comprehends every emotion that can agitate the human heart, and must be felt rather than described. The subdued tones of awful adoration; the impassioned fervour of desire; the humility of prayer; the wailing of penitential sorrow; the glad notes of thanksgiving; and the loud chorus of praise; all these have their own peculiar utterance, and must be pervaded by a depth and solemnity which shall distinguish them from the meaner affections of humanity.

'I am fearful of touching too lightly upon this hallowed subject. Many young persons, when their feelings are excited by sacred music, imagine themselves to be bettered by such feelings, and to be under the influence of genuine religious sentiments. But if the plain majesty of the word of God does not suffice to kindle an equal fervour within us, when we are reading it silently and alone; we may be sure that the emotions excited by the lovely songs and pleasant instruments of men are the mere ebullitions of natural feeling, and have nothing to do with religion. Those who would sing the praises of the Lord, must "sing them with understanding." The undying torch of truth must be lighted up in that faculty, before it can set the heart in a flame. There exists not a more dangerous delusion, than to mistake the feverish excitement of the imagination for the cheerful and steady glow of a rational devotion.

'But while I so anxiously guard you against this pernicious error, do not for a moment suppose, that I would shut you out from the privilege which all creation enjoys, of sounding its Maker's praise. Oh! there is a harmony in nature, inconceivably attuned to one glad purpose! Every thing in the universe has a voice, with which it joins in the tribute of thanksgiving. The whispers of the wind playing with the summer foliage, and its fitful moanings through the autumnal branches; the broken murmur of the stream, the louder gushing of the waterfall, and the wild roar of the cataract, all speak the praises of God to our hearts. Who can sit by the sea-side, when every wave lies hushed in adoration, or falls upon the shore in subdued and awful cadence, without drinking in unutterable thoughts of the majesty of God? The loud hosannas of Ocean in the storm, and the praises of God on the whirlwind, awaken us to the same lesson; and every peal of the thunder is an hallelujah to the Lord of Hosts. Oh! there is a harmony in nature! The voice of every creature tells us of the goodness of God. It comes to us in the song of the birds; the deep, delicious, tones in which the wood-dove breathes out its happiness; the gracefully melting descant of the nightingale; the joyous, thrilling melody of the lark; the throstle's wild warbling, and the blackbird's tender whistle; the soft piping of the bulfinch; the gay carol of the wren; the sprightly call of the goldfinch; and the gentle twittering of the swallow. Even now, when every other bird is silent, little robin is pouring out his sweetest of all sweet notes upon yonder rose-bush; and so distinctly does he thank God, who made the berries to grow for him upon the hawthorn and mountain-ash, and who has put it into the heart of man to love him, and strew crumbs for him when the berries fail, that my soul, too often insensible to its own mercies, is warmed into gratitude for his. The very insect tribe have entered into a covenant, that God shall at no season of the year be without a witness amongst them to his praise. For when the hum of the bees and the chirping of the grasshopper have ceased to enliven us, and the gnat has laid by his horn, then the little cricket wakens into life and song, and gladdens our hearth with the same story till the winter is past. And so all nature praises God, and is never weary. If then you are able "to make melody in your heart to the Lord," let your hand and your voice make melody too; and let the faculty which infinite benevolence has created for your enjoyment, be converted, as all your other faculties should be, into the instrument of praise. To know that you make this worthiest use of your musical acquirements will indeed rejoice the heart of your affectionate Friend and Cousin,

MARY.

The following exercise throws out some additional thoughts upon the connexion of poetry and music alluded to in her tract. It was written in the form of a letter to her cousin, for the Italian master then in attendance upon them. As she wrote Italian with considerable spirit, and took some pains with the composition, it may have slightly suffered in a translation.

1824.

'My dear Friend—Yesterday I was told of an observation you had made in the conversazione of Mr. B., (where unfortunately I could not meet you,) and as I do not agree with you upon the interesting subject then discussed, I will make it the subject of this letter, begging you to excuse all the dulness, which you will certainly find in my composition. Is it possible, that you have conceived so low an opinion of the pleasures derived from harmony, that they do not appear to you worthy of being compared with those of poetry? I cannot let you rest in this opinion. Allow me to impart to my friend some of the delight which I find in this enchanting art! Not that I wish to say a word against poetry—that purest and most sublime delight of the human mind. Too dear to me are its sweet illusions, in which the usual sense of the ills of the present life is lost, whilst the soul lives in a world properly her own, and sports with beings created and adorned by herself. My intention is only to show you that the pleasures derived from music are not inferior to those of poetry, that both proceed from the same source, and mutually assist and heighten each other. You will perhaps remind me of the great antiquity of poetry, and that from the most remote ages it has been the solace of the wounded heart. But this I cannot yield to you. Indeed it appears to me, that music had an earlier birth, and was the mother of poetry. A shepherd one day discovered the flute, which nature has formed in the waving reed. Applying it to his lips, he is struck with the beautiful sounds which issue from it, and he endeavours to imitate them with his voice, in simple songs celebrating the beauties of his shepherdess. By degrees the cadences of the harmony suggest to him the idea of rhyme and metre, and thus these two beautiful arts are formed together, with so perfect a sympathy between them, that the one cannot be outraged without the other also suffering. Let us however leave this discussion upon the origin of these arts, (for it would be tiresome for us to search into the records of past ages,) and turn our attention to what is more interesting, the effects which in every age they have produced on the heart. I wish to search a little into your motives for giving to poetry so vast a superiority; and the secret spring appears to me to be this. The charms of harmony cause a pleasure perceptible to the senses, and for its enjoyment require a certain physical conformation, a fine and exact ear, and other things, which seem to have a connection with the material part of man. You have therefore persuaded yourself, that it is a thing delightful indeed to the senses, but which has little influence upon the mind and upon the heart. I flatter myself that I shall be able to convince you of the injustice of this idea. Not only does music give us many ideas, but they are of the same description with those inspired by poetry, and sometimes even more delightful to the soul. I allow that the sweet harmony enters by the ear. But thence it diffuses itself through every part of the mind. It moves every passion, softens every affection, and creates a thousand delightful imaginations, a thousand divine projects, which excite to all that is noble in resolve, and worthy in art. If I might draw a distinction between music and poetry, I should say, that the former brings us pleasure of a higher degree; the latter of a longer duration. Equally do they inspire soft affections and noble ideas.' Then, after following the same train of thought and imagination as in her Musical Tract, she adds in her fervent glow—'And shall not a science, capable of producing these sentiments, be reckoned among the noblest delights of the human mind? I have not time to continue this interesting subject. But I cannot conclude without observing, that the poets themselves owe their finest ideas to music. Do you recollect the power which it had over the mind of our favourite Alfieri? He could scarcely compose without its help. Many of his noble tragedies were conceived at the Opera. But do thou, divine Petrarch, come to my help, and show her who admires thee so much, that without the music of nature, the song of birds, the murmur of the stream, thou wouldest not have been able to enchant her with thy delicious rhymes. With these beautiful verses I conclude my letter, already too long, entreating you to yield to his representation of the effect of fine sounds upon the mind.

'Se lamentar angelli, o verdi fronde,' &c.

'You know the rest. I have only time to say, that I am always

'MARY.'

Without pronouncing upon the contending claims, (which probably may still be a matter of dispute,) the exercise is not unworthy of the intellectual character of the writer, and is specially interesting, as a burst of that 'vehemence approaching to ecstacy,' which, as Mr. Cecil keenly observed—'the world will allow on almost every subject, but that which, above all others, will justify it.' If, however, Miss Graham seems here to contend for the precedence of music, she was no less warm a votary of poetry. Though she was no poet herself, and never till the close of her last illness did she exercise even a rhyming propensity, yet her perception of the true genius of the science was lively and accurate, and her enjoyment of its delights proportionate. We have already seen her high zest for Milton. Wordsworth was among her chief modern favourites; and even Lord Byron detained her for awhile the victim of his fascinating enchantment. We subjoin a letter of a very early date, descriptive of her feelings, with much discrimination of taste, and with all the glow of her characteristic enthusiasm.

July 15, 1822.

'I have not seen the Fourth Canto of Childe Harold. I am ashamed to say that I like Manfred. Diabolical as the sentiments of it are in many parts, yet there are some passages of such exquisite beauty and sublimity, that it seems as if a human pen could scarcely have traced them. All the time I was reading it, I felt I was doing something wrong, yet I read some of it over and over again, particularly the part where Manfred is upon the point of dashing himself over the precipice. The description of darkness did not please me. I thought it rather horrible than sublime. But I am just now in love with another poet, who is as fond of clothing his pictures with the sunny radiance of happiness and benevolence, as Lord Byron is of spreading over his darkness and desolation. If you have read any of his trifling poems, you will smile when I mention Wordsworth. But some of his poems are so beautiful! We have just now been reading the Excursion. It is tiresome in many parts. But every now and then you meet with something so strikingly fine, or so unutterably tender, that it is impossible to go on. You must lay down the book till the ferment it occasions has subsided.'

Should Miss Graham's delight in Lord Byron's writings be a matter of surprise, it may be observed, that her letter distinctly records the rebuke of conscience in her moments of self-indulgence; and we doubt not but her inattention to this rebuke subjected her to the secret frown of her jealous God. We may also add that shortly after the date of this letter, she readily made the sacrifice of her taste (which to her fervid mind required no ordinary effort) in the total relinquishment of this source of deleterious pleasure. Whatever weight may attach to her judgment will therefore decidedly be found on the side of self-denial, not of self-gratification. Indeed familiarity with works of poison, whatever be their literary charms, seems inconsistent, not only with Christian simplicity—but with a common regard to our personal welfare. To a pure mind we might have supposed that a rich and splendid fancy would be spoiled of all its attraction by its frequent connexion with licentious profaneness and impiety—moral deformities sufficient to cast the most exquisite beauties of power and genius into the shade; and the contemplation of which must be injurious to the best sensibilities of our nature. Even the instruction resulting from the unveiled features of human depravity is obtained—if at all—at considerable hazard. For let it be remembered—as Miss Graham has shown—that the direct influence of poetry plays upon the passions, and thus tends to produce a corresponding habit of the mind. The evil propensities therefore pourtrayed by this master-mind with such awful exactness, and embracing every form of malignity than can darken the heart of man, naturally excite the working of those passions, which it is the grand design of the gospel of Jesus Christ to restrain and mortify. Whether therefore the infidel poison acts with vindictive activity, or with searching subtlety, its pervading influence is equally to be dreaded. We believe that many Christians, especially in moments of temptation, are reaping the bitter fruit of former indulgence; and we are persuaded that none will ultimately have reason to regret the sacrifice of the high pleasures of taste to the far higher claims of their own spiritual interests.

We add one further quotation from Miss Graham's manuscript upon a subject not wholly unconnected with the preceding—works of imagination in a more legitimate, though still a questionable, form—Religious Novels. Observing, that 'the taste of the serious public is lamentably vitiated'—she adds,

'The press teems with religious novels, from the long eventful story to the ephemeral trifles which eke out the pages of the spruce magazine. The greater part of these are feeble to a degree that would render them harmless, were there not a large proportion of readers, whose sickly appetite hankers after such unwholesome food. A few of them, I own, stand out from the rest, and compel our admiration. Yet I must be permitted to say, that the very interest excited by these superior productions increases their bad tendency. How strange a medley of sensations agitates the heart, that is fluttering between the emotions excited by the well-pictured charms of religion, and the love-scene that is better pictured still! How shall the young and inexperienced distinguish between earthly and heavenly feelings! How shall they determine whether their agitation arises out of romance or religion; a heated imagination, or a heart warmed with divine love?

'I cannot conceive the use or propriety of introducing this kind of sentimental narrative into works professedly of a religious nature. Truth is not adorned but disguised, by being thus tricked out in false glitter and tinsel ornament. There are but two classes of readers; the converted, and the unconverted. Those of the former description would derive more benefit and pleasure too from praying over one verse of the Bible, than from reading a whole library of the above-mentioned performances. They will neither assist him to understand the word of truth himself, nor to explain it to others. It may be truly affirmed of the decided Christian, that for his own sake, the less he reads besides the Bible, the better. But for the sake of his fellow-men, his reading must be more extensive. He must seek to enlarge and confirm his general knowledge; must be prepared to meet inquiry, to cope with prejudice and error; to recommend the cause of religion; to "become," with the Apostle, "all things to all men." It is not, however, by giving his time to the works in question, that he will attain this desirable object. His mental character will only be deteriorated by their enervating influence. They will tend to impair both the inclination and capacity for solid intellectual exertion. It has been urged in their defence, that they will open to him a more extended view of human nature. But this will be much more effectually obtained by comparing the Scripture statement with his own daily experience and observation. Another argument in their favour is, that they afford an useful key to the character and manners of society. These, however, for the most part, are sketched with no very skilful hand. They might with greater accuracy and less expense of time, be collected from some of the master-pieces of authors not professedly religious. In short, considering that the Christian part of the community has so much to do, and so short a space to do it in, it must ever be matter of regret, that so large a proportion of their time and talent should be expended in making idlers and castle-builders.

But we turn our regard to the careless and gay. We are called upon to observe the effect of these publications upon their minds. We are reminded, that many young persons of lively imagination and warm feelings, who would scarcely look into a serious book, may be tempted to peruse these lighter works, and derive benefit from the perusal. I admit the first part of this proposition, but deny the conclusion that is drawn from it, except in a few, a very few instances, which are to be regarded rather as exceptions than as a general rule. Rare, however, as these instances are, they are by no means to be despised. They indicate that every narrative of this description must not be included in one sweeping condemnation, nor pronounced entirely useless, since the sovereign grace of God will occasionally use even them for its purpose. But they do not prove the necessity of sending forth such immense shoals of these productions, that one would think they were designed to supersede and swallow up every other. A few would answer the purpose just as well. Even while I concede thus much, I am inclined to ask—'Do you not in a measure create the taste, to which you profess only to accommodate yourselves? Will not this indisposition to all solid and valuable reading be exceedingly encouraged by your indulgent connivance?' I much doubt both the lawfulness and expediency of this mode of decoying people into religion. I fear that the quantity of good which flows from it is greatly overbalanced by the quantity of evil.

The religion inspired by such reading is of a doubtful nature. There is more of earth in it than of heaven. A young person, whose tears flow over a professed novel, is in no danger of mistaking the excitement of feeling for the fervour of devotion. Not so with these ambiguous compositions. Romance and Religion are so allied, that we may suppose the latter to be embraced, when in effect her presence is only tolerated for the sake of her fascinating companion. Dressed in the sober garb of truth, she will too probably be rejected by those who permitted her to court them under the bewitching veil of fiction. And is it for the sake of exciting this spurious devotion, that we run the hazard of destroying the correct and simple feeling of the rising generation, and encourage the prevalence of a style of writing which can never rise into genuine sublimity, nor fix itself upon a basis of native solidity and strength?'

This extract will be generally admitted to mark considerable power of writing and of thought. The subject demands much accuracy of discrimination to place it in its true light. To proscribe works of imagination in the mass would include a much wider sweep of condemnation than novels religious or irreligious. It would banish form our reading much that is not merely purely innocent, but intrinsically valuable; and seal up the fountain of much elegant and instructive literature. We might indeed adduce Dr. Chalmer's writings for the proof, that the corruption is in the application—not in the faculty—of the imagination, which was given, like every other faculty, for the service of God and of his church. But an infinitely higher authority meets us in the Divine parables of our Great Teacher, immediately acting upon this most valuable faculty for the illustration and enforcement of his important truths. And this example is the more to our purpose, as fixing the limit and direction, as well as legitimating the employment of fiction. The imagination is placed in immediate contact with plain and sober truth; while it derives its primary interest, not from its own representations, but from the truth which it was intended to exhibit.

With all these allowances, however, the general introduction of fiction into the cause of truth, is, as Miss Graham observes, of very doubtful benefit; or, even admitting the prospect of usefulness to be more determinate, it has proceeded very far beyond the necessity of the case. Minds formed for effective usefulness need to be conversant with the solidity of truth, not with the visionary atmosphere of fiction; while the indulgence of this artificial character fosters a baneful spirit of excitement; generates a distaste for well-regulated studies; creates a taste for moral reading of a more detrimental character; weakens the habits of self-controul, so essential to the strengthening of the intellectual and moral principles; and brings a habit of sentimentalism into the religious profession, in the stead of simple and practical spirituality.

The most effectual remedy against this existing and unfruitful indulgence, is to fill up the time with those solid pursuits which leave no room, while they mortify the taste, for works of doubtful utility; and to bring our intellectual recreations to the test of the Scriptural rule, which Miss Graham on a former occasion so justly inculcated, for the proof of the legitimacy of our principles and enjoyments: "Whether ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

We conclude this selection from Miss Graham's writings and correspondence, with an abstract of 'Letters on the Duties of a Governess,' a series of which she had contemplated for the use of her young cousin, then looking forward to this important and most responsible situation. She commenced her plan during her last illness, and with great difficulty wrote two letters in pencil from her dying bed. Though too incomplete in thought and style for publication, yet her manuscript will afford some interesting illustration of Christian principle, and many valuable suggestions of general instruction for the use of those young persons, who are now filling, or who are prospectively anticipating, this interesting station in the domestic economy.

These letters appear to have been one of Miss Graham's last efforts for one, whose best interests formed one of her most tender ties to life. After commencing with the most affectionate expression of her deep-toned anxiety for her, she thus proceeds to remind her of her Christian responsibility.

'The great wish of my heart for you,' she writes, 'is, not that you may be a very learned or accomplished governess, (though these are highly valuable considerations in their place,) but, that, possessing as large a measure of these things as your means and abilities will allow, you may be truly and decidedly a Christian governess. For, oh! my dearest ——, your's is a charge of souls. The spiritual welfare of your pupils is subordinately committed to your care; and at your hands will the neglect of this solemn trust be required.'

In this first preparatory letter she is chiefly occupied in inculcating upon her cousin the Christian principle of faith in Christ, in all its detailed application to the circumstances, trials, and encouragements of the situation of a governess.

'I can only offer my advice to you as a Christian. I know but of two states to which children can be brought up; for heaven or for hell; for time or for eternity. I am departing out of time; and knowing that for you and them too, time soon shall be no more, I dare not go upon any system but one fitting for souls born for immortality. Every word then that I write, must be on the supposition, that the glory of God, and the eternal happiness of your pupils, are your first aim; and that every other object, however praiseworthy in itself, is only secondary and subservient to this one grand object of a Christian teacher's existence.

'I exhort you to enter upon the new and arduous duties of your situation, "looking to Jesus." Remember that he is "the author and finisher of your faith;" that you cannot stir one step without his aid; and the moment you begin to look off from him to any other object, that moment will your steps begin to slide. Fix your eyes then steadily upon him. "As the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress, so let your eyes be upon the Lord your God," in all times, in all places, and in all circumstances.

'And first, I earnestly recommend you to "look unto Jesus," in your choice of a situation. Pray constantly for Divine assistance and direction on this most important subject. This implies that you intend to seek for a situation among God's people; for I suppose you will hardly ask God to give you any other. You may deem it unlikely that you should obtain a situation in so limited a sphere. But your dying friend would remind you: "The God, who has led me all my life long," never forsook me upon any occasion, when I put my trust in him. The word of truth assures you, that "He has never forsaken any, who put their trust in him." Nor will he forsake you, if you commit your way to him on this important occasion. From Abraham's time until now, the Christian's motto has ever been: "The Lord will provide." Only "rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him; fret not thyself in any wise to do evil. In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths." I charge it upon you, beloved ——, as my dying, earnest wish, that you take every proper means to obtain a situation among decided Christians; and that, as far as it may be in your power, (for I know that it may not be always possible for you to direct your own conduct,) you join yourself to those who "are not of the world," and to no others. An established Christian might go in faith under the clear guidance of providence, into a worldly or irreligious family; and (if the parent would allow of her interference) she might be made a blessing to the whole family. But such a step, wilfully taken, would be a serious, perhaps a fatal, injury to an undecided Christian. In a vast multitude of cases, the natural consequence of choosing a lot among the children of this world has been, that indecision in religion has become indifference; indifference has terminated in aversion; and the wretched professor has shown herself openly on the side of the world, tormented with the sting of her former convictions, and vainly contrasting her worldly mirth with "the voice of rejoicing and salvation," which she had heard "in the tabernacles of the righteous."

'On the other hand, a situation in a truly Christian family will cover you from many worldly temptations, and afford you many important opportunities of marking the beauty and happiness of religion. Under a kind Christian mother, you may be directed and encouraged in extensive usefulness to your pupils; while at the same time you are receiving valuable advantages for your own mind. Under all circumstances, be assured that you will find the blessing of taking this first great step of your life—"looking unto Jesus."

'"Look unto Jesus" also for strength to perform the duties of your situation. These you will find to be many and arduous, such as in your own strength you can never rightly perform. The more correct and enlarged your view of those duties, the more readily you will sink under them, unless you can "be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might." But remember you "can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth you." His "grace is sufficient for you;" and his encouragement is—"Ask, and it shall be given you." Let a sense of your continual need stir you up constantly to apply to him for his aid, not only in your spiritual duties, but in your teaching, in your studies, in the very least and meanest of your employments. Thus "out of weakness you will be made strong." You will not soon "be weary in well-doing; for they that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength."

'Look to him for counsel in the difficulties of your situation. Remember that he is not only your strength, but your "wisdom." When your path is so intricate and perplexed, that you know not which way to turn, then ask the Lord to "lead you in a plain path," to "order your steps in his word." In every little as well as in every great perplexity, follow David's rule to "inquire of the Lord." The advice of friends is ever to be sought and valued; but that of the kindest and wisest may sometimes be insufficient or erroneous, or given in a harsh injudicious manner. But the Lord giveth not only advice, but "wisdom, liberally and without upbraiding."

'"Look unto Jesus" for comfort and encouragement in the trials and disappointments of your situation. The life of a governess is peculiarly subject to little daily crosses and vexations. These, as well as greater ones, are to be borne, by laying them upon Jesus. No burden is too great or too little to be cast upon the Lord. A cheerful looking unto Jesus, an assurance that he ever loveth and ever careth for us, will bear us through many petty annoyances, which sometimes wear health and spirits much more than real and great grievances.

'Lastly, "Look unto Jesus" for a certain reward upon your labour. You have a promise—"Train up a child in the way he should go, and, when he is old, he will not depart from it." Ask for patient earnest faith, to plead this promise importunately, incessantly with him. "All the promises of God are yea and amen to us in Christ Jesus;" and while we pray for, we ought to expect their fulfilment. "He is faithful that promised." The great Sower will assuredly watch over the seed that is sown in faith, and will bring it to perfection. You may labour day after day for the souls of the children under your care, and yet see them as careless and unconcerned as ever; but look steadily unto Jesus; tarry contentedly the Lord's leisure; "for in due time you shall reap, if you faint not."'

In her second letter she enters into a detail of some of the pleasures and discomforts of the life of a governess. Under the former head she remarks:—

'The life of a governess, however dull and monotonous it may sometimes be thought, has many pleasures of a very refined and superior nature. Among the first of these I reckon the usefulness and importance of the task in which she is daily engaged. Compare the recollections of a day spent to some valuable purpose, with the reflections which follow one that has been frittered away in trifling and vanity, or absorbed in selfish gratifications; and you will see at once, if you know it not already, how great the pleasure of usefulness must be to every rational thinking being. But to the Christian, this is not only pleasing but necessary. It is his pleasure and delight to lay himself out for the glory of God, and the good of his fellow-creatures. For this he is content to "wait all the days of his appointed time;" and much as he longs for the pleasures that are prepared for him above; yet if his abiding in the flesh be needful for the sake of one living being, he would not "depart," even "to be with Christ." I know of no employment in which a Christian woman can be more profitably engaged, than in watching over the spiritual and mental improvement of children. The young beings entrusted to her care may form the comfort and delight of parents, brethren, husband, friends, children. They may grow up to be happy in themselves, and blessings to society. Above all, they may be so many "jewels" added to the Redeemer's crown, and may themselves "turn many souls unto righteousness." To be the instrument, (under God,) of the smallest particle of this good, must be inexpressible delight.

'Nothing invigorates our progress so much as encouraging prospects of success. This is the undoubted privilege of a teacher of youth. Not to speak of those promises of God, mentioned in my last letter, and which of themselves suffice to make us "against hope to believe in hope;" the human probabilities of moral and intellectual improvement, from which God permits us to draw encouragement, are most enlivening. To reform the manners, to eradicate the prejudices, to correct the tempers, of those whom age has matured, and set as it were in the form which they must afterwards retain, is indeed a most difficult task. But with the young, where we have to form instead of to reform, to prevent rather than to eradicate: patient instruction, and unremitting watchfulness will in ordinary cases succeed to a very considerable degree. And though divine grace only can subdue their evil tempers and dispositions, human means may do much towards retraining that outward violence, which so often makes young people not only wretched in themselves, but an occasion of sorrow to all connected with them. The same advantage is connected with Christian grace and improvement. The minister preaches with holy earnestness to his adult congregation: but it is to the young of his flock, not yet hardened in sin or in worldly habits, that he turns with peculiar hope and encouragement. To this comparatively tender and unoccupied soil, he consigns the seed, in the cheerful confidence that it will spring up, and bring forth fruit to perfection. These are the hopeful beings with whom you will have to deal; and as youth is the season of hope and expectation, so is your task peculiarly one of hope and glad anticipations.

In the attachment of her pupils, a kind governess finds another perpetual source of pleasure. This you are almost sure to obtain by a habit of considerate and affectionate intercourse with them, especially if they come under your care at an early age. It is delightful te be beloved by those, whom we have thus bound to us by the cords of gratitude and love. For the justness and clearness of most of their notions; for their ability to discern what is good, and to enjoy what is delightful and intellectual; for all their knowledge and many of their pleasures, your pupils will probably (if you conduct yourself according to my hopes) be indebted to you. They will scarcely ever fail to manifest warm attachment to one, who has so many claims on their gratitude. They must love their faithful adviser, their kind and intelligent teacher, their cheerful entertaining companion, and their affectionate and sympathizing friend.

The improvement of your own mind is also a source of inexpressible delight. A conscientious governess will be perpetually and delightfully improving herself. While explaining subjects to her pupils, her own views become clearer; while she is teaching them facts or words, her own recollection of them is refreshed and strengthened. The arrangement of her knowledge for the use of her pupils is of the highest advantage to herself. She must learn to think clearly, that she may be able to express her meaning clearly to her young and ignorant auditors; and if her own acquaintance with the subject be obscure, imperfect, or superficial, the attempt to teach will soon discover it to her, and compel her to correct it. Thus her previously acquired knowledge will be more solid and permanent, while she will be continually adding to its store. Often she may not be able readily to answer her pupils' questions. Further researches therefore on her part are necessary; and thus the demands of her teaching stimulate to perpetual increase of her attainments.

I mention one more privilege connected with the life of a governess. Next to the improvement of her own mind, and indeed because of the improvement that it yields to her own mind, is the pleasure of gaining an insight into the minds of others, into the human mind in general. In cultivating a flower garden there are few pleasures equal to that of watching the tender buds, as they unfold one by one their beauteous petals. How delightful is it to admire the wisdom of God, who teaches them to peep in due season from their mantle of green; bids the sun to clothe them in all the colours of the rainbow; and endues them with shapes so varied and so perfect, that the little flower has been the joy and solace of man's breast in every age! But what is this to the pleasure of watching the mind of a little child, as those faculties which lay wrapped within its tiny folds, begin gradually to expand, each in its order; every day witnessing the drawing forth of some new idea, or the unfolding of some latent power? And at a later age to watch those powers and faculties, as they daily improve and strengthen: to see the unformed and untaught child, grow up before your eyes into the graceful, refined, and intellectual woman; to mark every step by which it is effected, and to be yourself employed as an instrument in effecting it; all this is a source of such continual and ever varying delight, that to my mind it amply compensates for the tediousness and fatigue of teaching. And then there is the pleasure of watching, not only different faculties, but different minds; of comparing their several degrees of development, and the peculiar combination of faculties, which constitutes the formation of each peculiar turn of mental temperament. You may probably find among your pupils many instances of this endless variety; the more quick and ready mind; the lively and imaginative; the clear and decided; the solid and steady; the strong, the deep, the energetic, the inquiring, the contemplative. You will find that each of these will develop itself in a peculiar manner, and put forth their several powers and faculties with different degrees of vigour and perfection. As an intelligent gardener, in order that his different flowers may open and expand to perfection, exposes them to every degree of air and heat, and treats them with every variety of soil; so will you find the most varied modes of treatment necessary in assisting the development of your mental blossoms, and in contending with the defects peculiar to each. These will be gradually suggested to you by experience; and will assist you much in combating the defects in your own mind, which the course of your teaching in a watchful habit of self-inspection will bring before you. And as the child is but the copy of the man, you will thus be better enabled to discern the intellectual beauties and defects of those with whom you converse. The dull prosy cease to be wearisome, while we are busily employed in inquiring into the causes of their imperfections, how they might have been, or might still be corrected.

'The advantages you will gain in watching the tempers and dispositions of your pupils will be yet more valuable and important. This, however, is a less pleasing task. The fall of man, though it has made shipwreck of every mental faculty, has still left the wreck as it were, the sadly obscured and mutilated remains of what was once so noble and beautiful. But our tempers and dispositions it has totally perverted. To study the varieties of the natural heart, is but to study selfishness and pride, in all the various forms of virtue and vice, which they have assumed for the delusion and destruction of mankind. Yet, the high importance of this study, with the word of God for our guide, will fully compensate for its painful disappointments. If God gives me life and strength, I shall again have occasion to touch on these points; I will, therefore, leave them now, and proceed to some of the disadvantages connected with a governess' situation;—not to discourage you, but to prepare you, if I can, in some cases to avoid, in others to meet them cheerfully.'

Her exhibition of the discomforts of the life of a governess shows much good sense and knowledge of character in the true spirit of Christian sympathy. The most delightful characteristic, however, is the habitual bent of her mind, ever turning, like the magnetic needle, to the point of attraction. Thus, in the first inconvenience that she mentions, the separation of the governess from her own domestic circle—she naturally draws out an application, which seems to say with the church of old—"Saw ye him whom my soul loveth?" 'The grievance' as she justly observes, 'is often lighter than is anticipated. Strangers cannot live long in the same house without ceasing to be strangers; and where there is a due proportion of encouraging kindness on the one hand, and of respectful confidence on the other; friendship will soon take place of strangeness and reserve. This is particularly the case, where both parties are sincere Christians. The love of their common Lord begets such feelings of union and sympathy between them, that the hand of fellowship is soon held forth and accepted, as if they had long known and loved each other. They know so much about each other, of which the rest of the world is ignorant; they feel themselves so much of "strangers and pilgrims upon earth," that they cannot but rejoice at meeting with a fellow-sojourner, who, like themselves, "has no continuing city, but seeks that better country," to which their own steps are directed. Added to this general feeling amongst the Lord's people, the Christian mother may surely be expected to receive with peculiar interest and affection, the young person, whom she has engaged to assist her in bringing up for God those dear objects of her love, for whose temporal and spiritual welfare she cries unto him night and day. Even should you fail of obtaining this privilege; should your employers be ever so cold and distant; still the affections of your pupils conciliated to you by affectionate and judicious treatment, will be objects of incessant interest to fill up the void in your heart, in the consciousness of loving and being beloved. And I think that a teacher of youth thus blessed and encouraged will seldom be inclined to reckon her condition very desolate or forlorn. But even should this comfort be denied you (a misfortune I hope and trust very unlikely to happen in your case), I have to remind you of another source of consolation, which can never fail or disappoint you. If you now give yourself to Jesus, you can never be wholly amongst strangers; for your best, dearest friend—one who is "born for adversity, who sticketh closer than a brother"—is with you, yea, and has promised to be "with you to the end of the world." And oh! what a friend and comforter is Jesus! How abundant in loving-kindness! How tender in sympathy! How rich in counsel! How "meek and lowly in reproof! How wise to direct! How mighty to help! How slow to anger! How ready to forgive! What a faithful, unfailing, promise-keeping friend!'

Against 'the feeling of afflictive solitariness,' a measure of which under the most favourable circumstances must belong to absence from the happy family circle—she suggests the following alleviating considerations. The Christian turn which she gives to the first suggestion is exquisitely beautiful:

'Think first, what a common privation it is. Almost every family disperses, as the younger part arrive at maturity. One son perhaps remains at home to support his father's declining years, and to fill his place when he shall be no more. The others betake themselves to distant parts, and are often content to look forward to a reunion in ten, twenty, or thirty years. The daughters probably marry, and accompany their husbands to remote situations, from whence they return once in a few months or years, to visit the still dear party at home. This you will say is an unfair comparison. For the happy young wife goes with her husband, who is more to her than all the friends of home; and she is soon settled in a new home; and surrounded by a family and friends still dearer to her than those she has left. True, my dear——; and this is what I wish you to bear upon your mind in every trial you may have to encounter. The happy wife misses not the home of her youth; because, wherever she goes, she carries with her, that which is better to her than home; and her pleasures now are superior to those she has relinquished. And thus the devoted Christian; whether married or unmarried, has with her wherever she goes, the cheering presence of one, who is far dearer to her than husband, parents, brothers, sisters, or friends. She has made her home in the bosom of her God and Saviour. Thither she flies for sympathy and direction. In that kind bosom she can pour forth her joys and sorrows, far better than to the tenderest relatives or friends. She has nothing "in heaven besides her God, nor on earth any she desires in comparison of him." She must feel as a stranger even in her own home, if it be composed of such as know not the name of Jesus; and wherever that beloved name is known and esteemed, there she is happy and at home. Go where she will, she cannot journey to the place where God is not; go where she will, she is still drawing near to that home, on which her thoughts and affections are fixed.'

Another ground of alleviation it very pointedly and sensibly set forth.

'This painful separation from home, is in reality (under present circumstances) the best and happiest thing for you. Were two situations equally eligible to present themselves, and were I asked to assist you in your choice, assuredly the one near home would not be the object of my preference. A continual recurrence to the comforts and liberty of home, makes every little restraint and discomfort of a situation doubly irksome and annoying. The poor governess, who has the misnamed privilege of perpetual access to her home, returns from it in no very favourable mood to a place, where she cannot (at least at first) be loved, caressed, and appreciated, as amongst her own friends. It is but too natural, that she should consider every little departure from the unlimited and perhaps injudicious indulgence which she has just experienced, as an actual deviation from the law of kindness and equity; that she should magnify every real or fancied slight into contempt, every expression of disapproval into a harsh reproof, and every degree of strictness in requirement, into an unreasonable exaction. Soon the very nearness of her home tempts her steps thither again. There the well-filled budget of petty trials and vexations, which few young person have the wisdom to conceal within their own bosoms, or to tell to none but God, is emptied out before partial relatives, who hear but one side of the story, and are too apt to take it for granted, that there is no other way of telling it. They cannot refuse to sympathize and console; and while they are wondering that such an attention was omitted, such a fault found, or such a duty exacted, they little suspect themselves to be the cause of the forlorn and disconsolate state of their dear relation. Nor does the evil end here. Her mind, divided between her pupils and home, cannot fully and affectionately employ all its energies in the service of the former. Too often will her absent looks and languid attention betray the fact so injurious for pupils to discover, that her mind can wander as well as theirs; and that their improvement and entertainment are objects which soon slide out of her thoughts, when occupied by subjects of more pleasant contemplation.

Nor have I yet made the obvious remark, that the time lost in these frequent visits, however short, must deprive her of many opportunities of private improvement; and thus prove in the end extremely detrimental both to herself and her younger charge. From these considerations, a moderate distance from home is far preferable, from whence at stated and proper intervals you are permitted to revisit your friends. And I think that such reflections as these might enable us to bear the discomforts even of a long separation from home, not merely with patience, but with thankfulness.

'I cannot quit this subject without strongly cautioning you, not too hastily to accuse the parents of your pupils of being unkind or unreasonable, because they are not willing to grant you leave of absence whenever you think fit to ask it. They, perhaps, with more justice, may think the unreasonableness to be all on your side. It is both right and natural that they should anxiously desire the improvement of their children in every branch of instruction, to which their attention has been directed; and they know that this is only to be attained by a steady course of persevering application. They know that every interruption to this course must have a pernicious effect, by weakening habits newly formed, and permitting old and bad habits to revive; by unsettling the mind in all its pursuits, and blotting out much of what has been already learned. If, therefore, they oppose your absence, it is because they value your services too much, to part with them lightly, or without sufficient cause. There are few cases in which you ought not to submit to their decision. But the best way to prevent any future misunderstanding or disappointment, is to make some arrangement before you enter upon your situation.'

The frequent change of situation, or the liability to this change, is well pointed out as a serious evil attending the life of a governess.

'Her duties'—it is observed—'are becoming easy and delightful to her; she is beginning to rejoice in the growing attachment of her pupils; she feels that she can look round on their little faces with a degree of maternal affection; when some unexpected cause induces or compels her to relinquish her situation. She has long been employed in clearing away the rubbish: in laying the foundation; and in collecting and arranging the materials of her intended superstructure, which was beginning to rise with a daily increasing order and symmetry. This state of things might probably appear rude and unfinished to the eye of others, but it was full of hope and interest to her, who had been watching its progress from day to day, and confidently awaiting the happy, though distant, completion of her labours. Her work must now pass into the hands of another, who neither witnessed its commencement, nor can be aware of many important points connected with its progress. The new teacher, however, succeeds to all the benefits of that preparatory drudgery, with which her predecessor had hoped to pave the way for her own future exertions. It seldom happens, that the children are not seriously injured by this change of system. The very act of changing has a tendency to unsettle the mind. The new comer's manners, her new modes of expression, and new system of teaching, must render her at first less intelligible to them, than the familiar voice to which they have been accustomed; and till this disadvantage is conquered, her services must prove less effective. Besides, too often the new governess, confident of the superiority of her own methods of instruction, hastily puts aside the rules and arrangements of her predecessor—not because they are not good—but as if they could not be good, because they were not her own. Then the children also are discouraged and thrown back in many of their studies, that they may be grounded in them on the new system. Perhaps ere long another change is determined—a new teacher comes—and the best methods are displaced by others that are newer and better still. The result of this broken and interrupted education will be a sort of clumsy patchwork, made up of a medley of fine and coarse materials, ill-contrived, ill-assorted, and loosely put together. These are some of the real injuries inflicted on children by the frequent change of demestic administration.

'My chief concern, however, is with the governess. In addition to these mortifying circumstances, she is again thrown upon the world. She must once more take up her abode amongst strangers: her pupils are again unfamiliar to her; she must study their tempers; conciliate their affections; examine and arrange their present acquirements: in short, she must encounter anew every former difficulty. And when all this is effected, and things begin to glide smoothly on, another change, another loss of time and labour may yet be in prospect for her. The web may be again unravelled; the stone, that had been heaved half-way up the mountain, may roll down again to its very foot. I have dwelt strongly on the evils resulting from a frequent change of situation—not by way of discouragement, but of warning. I am persuaded that in a large majority of cases, young people might and would retain their engagement in one family much longer than they do, if only they would calmly sit down, and count the serious cost both to themselves and to their pupils (to which I have alluded) in relinquishing it.'

It would be difficult in all cases to determine what might be deemed a sufficient reason for relinquishing a situation. A few decidedly insufficient motives are accurately specified.

'I need scarcely suggest, that a trifling increase of salary would be an insufficient reason for quitting a tolerably comfortable situation. Circumstances, such as some urgent family call upon your assistance, might indeed render a change not only excusable but praiseworthy. But without an imperative call, it will be equally your interest and happiness to retain your station. I consider the governess, who will abandon her young charge for the mere sake of a little paltry emolument, much in the same light with the minister, who will leave his larger flock, for the same base motive of "filthy lucre," without any clear providential call. This abandonment of present and certain usefulness for the sake of something new and uncertain, whether dictated by the love of gain, or the love of novelty, is not only sinful but imprudent. You are now more or less comfortably settled. You know not how many discomforts may await you in a new situation. You leave those, who probably are becoming attached to you, for those who at present neither know nor care any thing about you. This is not the way to lay up friends against the time of sickness, distress, or age. The plain path of duty is always the path of prudence. Here only can you expect the "blessing of the Lord, which maketh rich; and he addeth no sorrow to it." When however any tempting offer occurs, the love of gain so common to all, the love of novelty so inherent in young minds, and the persuasions of older sordid friends, are too likely to prevail with a young person, who is not enabled to hold fast her integrity, by working with a single eye to the service of Christ.

'Nor do I think, that any trifling inconvenience should induce you to relinquish an engagement, which holds out to you a fair prospect of usefulness. Every situation has its trials and privations; and it is better, if possible, to put up with those which already fall to your share, than to run the risk of incurring others which may be worse. Besides, these petty hardships are always most severely felt at first. After a time they wear off, and at length cease to occasion any considerable uneasiness. When the temper of either parents or children is a trial to you; when the parents, through pride, avarice, or inconsideration, fail in a proper attention to your comforts; when the extreme retirement or excessive bustle of your situation makes it very unpleasant to you, &c.—in these, and many other similar cases, I should advise you to make as light of the evil as you can, and to bear with it as long as it can possibly be borne with.

'Again—let not any sudden fit of despondency induce you to give up your situation. There are few teachers who cannot recollect a time when every thing seemed to go wrong with them—'No children ever repaid the trouble bestowed on them so little; no situation ever possessed so few advantages; no parents were ever so exacting and dissatisfied. In any other family they should succeed better; here they can neither do justice to their pupils nor to themselves.' Such feelings, which may be expected to arise in times of difficulty and discouragement, mark something very wrong in your own heart, that casts a shade upon all the objects around you: something that needs, not the indulgent experiment of change of situation, but a special course of self-examination, watchfulness, and prayer, to restore a healthful tone of energy, cheerfulness, and satisfaction to your mind.

'I need scarcely observe, that no offence, real or fancied, except the former be of a very clear and aggravated character, could justify you in quitting a family in which you may have probably received much kindness, and may receive much more. A governess must expect to be told of her faults, and ought to be thankful for such information as may lead to their correction. Christians indeed too often perform the difficult office of reproof in a very harsh and grating manner; forgetting that the reproof of "the righteous should be like excellent oil," not to "break," but to heal, the wounded spirit. Yet the harshness, with which a censure may be given, forms no excuse for a defect of Christian meekness and love in receiving it. "Be not hasty in thy spirit to be angry;" but remember that "a soft answer turneth away wrath." Indulge not that sensitive temper, which is always looking out for some ground of offence, over which it can brood, till it bursts out into open discontent; which bristles up at every light and unguarded expression, and is always on the defensive, even when no intentional slight could have been conceived. You will never long retain a situation without a forbearing spirit in respect to many little things, which are grating to a proud and self-conceited temper. Good sense and experience will indeed help to depress this baneful temper. For we can scarcely so far shut our eyes to the passing world around us, as to fail in discovering, that the good opinion we may have formed of ourselves is ill-warranted by the general estimation in which we are held; that we must expect our full share of inconvenience and neglect. But true Christian humility can alone conquer the evil, by "bringing into captivity every high thought to the obedience of Christ." The spirit and temper of which we have been speaking is ever ready to take fire at the least provocation, or even without provocation. It exacts not only due respect, but much more than, if it knew itself, it would find to be its due. It can bear with nothing; it can endure nothing. But do you follow after that "charity which suffereth long and is kind; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; beareth all things."

'To sum up what I have said in a few words—when you have taken up your abode in a family, and have fairly sat down to the performance of your duties, remember that you are in the station to which God in his providence has called you; and that nothing but a clear and explicit call of duty or necessity can justify you in quitting it.

'The causes that might induce your employers to dissolve the engagement (in which case you can have no alternative) very materially depend upon yourself. Under any ground, just or unjust, of their dissatisfaction with you, endeavour in a spirit of prayer to sift every part of your conduct, and particularly the part censured, to the very bottom. Put yourself in their place. Make every allowance for the feelings of an anxious parent; and consider what might fairly be expected from you, and how far you have answered those expectations. Under any error discovered, be not ashamed to confess your fault with all candour and humility, and (in a higher strength than your own) to promise amendment. To retain your situation by this "voluntary humility" will be truly honourable in the eyes of Christians, who know that "he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." But supposing that, after sincere self-examination, you cannot acknowledge the justice of the censure, still, as a Christian, strive to conciliate. Do not get warm or angry in your own justification; mildly profess your freedom from any intentional offence or omission; and declare your readiness to redouble your efforts to give satisfaction.

'Should incompetency be alleged against you, I should advise you, rather than give up your engagement in despair or in offence, to endeavour by redoubled diligence and application, especially in the particular ground of complaint, to redeem and establish your character. Christian gentleness and humility to explain and conciliate, and a willingness to correct errors, and to supply omission, will in many cases restore satisfaction and confidence in the minds of your employers.

'Should however—not any fault or caprice on either side—but some unavoidable domestic necessity, dissolve the connection, in this case many mitigating circumstances will present themselves to your mind. In the first place—"It is the Lord;" and not one of his appointments or disappointments is without some wise and gracious purpose. In the next place—all painful feeling of responsibility for any evil that may result from the change, is entirely removed. And thus supported by a sense of God's blessing, and a clear conscience, you may look cheerfully forward to your new destination, hoping to gain new friends without losing the old.'

The writer has been induced to quote so largely from these letters, because he is not aware of any work, that enters into the detail of the principles, characteristics, and sympathies of the life of a governess. Had Miss Graham been permitted to complete her design, her accurate and observant mind would probably have produced a valuable manual for this interesting and important class of society. In the defect however of an entire system of instruction, the preceding hints will be found to suggest much sensible instruction nearly connected with their comfort and usefulness.

An even balance must, indeed, be preserved in the adjustment of this important part of domestic economy. If the generality of instructors are too flimsily furnished for their great task, perhaps it may be also said, that the generality of their employers are too niggardly. Though Miss Graham rightly inculcates upon her young governess not to consider stipend a primary matter, yet it is a part of Christian obligation to elevate her in a high rank above the menials of the house, and to consider the claims of aged parents or poor relations that often inconveniently press upon her. The same inconsiderate selfishness, and formal pride on the part of the parents, materially hinder the defective usefulness of the family instructors. It fosters in them a discontented spirit in the contrast with the tender sympathies of their own home. Their insulated station in the family throws them in irksome solitude upon their own resources; contracts their social affections; and paralyses that affectionate interest in their charge, which is the soul and energy of a fruitful system of instruction. Whereas a considerate tenderness would return to the parents an abundant recompense, in raising up for their children valuable friends in the persons of their instructors—attached to their interests beyond the prospects of sordid gain—wise, anxious, and sympathizing counsellors to the end of life.

On the other hand, the disposition in the employers to incorporate the instructor, as far as is consistent with her station, into the family circle, is too often restrained by hindrances, over which they have no controul—even where a well-furnished mind, and general consistency of conduct would have made her society an important consideration. Yet a want of knowledge or respect for the regulations of decorum—defect of manners—forgetfulness of the due reserve connected with her situation—pedantic tone of conversation—vanity of dress—self-importance—a disputatious spirit—a love of authority—affectation, or studied eccentricity of behaviour—these or some other failure in the domestic graces—repel the exercise of kindly confidence, and produce a natural, and in some degree a necessary, distance in the deportment of the parents.

Let each side form their mutual behaviour upon Scriptural rules. Let the one practise the injunction of love—"Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Let the other "be clothed with humility," and be found in the daily observance of "whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report." Thus Christian regard and happiness will be reciprocally diffused, without any compromise of their several obligations.

CHAPTER V.

Different views and features in Miss Graham's character.

The retired and uniform habits of Miss Graham's life scarcely allow of a detailed illustration of her natural character. That singular freedom from selfishness, remarked in her early history, appears to have been, by the common consent of all her intelligent friends, a most prominent feature throughout life. One of her young companions, whose subsequent opportunities of observation give weight to her testimony, thus confirms the general remark on this point.—'The situation which I have filled for some years (in tuition) has of course brought under my notice the various dispositions and peculiar tempers of children in general. From necessity, partly, I have studied them. But I have never met with one, who in any degree answered my recollections of Mary Graham. Warm and susceptible in her affections, she was tender to those of others; nor did she ever suffer any regret or disappointment in her own mind to interfere with the comfort or pleasure of her companions.' The testimony of her young cousin is to the same purport. 'I never saw any one so devoid of selfishness, or who took so warm an interest in the happiness of her fellow-creatures. There was not one of my amusements or childish sorrows in which she would not take her share. As I grew up, her kindness in this respect increased.' This lovely trait was combined with a sweetness and gentleness of disposition, and, being moulded under the influence of Divine grace, attracted the regard even of the thoughtless and unobservant. Indeed her young friend first alluded to does not hesitate to assert—'My earliest remembrance of her is connected with feelings of respect, which, I think I may say, I have scarcely felt in a stronger degree for any one I have since known.'

We have already given her parents' account of her relative character under their own roof. In its wider sphere of operation it may however be added, that her natural affection was enlarged in no common degree to all that belonged to her, and manifested in the most important and practical mode of constant prayer and effort for the salvation of their souls. She sometimes spent a great part of the night in earnest and persevering intercession; and on one occasion was known, after she had retired to rest, to arise from her bed to employ herself in special prayer, in behalf of her only brother who died in America about this time, and for whom she never ceased to cherish the hope, that her prayers were heard with acceptance.

The following letter full enforces the claims of natural affection upon the basis of the high principles of the gospel. In quickening her friend to a self-denying effort in this path of duty, she writes—

Stoke, Jan. 2, 1827.

'My dear ——, "freely we have received, freely let us give." If it does take up half-a-day once or twice a month to go to ——, surely God, who gave all your days, has a right to expect you should spend them in whatever service he will put upon you; and by making these individuals your near relations, he has given thema claim upon you. Jesus made himself as our brother, that sucked the breasts of our mother, on purpose to give us an everlasting claim to all that he can do for us; and surely those whom he has given us as near relations, have for his sake, a claim upon all that we can do for them. The more unpleasant the task, the more contrary to flesh and blood, the more reason we have to hope that we are not following our own fancy, nor working to please ourselves, but really following the example of Jesus, who, "came not to do his own will." At the same time, if after prayer, you really do not feel called upon to do something for them, and that speedily and perseveringly; and if you do not think you are guilty of great unfaithfulness, and selfishness in neglecting it, I will not mention the subject again to you; for I am persuaded you will be taught of God, and faith will be given you, if the Lord intends to make use of you to do them good. My great desire is that, we may be always faithful to one another, "provoking one another to good works."

In another letter to the same correspondent, she throws out a valuable hint of encouragement relative to a difficulty, which is often painfully felt in this course of obligation.

'I often think, dear ——, that if we could feel and carry in our memory those encouraging words of our Saviour, "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father, which speaketh in you,"—we should no longer suffer false shame to hinder us from earnestly pressing the subject of the gospel upon those who are dear to us. May not we, as well as the Inspired Apostles, hope for the indwelling guidance of that Spirit, who shall strengthen us in all utterance and in knowledge?'

One main feature of her intellectual character was the ardour, steadiness, and concentration of mind, with which she pursued every object of interest. This indeed distinguished her earliest and most unbended habits. Her youthful games were marked with the same intensity of feeling which she subsequently applied to her more important objects. She engaged in games of imagination, as one of her companions remarks, with all the earnestness of reality, and acted a fictitious character with an expression, that proved her to be totally absorbed in it. Thus it was with reading or with work. No efforts or entreaties could avail to divert her mind from the object which was then engaging her attention to any other employment or recreation. In the occupations of after-life, whether it was music, the languages, mathematics, or chemistry, it was still the same warmth and fixedness of mind. The early dawn not unfrequently found her (after she had girded on her Christian armour) deeply engaged in her studies. The spirit and result of her investigations often entered into her common conversation, whenever she met with a kindred mind—not however in any display of pedantry, (than which nothing was more removed from her temper,) but in the natural flow of her spirits, and with a lively endeavour to communicate a reciprocal interest. The simplicity and elastic spring of her mind was also remarkably illustrated in her peculiar faculty of drawing out the mental resources of those with whom she conversed; so that, though they could not but be sensible of her great superiority, yet they appeared to themselves often to possess a greater strength of mind, and variety of conception, than they had before been conscious of. Perhaps however the completeness of her intellectual character appeared in the well-regulated application of her mental powers. To subjects of taste—such as music and poetry—she brought a glow of feeling, and of imagination, that quickens the pulse of her readers, and plays upon the passions with an irresistible charm. On the other hand, matters of a graver cast, such as the highly valuable discussions of her Mathematical Manuscript, are drawn out with the sober accuracy of a reflecting and discriminating judgment. The illustrations that have been given of her musical excitement might almost lead us to suppose that this was the atmosphere in which she lived, and that she could breathe in no other; yet was this fervid enthusiasm disciplined by the apprehension of the preponderance of this indulgent taste above more solid pursuits. Thus was her fine imagination furnished with a proportionate counterpoise in the master-principle of her ever active mind.

As to her Christian character—this highest style of man—that energy of feeling and industry of habit, which gave the impulse to her intellectual studies, no less strongly marked the temperament of her religion. Though she had a clear perception that the blessing she sought was a free gift, yet she expected the attainment of it, like that of every important object of pursuit, only in the constant use of the appointed means. She was therefore led to cherish the principles of her Christian profession, in a spirit of earnest and prayerful searching of the Scriptures and thus was she enabled to exhibit the graces of the gospel in lovely combination and practical exercise.

In giving, however, a detailed sketch of Miss Graham's spiritual character, we would premise, that it was marked by that variation of feeling, which is so often alluded to in her correspondence, and which, though common to all cases of Christian experience, her remarkable elevation of spirituality rendered more visible than in most other cases. The difference of her feelings was often discernible in her countenance. On some seasons it was irradiated with a peculiar expression of heavenly feature. She was manifestly filled with the love of God, and "out of the abundance of her heart her mouth would speak. At other times it was with difficulty that she could be induced to converse upon religious subjects; and she would turn from them to enter upon topics exclusively intellectual. But this view of her character cannot better be described than in the language of her most intimate and confidential friend.

'I did not notice any infirmity in her Christian character, except the one she herself often mentions—inequality. The difference in spiritual feeling was more visible in her than in any other Christians I have known. When in a state of warm feeling, she was more entirely engrossed by the subject than any one I ever met with. Nothing else could interest her. When her mind was less under the influence of heavenly things, the difference was obvious. I do not mean by her giving way to any sinful temper or feeling, but by her conversing with pleasure and interest upon merely earthly things. Nor do I think that at these times she sunk much, if at all, below the usual standard. Ordinarily she rose, I should think, above it.'

The general tone, however, of her habit, both contemplative and active, manifested the habitual operation of a high measure of Divine influence; while her occasional depressions seem not to have sunk her below the ordinary level, and were doubtless connected with those exercises of humiliation described in her correspondence, which will find their response in the hearts of many of her readers.

We now proceed to the chief object of this work, a detailed development of the most prominent features of Miss Graham's Christian character.

In a compassionate concern for the unconverted, she had deeply imbibed the spirit of her beloved Master. 'I see,' as she writes to a friend, 'more need than ever to pray, not only for the souls of others, but for a spirit of love to souls, and for a sense of their inestimable value.' She had diligently improved the opportunities of her health, in pleading with the careless and unbelieving, and in every exercise of tender anxiety on their behalf. In the chamber of pain and sickness, their awful condition intensely occupied her mind; and the long and "wearisome nights appointed" her, were often engaged in intercession for their souls.

'When first I visited her'—observed the dear brother who was the privileged attendant upon her sick bed—'hearing of a poor woman in a dangerous state, and unconcerned about her eternal interests, she eagerly inquired of me respecting her soul, and begged me most earnestly to pray for her. She spoke with a peculiar interest, as if she felt what it was for a soul to be lost. Indeed her minister expresses himself to have been continually struck with her deep tone of anxiety on the state of the parish. If she heard of any that were awakened from a fearful state of stupidity and death, it was always with the most lively expression of delight. Often was she known to shed tears of joy upon any symptom of hope and encouragement respecting them that were brought before her. She felt the responsibility of every opportunity of addressing her fellow-sinners, whether rich or poor, upon the immensely momentous concerns of eternity; and when unable to seek after them, she longed to bring them into her sick room, within the reach of her solemn and affectionate exhortations; though a restless night was the expected consequence of this ardent excitement. It was her great desire to bring her whole family, all her friends and neighbours, to Christ and to heaven with her. Though suffering under excruciating pain, and her "soul breaking out with longing desires" for a sight of Christ in his glory: yet, when speaking of the perishing state of sinners, she would say—'Oh! I would gladly live a hundred years, if I might be the means of saving one soul.' Shortly before her death, when in a state of great exhaustion, she begged her minister to pray for an infidel, who had an opportunity of seeing her 'Test of Truth,' as it passed through the press—'Weak as the work is'—she said in her deep humility—'it may prove a blessing to his soul.'

A few extracts from her correspondence will afford striking illustration of the deep feeling of her Christian responsibility and love. The first letter relates to an unhappy female, who had been brought under her notice. Being unable personally to attend to her case, she thus warmly enforces it upon her friend, who was, jointly with herself, interested in it.

Dec. 18, 1827.

'My chief reason for writing to-day is, that this poor wretched girl dwells upon my mind. You make good reflections, but these very reflections ought to lead us to do something for her. She must be very young; and if we do not make an effort to save her from destruction, I think that we shall indeed have much to answer for. Her not belonging to us, ought to be no excuse for our not concerning ourselves about her. For does she not belong to the large family of lost sinners to which we once belonged? And may we not be the means of removing her thence, into the family of saved sinners, of which God's mercy has made us members? I cannot rest till something is tried. So young, and so brought up, what better could be expected from her? What should we have been under her disadvantages? I tremble even to think of it; and for very thankfulness we ought to leave nothing untried to save her. She has been also brought under our notice by a peculiar providence, which is, I think, a call to the work.'

To this wretched object of distress, she addressed a letter full of tender and awakening exhortations. To her great concern, however, this messenger of mercy never reached the hands of her for whom it was intended, and who was soon afterwards transported. Shortly afterwards she again stimulates her friend to this work of love, with the solemn impulse connected with the concerns of a never-dying soul.

Jan. 11, 1828.

'I beseech you to reflect, that on one hand this girl may be a subject of regret to you upon a bed of death. On the other hand, she may be to you a "crown of rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus." '

The fervour that pervades the following letter, is deeply affecting.

March 18, 1828.

'But why should I say I have nothing to write about? I am really ashamed of the folly of the last sentence, and of the frivolous temper which dictated it. Yes, my dear friend, if we love the Lord Jesus, we have always a subject of the deepest interest—enough to employ our tongue and our pen, both morning, noon, and night. I would fain make him the subject of our communication here, as I trust he will be the theme of our songs and praises in heaven; and firmly believing, as I do, that there is neither praise nor lasting joy for those, who place their happiness in any thing short of loving him; can I do otherwise than tell you how very earnestly I wish, that you may be led by his grace to make him your all in all? May his Holy Spirit lead us, my dear M——; for in short, all are sinners, by nature as well as by practice, altogether alienated from God, to whom we can only be "made nigh by the blood of Jesus." Do not let us deceive ourselves in so important a subject. If we are walking in the same way with the world around us, we are not walking in the narrow way which leads to life; nor can we be the followers of that Saviour, "who gave himself for us, that He might deliver us from this evil world." There is a peace which the world knoweth not of, and a joy in which all its boasted pleasures are but vanity. This is the peace and the joy, which I would intreat you to seek after. But you will say to me—'Why do you recommend it? and why are you so uncharitable as to suppose I do not possess it already?' It is because I know what a great and entire change it requires in the whole heart and character. I am sensible, that such is the utter sinfulness of my own heart, that nothing but a Divine influence could have led me to see any thing in Christ crucified that was worth giving up all the world for. And may not the same Divine power snatch you as a brand from the burning, and lead you to the cross of Jesus for pardon and salvation? This is the hope that induces me to venture upon writing to you so freely; and the very affectionate interest I feel in every thing relating to you, must plead my excuse, if, when I speak of a thing on which your eternity depends, I speak in the strong language which my anxiety suggests to me.'

Some misconception of her correspondent gave rise to the next letter.

'Your letter occasioned me much pain, and—I will add—perplexity. I could not conceive from what part of mine you had discovered, that I thought holiness unnecessary to a Christian. My dear friend, I know (for God has said), that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord:" but I know (for God has said it too), that we cannot be holy of ourselves: "we are not sufficient of ourselves to think any thing as of ourselves;" and, "without me"—saith Christ—"ye can do nothing." As this is not a matter of little importance, but one of life and death, let me most earnestly and affectionately entreat you to make it the subject of unceasing prayer. "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally." "Ask, and ye shall have." The Scripture abounds with promises to those who make it the business of their lives to seek God. Allow me to mention one more, which always fills my mind with comfort and peace:—"Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me, and I will hearken unto you. And ye shall seek me, and find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart." I have mentioned this way of prayer to you, because I believe we might write about these things for ever, without coming nearer to the truth. Prayer is the way of God's appointment; and I never knew any one who really prayed earnestly and perseveringly for Divine teaching, that was not brought at length heartily to subscribe to what are called evangelical doctrines. The Scriptures take away all hope of our understanding these things of ourselves, when they tell us, that "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him." Foolish indeed does the doctrine of the cross appear to the heart untaught by the Spirit of God; but let the heart be once taught to receive it, and it beholds in it, "the power and wisdom of God;" and a person thus taught will feel constrained to make it his great desire, endeavour, and prayer, that others may learn it too. Therefore if I could write volumes to you, the little word "pray" should be the burden of them all. By prayer I do not mean that cold thing, which worldly people call prayer; I mean such an effort, as a man dying with hunger, would use to beg for food; I mean begging as for one's life, being able to say as David did—"There is nothing in heaven, or in earth that I desire beside thee." Dear ———, I feel that I have spoken to you with great freedom and plainness; I cannot help it. If I saw a friend on the brink of a precipice, I would try to pull her away from it. I know that all who trust in any thing but Christ for pardon and salvation, are on the brink of eternal destruction; and can I rest, when any whom I love are in this state. I know, too, that unless God is pleased to bless what I have said, you will only think me a fool for my pains: but this is of little consequence. Before another letter can pass between us, one or both of us may have entered into eternity, when every man's foundation that he trusted in, will be tried; and it will be seen how miserably mistaken are those, who build upon the sand, upon their own imperfect righteousness: while those alone who build upon the Rock of Ages will be safe. May you be one of those! may you flee for refuge to Christ Jesus! trust him for every thing, follow him in every thing: take him alone for your guide and teacher, and cease to "lean unto your own understanding." '

The next letter contains a faithful and affectionate appeal made to a beloved relative under affliction. It cannot fail of interesting the reader, as a specimen of that natural affection, which we have before noticed under the constraining influence of the principles of the gospel.

Nov. 26, 1829.

'How very sorry your letter has made us! I can conceive nothing more heart-breaking than the situation you are now all in. I intreat you most earnestly, my dearest ——, to seek comfort in earnest prayer, for your dear afflicted ——, and to try by every means in your power to lead him to the same source of comfort. I know he cannot now bear to have much said to him; but a verse occasionally read to him, or a short and affectionate prayer offered up with him, might be blessed by our merciful God to his eternal good. I will endeavour to join my prayers with yours; if it should please God to lead him to the source of all peace, you may one day look back with joy upon this affliction. May it lead you all to flee more earnestly for refuge to the hope that is set before you! Tell my dear —— with my most affectionate love, that I beseech him to think of, and to pray over these words—"Come unto me, all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Surely he may look upon this invitation as peculiarly addressed to himself. If ever there was one weary and heavy laden in mind and body, it is ——: O let me implore him to accept the offer, which infinite mercy holds out to him: let him cast his weary soul upon the love of Jesus; let him take all his sins and sorrows, and spread them at the feet of one who is willing to forgive, mighty to save, a present help in every time of trouble, to every one, without exception, who is willing to be forgiven, helped, saved, and abundantly comforted with the comfort which springs from his love, and which is, like himself, infinite and eternal.

'O my dear ——, with whom I have enjoyed so many happy hours, which will never fade from my memory; from whom I have received such repeated acts of kindness; and whom I love more as a parent than any other relation, suffer me to speak very earnestly to you; and take my words, I entreat you, as kindly and affectionately as they are meant. I cannot but long and pray, that you may "be comforted with the consolation wherewith I myself have been comforted of God." I have tried it, dearest ——; and I have tried the comfort which the world has to give; and I have found the one deep, and satisfactory, and lasting; and the other vain, and empty, and transitory. You are, as I am, a sinner, a miserable sinner; and, unless you flee to Jesus for refuge, you cannot escape the wrath of God, which is revealed against all sin. You have lived in the neglect of these things, and have cared too little what would become of your soul. But is this any reason for despair, or even for discouragement? Oh! no. Christ still invites—nay, even beseeches—you to come to him; and tells you in his word, that he is perfectly willing, and perfectly "able to save all that come unto God by him." The greatness of our sins need not prevent us; for his "blood cleanseth from all sin:" he died for sinners, even the chief of sinners. Our ignorance need not dishearten us; for "he teacheth sinners in the way." O come unto this "meek and lowly," this strong and mighty, Saviour! He is too meek and gentle to reject, and too strong and faithful to disappoint, any that come.

'Dear ——, my heart is full. What can I say to induce you to seek peace and happiness in the pardon of your sins through Jesus Christ? It is but asking you to be full of happiness and joy; for thus I know it will be with you, if you take the God of all comfort for your God. And do but think, how wonderful and unspeakable his condescension in offering to be our God, and friend, and father, "for ever and ever, our guide even until death," our "everlasting portion and reward." Only think, how dreadful, that he should be willing to save us, and we unwilling to give ourselves up to be saved and blessed by him! Can this be your case? It must not—it must not be so with you. You cannot reject the invitations of the gospel, and say to God, who beseeches you to be reconciled to him—'No—I will not be reconciled; I will not pray to the God of my salvation.' I am sure the thought strikes you with horror. You cannot rightly seek God without the aid of the Holy Spirit; but you will receive this aid upon asking; for "God will give his Holy Spirit to them that ask him." May he both teach you to pray, and hear and answer your prayer! May he relieve your suffering body, if it be his will, and comfort your distressed soul. Amen and amen. If my dear —— can bear thus much read to him, you will show it, or read it to him; and let us both pray, that he may know and feel the joy of being united to Christ.'

To another friend she wrote from her sick bed, nearly in the same strain.

'I lie here sometimes, and think what a poor useless creature I am. But if I might be made the happy means of inducing my dear and kind friend to cast himself, and all his sorrows, and sins, and uneasiness, at the feet of the Saviour of sinners, then I should think I had indeed lived to some purpose. I have often wanted to write to you; but the fear that you would think me unkind or assuming in intruding my thoughts upon you, has prevented me. But what a foolish and wicked fear this was, when the salvation of your precious soul was in question! Yes, my dear ——, I will frankly own to you, that the sickness of your body, distressing as it is to me, afflicts me not half so much as the sickness of your soul. I greatly fear that you have not yet found peace in the pardon of your sins through Jesus Christ. I write to you as a sinner, saved by God's grace, to a sinner, whom the grace of God, and that alone, can save. I would not be so cruelly heartless as to flatter you, and to say, "peace, peace, while there is no peace." But I do know that there is pardon and peace too, for every one, who feeling his sins to be many and grievous, flies to Jesus Christ for refuge; and it is thus that I conjure you to fly to him.

'O my dear ——, how long has this gracious Saviour been knocking at the door of your heart! By his Scriptures, which you have read; by the sermons and religious books that have come into your hands; by the secret strivings of his Spirit with your heart and conscience; by the afflictions wherewith he was afflicted, and still afflicts you; by all these things he knocks, he sues for admission. He will not let you rest till you open the door; and why? because he loves you; he would make you happy in this world, and happy for ever. He would be to you a friend, on whom you might safely lean; on whose constant love you might safely confide; one who would never leave nor forsake you; never be weary of nor slight you; never for one moment be unable or unwilling to listen to you, bless you, and relieve you.

'Such a friend as Jesus Christ to all those who fly to him for salvation. May he be your friend and Saviour for ever! This is the sincere prayer of,

'M. J. G.'

The tenderness and consideration with which she enforced these supremely important subjects upon her young friends, is noticed by those who were experimentally acquainted with it. Her gentleness and self-command were often put to the test by the coldness, petulance, or dislike with which her exhortations were received. But there was no reproach or upbraiding on her part—no anger or contempt on account of the foolish things that were said; nor did she ever show the less interest in promoting amusements more after the heart of her companions. She was known sometimes to weep in tenderness, when a fault was confessed to her—but never at that time to reprove. Sometimes her humility and affectionate delicacy would rebuke the carelessness of her friend, by the acknowledgment of her own coldness and neglect. Thus she would lead her more thoughtless companion to unite with herself in supplication for pardon and grace. So truly was she a "fellow-worker with her God," in "drawing with the bands of love."

Connected with this was her tender and Christian faithfulness in giving reproof, where she considered it to be needed. The following is an instructive specimen of the mode and spirit, in which this high obligation will be most effectually discharged. After giving a slight sketch of some of the leading doctrines of the gospel, she brings them home in a direct and close application to the conscience of her friend.

'And now, beloved ——, let me turn from every other consideration to yourself, and the state of your own mind. For you have rightly judged that I cannot think that the state of your ——, or any other person ought to have the least influence in preventing you from seeking the salvation of your own soul. The question is not, what do others do to be saved? But "what must I do to be saved?" You tell me that I am severe. Indeed I would not willingly be so. A miserable sinner myself, saved only by the free mercy of God, what right have I to be severe upon others? But I am "affectionately desirous of you" in the Lord Jesus; and therefore, as my beloved friend, I warn you. I fail in my duty to you, unless I tell you the truth. It may seem harsh to appear to have any doubt of your state; but it is kinder to lead you to examine now, than to leave you to the bare possibility of finding yourself deceived when it is too late. If then what I am now going to say, should seem to you more severe than ever, I entreat you, dearest ——, to forgive me for the sake of the motive which impels me to do so. Consider that I am not now speaking of any trifling thing. The more I love you, the more impossible I find it to stand upon ceremony, while I am trembling for your soul. My fears then about your state are not excited by what I have heard. Had you become a very decided and devoted Christian, I think I should have heard of it from many quarters. In some it would have been noticed with delight; in others, with wonder; in others, with dislike and disapprobation. But my fears are drawn chiefly from the querulous and worldly strain, in which most of your letters to me are written. I know that "if you have not the Spirit of Christ, you are none of his." This spirit must be known by its fruits. "And the fruits of the Spirit are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Now I look earnestly, anxiously, for some of these fruits. I look for some sign that "the love of God is shed abroad in your heart by the Holy Ghost which is given to you." This love would show itself in love to others; in love even to your enemies, if you had any. But I fear you are indulging in feelings little short of hatred to more than one of your fellow-creatures. I fear that wrath, strife, disputations, envyings, jealousies, are too often more predominant in your heart than love.—Again, I look for some evidence of that "joy and peace in believing," that "peace and joy in the Holy Ghost," which form so great a part of the "kingdom of God" within us. Even mourning Christians must sometimes feel a little of this in their hearts. But sure I am, that if "the peace of God which passeth all understanding, did keep your heart and mind in Christ Jesus," you could not be so much fretted and discomposed by the petty discontents, and trials, and offences of a world, whose frowns and whose smiles you would feel to be equally beneath your regard.

'You would remember that your lot has been chosen for you by a wise and loving Father, and that the most vexatious events in it happen by his permission, and for your good. Whenever we feel inclined to murmur, dear ——, at "our light afflictions," let us think of those faithful servants of God, who "had trial of cruel mockings, and scourgings, yea, moreover of bonds and imprisonments; who were stoned, were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword, who wandered about in sheep skins and goat skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented." Yet these "destitute, afflicted, tormented," ones, "in patience possessed their souls." "The peace of God kept their hearts and minds;" and shall it not keep ours, in our comparatively no-sufferings? Now if these "fruits of the Spirit, love, joy, peace," flourish in the heart, they must show themselves to be there: and if the contrary dispositions—anger, dissatisfaction, restlessness, appear in their stead, it proves either that "we have not the Spirit of Christ, and therefore are none of his;" or else that we have "grieved that Holy Spirit," and caused him for a time to withdraw his sacred influences. In either case we ought not to rest, till we have sought and obtained that "godly sorrow," for sin, "which worketh repentance unto salvation not to be repented of." Where we may apply for this repentance, we are told in Acts v. 31. I will go on no longer in enumerating these fruits of the Spirit; for my business is not to judge you, but to lead you to judge and examine yourself. This I earnestly entreat you to do, "that you may not be judged of the Lord." And should you now, dearest ——, feel offended with me, it will give me the less uneasiness—both because I know that you will not in the end love me the less for having faithfully discharged my conscience towards you before I die; and because I know that you will view it in a very different light at our next meeting, which will, I hope and trust, be around the throne of God and the Lamb.'

Her love to her Saviour must have been already prominently remarked by every intelligent reader. She lived much in distinct, deep, and fixed contemplation of him. Those parts of Scriptures were especially valuable, that brought her into closer contact with the subject nearest her heart—the love of Christ. The book of Canticles was therefore to her "a garden of delights." Her pure and spiritual mind enabled her to study this holy book with the liveliest and most profitable interest. Many Christians, in an over-scrupulous delicacy and unscriptural taste, seem almost to have proscribed this portion of the sacred canon from their private meditation. The book indeed is an exposition of the heavenly privilege of communion with our Divine Saviour. It can only therefore be understood by those who can say—"Truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ." The perusal of it moreover must be admitted to require a peculiar abstraction from earthly things. But the Christian's heart under divine teaching, will be a spiritual interpreter of it; and whenever it is approached with reverence, simplicity, and sanctity, it will tend much to the enkindling of holy affections in the endearing contemplation of condescending love; in a self-abasing sense of backslidings; in a heavenly enjoyment of the presence of the Lord; in commending his person to all around us; in a panting desire for a closer communion with him; and in a joyous anticipation of his coming.

But Miss Graham's love to her Saviour was not confined to spiritual contemplation. It was a principle of incessant activity, directing her daily Christian habit (to use her own beautiful language to one of her correspondents), to 'watch with the eye of love every intimation of his will, every leading of his Spirit.' Such is the difference between speculating upon religion, and feeling it—when the heart has "tasted that the Lord is gracious"—when the man is made—"a new creature"—when his eyes have been opened to behold the beauty of his Saviour—and he is anxiously cultivating every temper of the gospel, in which he may live above the world, and walk with Christ.

Miss Graham's happy anticipations of eternity were connected with this love to her Saviour. That which gave, in her eyes, emphasis and perfection to eternal bliss was—that it is all Christ—that the "Lamb is the light" of the heavenly city. Thus we find her writing a new year's congratulation to a dear friend in the heart-stirring remembrance—that "now is our salvation nearer than when we believed."

Stoke, Jan. 1, 1827.

'This time last year we were together. Does it seem as if a year had passed since then? Another year of sin on our part, and of mercy free and uninterrupted on the part of our Jesus! There is something very sweet in the thought that we are a year nearer to his bosom; that every year will pass as swiftly as the last, till he calls us to himself; and that nothing can happen next year, or any following year, which can possibly separate us one single moment from his love. Perhaps this time next year we may be like him, "seeing him as he is," joining in a song new indeed to our tongues, because it will be a triumphant song, and a holy and an everlasting song.'

Her love of prayer formed one of the main features of her character. Every habit of her mind appeared to flow in the spirit and atmosphere of prayer. The playful exercise of her youth were in this sanctified temperament. When her cousin visited her, the day was usually commenced with a chapter from her favourite Bible, accompanied with prayer, that they might both love and serve him, of whom that book testified. This service performed, she instantly turned all the warmth and animation of her affectionate temper, and all the powers of her highly-gifted mind to the amusement of her companion. We have already noticed the connexion of this habit with her intellectual employments, whether indulging her own gratifications, or superintending the instruction of her cousin. Hers was not the unsanctified study, which is glitter, not gold. All was consecrated to the supreme object of life, and directed to this object by the constant influence of that principle, which ennobles earthly occupations, and stamps them with a heavenly glory. The occasional visits of her young friends found her in the same spiritual habit. 'Seldom,' as one of her schoolfellows has recorded, 'did I enter her little room, but she proposed the reading of the Bible, and would pour out her soul before her God with holy fervour and simplicity.' Her public exercises of Christian devotedness were conducted in the same spirit. When engaged in the work of Sunday School tuition, she had her set times of prayer with her young cousin (who was at that time associated with her) for themselves, their fellow-labourers, and their responsible charge; and frequently she would offer distinct and separate supplication for each child in their classes. Her reponsibility as a member of the ransomed family of God, led her (as we find from a letter shortly to be adduced) in the true spirit of sympathy to devote an hour every evening mainly to the subject of intercessory prayer. Besides these constant occasions, she set apart special times for secret dedication and communion with God. New-year's-day and birthdays were among these privileged seasons. It was one of her favourite plans to set apart occasionally a certain time exclusively for prayer and Scripture reading; and for this purpose all her other employments were removed from her sight. This was her preparation for any special engagement that was prospectively before her; and this course she recommended to her friends with beneficial effect. Another custom of somewhat similar character (and one that is happily making advance throughout the church in our day) was to prevail upon her confidential friends to set apart definite hours, when distant friends could meet together in one heart and one soul at the throne of their common Lord. Thus in the most extensive meaning of the Scriptural precept, she might be said to "pray without ceasing;" and, like the man after God's heart, "to give herself unto prayer."

Love to the whole word of God was also a prominent feature in her character. Indication of this holy pleasurable taste were visible in her childhood, in the large portions which she committed to memory. In an early excursion with one of her young friends, we find her reproaching herself for the small proportion of time which she had consecrated to the study of this precious volume. Whatever might be the ground for this self-accusation, it was however intended as a hint to her less thoughtful companion, and to introduce before her a plan that might be useful to them both—that of repeating portions of Scripture to each other when they met. Thus she made her own self-condemnation the vehicle of instruction to her friend. Generally speaking, she read the Sacred Book as a pleasure, not as a task. It seemed to be her constant food and study. She did indeed "esteem the words of God's mouth more than her necessary food." They "were found, and she did eat them; and they were to her as the joy and rejoicing of her heart." They were to her what Melancthon calls 'that sacred manna of the soul, to which St. Paul alludes, when he speaks of spiritually discerning' the sacred pages. Often under protracted bodily and spiritual trials, the promises were to her "as cold waters to a thirsty soul;" yea, as "life from the dead." So eager was her appetite for this heavenly manna, that, not satisfied with her own gathering, she was always longing to feed upon the fruits of the industry of her friends. Thus we have found her intreating her confidential correspondent to communicate to her any additional and interesting light which had been found in the course of her Scriptural research. Even in those seasons of special consecration just alluded to, when she found her mind indisposed for spiritual reading, she would still cleave exclusively to the Scriptures, and give up her time and mind to learning large portions of this holy book. It was her practice to read through different books of Scripture with a close and persevering habit of meditation and prayer, always keeping in mind her Master's stimulating motive to the search—"For they are they which testify of me." Hence she was delighted in the course of her study of the Book of Proverbs to have Christ so much and so frequently brought before her mind; a recollection of great moment for the spiritual discernment of the Divine wisdom treasured up in this store-house of practical instruction. The encouraging promise held out to diligent investigators of the Sacred Volume on one occasion fixed her in intense meditation for upwards of two hours. She appeared to be lost in astonishment and gratitude at the condescension and kindness of God, in giving a promise so rich, so free, so encouraging. She grasped it, as if determined not to let it go. She frequently employed herself in the profitable exercise of "comparing spiritual things with spiritual"—Scripture with itself; thus making God his own interpreter. Much light and heavenly unction she conceived herself to have obtained by this means, which were manifested to others, unconsciously to herself, in her striking remarks and apt illustrations of passages presented to her. The wholeness of her study already noticed is worthy of careful consideration. There was no exclusive regard or undue prominence given to portions of the sacred book. "All" was regarded as "given by inspiration of God," and therefore profitable for the specific purposes for which it was written, and which it is the exercise of prayer and diligence to investigate.

But we will state her admirable views of the temper requisite for the study of the Sacred Book in her own words.

'We shall never'—she remarks—'become perfectly reconciled to all parts of the word of God, until He himself bestows on us the spirit and temper of a little child, to receive, without murmuring or disputings or carnal reasonings, whatsoever Jehovah the Spirit is pleased to say to us. That Spirit alone can take away the evil heart of unbelief, which prevents us from embracing the whole counsel of God, as revealed in his word. It is he that must open our hearts to attend to all the things written in his law. Then we shall perceive a connection and a harmony between every part and every doctrine of the Scriptures, which will fill us with ever-increasing wonder and delight.'

Her childlike simplicity was the spirit of the most profound reverence. It is most edifying to remark her humble adoring search into "the deep things of God," as contrasted with the unhallowed boldness with which these unfathomable depths are too often explored. After noticing objections to her views of the doctrine of election, she checks herself—

'But I stop; "he that reproveth God, let him answer it." All these mysteries can be accounted for only by referring them to the inscrutable mystery of God's predestination. To the eye of carnal reason they lie involved in the thickest obscurity; but the eye of faith sees in them no darkness at all. For faith, instead of vainly striving to pull these things down to the level of reason, soars far above reason; resolves every difficulty into the gracious will or wise permission of God, and seeks to know no further. How many things are there which I know not, nor "can by" any "searching find out to perfection!" But Jesus knows them all. With this assurance I sit down fully satisfied. He will teach them to me hereafter, as I am able to bear it. In the meantime "I will trust, and not be afraid." All that my God says to me I will implicitly believe, for I know that "every word of God is pure." "All the words of his mouth are in righteousness: there is nothing froward or perverse in them: they are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge." When I come to see God as he is, and to "know even as also I am known," I shall find that all these mysteries of his word and will were only 'dark with excessive light.' In the meantime, till I have the eagle eye that can gaze undazzled at his glories, I will view them at humble distance through the glass of faith which he has given me for this purpose; nor will I dare to repine, because I can only see them in a glass darkly. Thus faith removes every objection, stills every murmur, and silences every doubtful thought.'

This "trembling at God's word," is the spirit which our Lord "delighteth to honour" with special manifestations of his favour. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and he will show them his covenant." This temper will stimulate to an earnest and diligent search; while it will repress a presumptuous intrusion. It will lead to the reception of every truth upon this formal reason—that it is the word of God. Every truth, though it should not be considered of equal importance, must be regarded with equal reverence; never fogetting that God is the author of every particle of revelation. Therefore to reject any one 'jot or tittle of it'—as Dr. Owen has excellently observed—'is a sufficient demonstration, that no one jot or tittle of it is received as it ought. Upon whatever this title and inscription is—'The word of Jehovah'—there must we stoop and bow down our souls before it, and captivate our understandings to the obedience of faith."

Her love for the ordinances of God—is worthy of special remark. And this indeed is the pulse of the soul—not attendance on them, but delight in them—fellowship with the panting desires of the holy Psalmist—when he envied even the birds who inhabited the pinnacles of the temple, and the priests who were always employed in its service; and for himself counted "a day spent in God's courts better than a thousand" spent elsewhere. The house of God had been to her in the time of health "the gate of heaven." In her time of affliction, ministers and ordinances were to her "wells of salvation," from whence she "drew water with joy." "Beautiful" in her eyes "were the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace." She loved the messengers of the gospel "for their work's sake," and for their Master's sake. She always expressed the deepest anxiety to receive through them "a message from God" to her soul. 'Pray before, as well as after your visit'—was her solemn entreaty to her beloved minister.

We must not forget to mention her "love to the brethren"—that conscious and unequivocal mark of a transition "from death unto life." She longed to see, converse, and enjoy fellowship with all, who bore the image of her Lord; and whether absent or present, she seemed to hold communion with them. Speaking of an absent friend, who appeared to enjoy a deep sense of 'the love of God upon her heart'—she said—'I long to see her, that she may impart to me some spiritual gift.' On this subject she appears to have been drawn out with remarkable warmth and liveliness of Christian feeling in her correspondence with her friends. To one of them she wrote thus—'It is a great honour for us, who have been made partakers of the tempter's work, to be made partakers of the Saviour—for us who have been made a curse, to be made a blessing. But when I write to you in this way, it is not so much because I feel it, as because I want to feel it, and desire to be made the instrument of "stirring up this gift of God in you."'

What reader but must long to imbibe the blessed spirit of the two following letters?

April 9, 1827.

'I intreat you to think more of the privilege of intercession, and to make more use of it than ever. I find an indescribable delight in using these words—"Our Father"—and in praising, confessing, and praying for myself as one of this large family—in praying for myself as one with them, and in feeling their joys and sorrows as my own. And indeed if we wish above all things that the name of Jesus be glorified, is it not glorified in the spirituality of others as much as in our own? And if we wish to be one with Jesus, should we not be also one with his elect? Tell me your difficulties and necessities, that I may present them to Jesus with my own. I do not say this, because I think that I have the strength to do it. But Jesus, our God and our Lord (who is with me whilst I write, and who will be with you whilst you read this letter) has said to you and to me—"My grace is sufficient for you." 'Oh Lord Jesus! see what I have written, and show that I do not expect too much from thee. Cause every affection of ours to be absorbed in thee; and may all thy sheep love thee above all, and love one another as thou hast loved them!' Say—Amen to this prayer. And if you wish to know what to ask for me, ask that a spirit of perfect love, "which seeketh not her own," may be given me.'

Again, about a month after, to the same—

May 5, 1827.

'I beseech you to seek earnestly "the communion of saints." This is the only progress I have made in the Divine life. I have received as a most precious and unmerited gift the power of feeling the things of the flock of Christ as if they were my own. You cannot imagine the happiness of this feeling. The means through which the Father has given it to me, has been the Lord's prayer. I dedicate (not always, because I am so light and unstable, but generally) an hour every evening to prayer, and principally to intercession. I generally begin with the thanks due to God, for having made himself known to us as our Father, for all that he has done for every one of his sheep on that day. It is impossible for me to tell you the great delight of thus mixing myself up with the people of Christ, and of considering their benefits as my own. The thought which transports me the most, is that of how many souls have been perhaps this day joined to the church! how many succoured under temptation! how many recovered from their backslidings! how many filled with consolation! how many transported by death into the bosom of Christ! It delights me much also to consider that all the elect, who are not yet converted, have been and will be preserved, till they are called by the Divine Spirit I then try to pray for that sweet "we," and to think of the necessities of my Christian friends. Besides, I have a list of unconverted persons for whom I wish to pray. I do intreat you to study with prayer the thirteenth chapter of 1st Corinthians. I am most anxious that you should enjoy this happiness; and if you ask, you will do so.'

In the next letter we find her mind exercised upon this interesting subject.

'It seemed to me when I last wrote to you, that the law of love to the brethren was engraven on my heart. But I feel little of it now. It was like writing on sand. Oh! that all the flock of Christ had more, very much more, of this law. O that thirteenth of Corinthians! Do read and pray over it. There is love—such love as we want—the whole law written in our hearts. I wish the Lord would give me to say something to stir you up to pray more for love; and then, when you are quite full of love, that he would make you the means of conveying it to me. I would have you pray over 1 John iv. 16—21. as well as 1 Cor. xiii. We must first "know and believe the love which God hath towards us." That will make us love.'

To another beloved friend she expresses herself with similar warmth and intensity.

'How shall I, who am so full of sin, think to say any thing that may be useful to you, my dear friend? Yet perhaps, "the comfort, wherewith I have been comforted of God," in trying to spread your sorrows before him, may be communicated to your soul, while I am telling you of it; for —blessed be Jesus—we are all one—members of the same body. "It is given us in behalf of Christ to suffer" and rejoice with one another. When I was trying to pray, I endeavoured to think of a verse, which I might plead with God, and which might encourage myself. The Lord put this into my heart—"Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also, which shall believe on me through their word—(for us;) that they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." But oh! the comfort that filled my soul, when I thought Jesus had lifted up this prayer for you long before you were born! that he has had it in his heart for you (and for me too, and all God's people, who all need it as much) ever since! that he is praying the same thing for us now! and finally, that "the Father heareth him always!" Therefore, the Father has heard, does hear, and will hear, this most gracious petition, which the Lord Jesus offered in the midst of his disciples, and which God the Spirit brought to their remembrance for our encouragement—"that we all may be one, as he is one with the Father." Yes—and we all shall be one, though Satan and all his angels conspire to divide us. He can no more separate us from the love of one another, than he "can separate us from the love of Christ." Truly, we have fellowship one with another; and "we know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren." May you be enabled to use more boldness at the throne of grace, to "draw near in full assurance of faith," and claim what Jesus, who cannot ask in vain, has asked of the Father for you—a full and abiding enjoyment of that love to the brethren—that fellowship—that oneness with the saints, which is just as much yours as Christ is yours! It is a part of your purchased possession; and nothing can keep you out of your right, but your own want of faith to plead that right with a God, who is more ready to give than we to ask.'

Would that these enlivening sentiments of Christian love were universally diffused! Our Lord's wonderful prayer on this subject is indeed, as Miss Graham observes, an answered prayer—that is, in its incipient and progressive results. Yet, it is only a specimen of that intercession, with which he has pledged himself, that "for Zion's sake he will not hold his peace, and for Jerusalem's sake he will not rest," until his Father shall make his "Jerusalem a praise in the earth." The plenary blessing is yet in store for us. We want increased exertion and expectancy as a means of preparation for it. We want to change our indolent anticipation of this union perfected in heaven for the immediate personal exercises of faith, patience, forbearance, and humility, by which "our hearts may be knit together in love," even in the midst of the incessant conflicts of the church; and we shall then be ready to help each other's labours, and hail each other's success.

The present aspect of the church is indeed most afflicting. We would not narrow the necessary breach between the church and the world by any compromise of principle or of conscience. But how painful is it to "see the breaches of the city of David, that they are many!" When will our Zion appear in "the perfection of beauty?"—as "a city compact together?" "For the divisions of" one tribe in Israel "there were great searchings of heart." How careful, therefore, ought the scrutiny to be, when the evil spirit appears to be spreading throughout the whole camp! It is not an ideal prospect that we picture to our imagination—but that "good and pleasant sight" to behold of "brethren dwelling together in unity." Such was the church in her primitive glory, when "the whole multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul"—when 'the church'—as Chrysostom observes—'was a little heaven.'

The motives to attempt, as far as in us lies, the restoration of this glory to the church are most constraining—such as fellowship with the spirit and prayer of our glorious Head—his honour in the world exalted by this heavenly spectacle—the Church in every part "edifying itself in love"—the Christian profession established—and the consoling privileges of the gospel manifested and enjoyed.

The strength to promote this union in the Church will be found in deep self-abasement and wrestling intercession with our God. Let us enter in the spirit of the earnest pleadings of the "man after God's heart" for his people. "O God, thou hast cast us off; thou hast scattered us; thou hast been displeased; O turn thyself to us again. Thou hast made the earth to tremble; thou hast broken it; heal the breaches thereof, for it shaketh." Impossible that "the Lord should" long "be angry against the prayer of his people!"

The Scriptural rules for maintaining this union are most simple and explicit.—"Whereunto we have already attained, let us walk by the same rule; let us mind the same thing." "Him that is weak in the faith, receive"—not cast off. "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves." These rules are enforced by the example, no less than by the authority of our gracious Head, and directed to the highest end—"Receive ye one another, as Christ also received us, to the glory of God." Great indeed is the difficulty of holding conscientious differences in brotherly love. We are too apt to magnify the points of difference, while the due proportion of the points of agreement is somewhat obscured. We are more ready to dispute upon the points of controversy, than to strengthen each other in brotherly communion upon the principles of Christian love and unity. Thus our inordinate love of our own opinions leads us to press them beyond their legitimate bounds, and even beyond our sober intentions; and from this defect of connecting humility and forbearance with faith, many schisms arise in the body.

Would that there were among us one heart and one purpose, to exalt our Divine Master—to let every name be lost in his—to desire no name to be great but his! But the canker of the church is that party spirit—more or less common to all—which unites the several communities upon their own private grounds, instead of forming a rallying point for the whole body. A tame compromise of conscience is indeed greatly to be deprecated. Yet, unless private selfishness, (sometimes cloaking itself under the garb of conscience,) and party Shibboleths be merged in Christian love, no holy brotherly communion can exist. We do not expect brother to yield to brother, but each to submit his conscience to his great Head—each member to grow up into him, and to recollect, that he has some individual sentiment to forbear, from a considerate regard to the unity of the body. It seems to be forgotten, that Divine truth in all its parts and connections is fully revealed to none—that the degrees of attainment in Scriptural knowledge are indefinitely varied—that every difference in religion is not a different religion—that there is a want of perfection and singleness in the clearest eye, that is an inlet for the partial introduction of darkness—and that all of us are, more or less, criminally warped by the school in which we have been trained, by the atmosphere in which we live, or by the difference of our own tempers and habits of thinking. Hence it is evident, that a sincere reception of the first principles of the gospel lays a solid basis; and that in lesser points "forbearing one another in love," is the only satisfactory means of "keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." Indeed, 'substantial harmony, combined with circumstantial variety,' (as Paley remarks of the evidence of testimony) is the only practicable catholicity; and to attempt a more entire agreement in detail would be a certain breach in the concord of the universal church. Yet, though unity of opinion is impracticable, unity of faith is to be constantly aimed at; and this may be consistent with a great diversity of individual character, and even with many shades of doctrinal differences.

But let us not be "ignorant of Satan's devices." Too successfully does he succeed by division among the friends of Christ, to prevent the united assault upon his own kingdom. Let us descend from our lesser disputes to the field of the conflict between the great powers of light and darkness. Let us "come to the help of the Lord—to the help of the Lord against the mighty." The voice of God to his Church is—"Love the truth and peace." We love neither, if we love not both. If, in the professed cause of "truth" we tear the consciences of our brethren, and wound the "peace" of the Church, perhaps we may expect one common storm, one uniting bond of suffering—to be the Lord's appointed means of humbling and chastising his Church, and accomplishing his gracious purposes by the instruments of his loving correction.

CHAPTER VI.

Her illness and death.

The period of her illness embraces a large portion of what in her case, as her father observes, 'might be not untruly called, "that long disease—her life."' From her childhood, her health was very delicate; and the long illness which occasioned her leaving school, left a debility in her constitution, from which she suffered more or less to the end of life. Violent pains in her head, chest, and side, appeared however to be the commencement of that disease, which gradually developed a fatal character. For some years she was indeed able to exert herself, too often much beyond her strength, both in bodily and mental activity. She continued her intellectual studies with her usual vigour, till about a year after her settlement in Devon, when increasing illness constrained her to send her young pupil to school, and she was never afterwards enabled, though she much wished it, to resume the care of her education. From that time she became a decided invalid, and, except in the year 1827, when she changed the scene for the benefit of her health, she never moved beyond the garden, and only two or three times ventured into the outward air.* For the last two years she was entirely confined to her room, and unable to be dressed. During the whole of this period, her anxious mother slept in her chamber, watching over her with the most unremitting tenderness. She generally kept her bed, till within the last seven or eight months, when a violent cough, and spasms in the heart, prevented a reclining position, except when she was compelled to return to it by fainting and exhaustion. The only resource was a chair well supported with pillows, in which she sat up day and night, and from which the assistance of three persons was required to remove her during the last few weeks of her life. She appeared however to suffer less from debility than many invalids. For though she was wholly unable to stand, yet a change of medical regimen appeared to give her temporary relief from distressing helplessness.

In this state of wearisome languor and pain, her mind however was always vigorous and full of energy. She never seemed to know an idle moment. During the whole period of confinement to her bed, she was always surrounded with books, or other objects that engaged her attention. It was her habit to have her table placed by her bed-side every night with her books and writing materials, that she might commence her operations with the earliest dawn of light. Her beloved Bible was always under her pillow, the first thing in her hand in the morning, and the last at night. Subordinate to this object of supreme interest, her diligence and perseverance in study were most remarkable. When reminded that such intense application must be injurious to her health, she always replied, that she considered these diversified sources of interest as among her greatest temporal blessings, in diverting her mind and attention from her bodily ailments. Her studies in the sick room were as varied as in the time of health. Sometimes the languages were taken up. At other times the more engrossing study of mathematics fixed her mind. This in its turn was exchanged for chemistry or botany. Occasionally, when her mind was less equal to exertion, she would amuse herself with lighter employments. In the spring of her last year, she attempted to dry flowers which her parents procured for her, with the intention of forming an herbarium. But increasing indisposition frustrated this plan. Cutting out paper was also a favourite amusement, in which she early excelled. Her skilful use of the scissors had attracted in her young days the admiration and interest of her school-fellows. She was also a beautiful netter, and sent a number of purses to a bazaar, to be sold for the benefit of her dear Spanish friends, which produced upwards of three pounds to their fund. Thus in these various employments did her mind maintain its ceaseless activity, both in intellectual indulgence, and in all the exercises of practical devotedness. No opportunity of usefulness appeared to be forgotten. When detained from the house of God by her protracted indisposition, her time and interest were employed in explaining the Scriptures to the servant who was necessarily occupied in attendance upon her; and in one instance it was hoped, as well as in a former case of much earlier date, that her simple and spiritual instructions in the household were applied with Divine unction and sovereign grace to the heart.

As, however, her illness evidently approached its termination, her employments assumed a character more exclusively spiritual. She was occupied in girding up her loins, and trimming her lamp, in constant and delighted expectation of her Lord's immediate coming.

* Of one of these times the following memorandum occurs in a letter to her cousin. 'To-day, I know not how, all my illness seems to have disappeared, and I feel much better, so that I have been out in the garden the second time since you left me. Ah! how delightful the weather was: what pleasure I felt in breathing the fresh air, in seeing the trees which begin to bud, the spring-flowers which are appearing, and in hearing the song of the birds, who seem to rejoice no less than myself in this new season.'

And now it was, that the Christian graces which had been matured in the school of affliction, and under the influence of habitual communion with her God, displayed more manifestly their holiness, beauty, and consolation. This was (as an excellent clergyman before adverted to wrote to her father) the fiery chariot, her vehicle to heaven, in which—the more it shook her mortal frame, until it left it all behind—the stronger and more full of faith and triumph in Christ Jesus she grew in her immortal spirit.'

A detailed account of this last period of her mortal career will, it is presumed, be found generally interesting. In these solemn seasons is every feature more accurately defined; while the colouring is heightened by the impressive manifestation of the love and faithfulness of our God and Saviour.

To the last, her habits of active employment were predominant. Her thoughts and time were much occupied in preparing her two small, but valuable, works for publication; and she continued to correct the proof sheets of them as they were sent to her, till within a few days of her death. At first her mind was divided between the completion of her projected Series of Letters to a Governess, and the work—On the Freeness of Divine Grace. But mature deliberation decided her in favour of the latter, as being calculated for more extensive usefulness. She was indefatigable also in her correspondence with her friends, upon the principle of duty, in using every opportunity of setting forth the grand and inviting subject of the gospel to her fellow-sinners. She continued to write even after she was unable to use her pen, and when having had just power to direct a pencil, her wrist had been bound up to give her a little strength. The following extracts form her letters, during this solemn season of daily expectancy, marks the character of her mind. We select an illustration at some length of the intense anxiety, with which she regarded the spiritual interest of those that were dear to her, and of the earnest, awakening, and yet encouraging application of the privileges of the gospel, to fix them to an entire devotedness to their eternal concerns.

Stoke Fleming, Sept. 28, 1830.

'"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the children of God?" This love should be enough for us. Come pain, sickness, poverty, affliction; and still the Christian must rejoice, when he considers "what manner of love the Father has bestowed on him." Reconciled to God; redeemed by Christ Jesus; sanctified, taught, and comforted by the Spirit; what is there in the world that can rob him of his joy? "Who shall separate him from the love of Christ." And as long as he has this love, how shall he not "rejoice with joy unspeakable, and full of glory?"

'My dear ——, I would stir up your heart to make this joy your joy. O that my God would give me words of power and persuasion, and send them by his Spirit to your heart! "Awake thou that sleepest;" awake, awake. Time is passing—eternity is at hand. Thou must soon receive a crown of glory, or "cover thyself with thine own confusion as with a mantle." "Behold now is the accepted time. Seek the Lord now while he may be found, call upon him now while he is near. Draw nigh unto God, and he will draw nigh unto you." O let me remind you, not in a spirit of reproof, but of the most anxious, earnest affection, how long "the goodness of God has been leading you to repentance." I believe it is now ten years, or nearly so, since we were confirmed together. Then you seemed resolved to make the Lord indeed your God; to be no longer "conformed to this world," but to "come out from the world, and be separate;" to walk as "a stranger and pilgrim upon earth." Often since then have you appeared to be affected by the same feelings and desires. The time you spent with me here was marked by one blessed season, during which the word of God seemed to be your delight; prayer to God your chief comfort; and you expressed your entire renouncement of your own righteousness, and a simple trust in the atonement and righteousness of God your Saviour. Recall that precious time to your mind, my beloved friend. You were then beginning to be happy. Inquire how it was, that, instead of "going from strength to strength," from "glory to glory," from faith to faith," you relapsed so soon into your old uncomfortable state of mind, and have since found so little comfort in religion. Remember that now, even now, Christ is willing to receive you, to give you strength and peace, grace and glory; that he is able to save to the uttermost, and more willing to give than you to ask, more ready to hear than you to pray. Consider what an awful thing it is, to go on for many years, "halting between two opinions;" knowing your Lord's will and not doing it: visited by repeated convictions, yet those convictions producing no decided appearance of conversion. Consider all these things, and again I say unto you, Awake, awake! May God of his infinite goodness arouse you to a sense of the importance of eternal things! May he enable you to wait upon him in incessant and importunate prayer, till he has "blessed you," as he is most willing to do, "with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus."

When you come to die, all the trifles which now vex and disquiet you, will seem less than a drop of a bucket, than the small dust of the balance. But the concerns of your soul, of what immense importance will they appear! Why should they not now assume their real weight and value in your eyes? Death may either snatch you away suddenly, or be preceded by such violent illness, as to render you incapable of reflection. At such a time, how delightful will it be to be able to lean upon Christ, as an old friend, not to seek him as a new one! O my dear ——, you MUST find time to die, why will you not find time to prepare for death. You must shortly be in Heaven or in Hell! must feel the happy consequence of being pardoned and accepted in Christ, or the dreadful consequence of remaining in a state of guilt and condemnation. "There is now no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus; who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," who "mind not the things of the flesh, but the things of the Spirit, who "look not at the things which are seen and temporal, but at the things which are unseen and eternal," who "live not to themselves, but to him who died for them, and rose again," who have "their conversation, their treasure, their heart, in Heaven."

'Examine yourself, my beloved ——, whether you answer to this character. I can write no more now, but as long as I continue in the flesh, I hope I shall not cease from time to time to remind you of these things, to beseech you to give yourself to Christ.

'My health continues much as when —— last wrote. I suffer much at night, as I can never lie down in bed, but am obliged to be propped upright in an easy chair. But they do not seem to consider me now in any immediate danger, and if no sudden attack takes place, they seem to expect that I shall live over the winter, or even some time longer. All this is very uncertain; but I hope that I am willing to wait till my Saviour's time is come to call me home to himself. He doeth all things well, and I may truly say, that he has "made all my bed in my sickness." "His comforts delight my soul," and "in the night his song is with me, and my prayer to the God of my life is"—"Precious Saviour! Tender Father! Thou wilt cast out none that come to thee."

The following letter, written in the immediate prospect of eternity, is valuable as an exhibition of those views of the gospel, which will alone stay the soul in perfect peace at that awful juncture. It is salvation, rich, free, full, finished—not a matter of uncertainty, dependant upon our own efforts or righteousness; but ordained, wrought out, and applied by God—not connected with faith, repentance, and love, as our previous fitness for the reception of it, but including these graces as component parts of the inestimable gift, "afore prepared of God, that we should walk in them."

July 5, 1830.

'I find, my beloved friend, that in death no past good works, no holy endeavours or desires can give the least comfort, except as evidences that we have been accepted for Christ's sake. My sole confidence is—that I have cast my poor guilty soul entirely, and without reserve, on the free mercy of God in Christ Jesus; casting far from me every other hope. My good works—where are they? I can remember none. They are too poor to think of without the profoundest humiliation. My desires and endeavours—O my dear friend, I feel I should insult my holy God, by even naming them. They are, indeed, "coverings too narrow for any one to wrap themselves in," at the moment of entering into the presence of God. But my Saviour hath clothed me with his own perfect righteousness, and I wrap myself round in it with unspeakable feelings of security. I examine it on every side, and find it "perfect and entire, wanting nothing." I am not afraid in this my wedding garment, to appear even before the King of kings. I think I hear my Saviour perpetually saying to me—"Not for thy sake do I this, be it known unto thee; be ashamed and confounded for thine own ways." A sinful worm. May Jehovah, my Righteousness, my Tower and Strength, my Rock of defence, my Sun and my Shield, my complete Salvation—O may he be your God and Guide, for ever and ever.'

She was usually favoured throughout the last months of her life with a remarkable sense of the Divine presence. During times of extreme agony, 'Christ,' she said 'is with me, "touched with the feeling of mine infirmities." Her intercourse with God at this solemn season, while it was most intimate, was yet most hallowed. One evening, after a day of great bodily suffering, her cousin went into her chamber to take leave of her for the night. The room was darkened, and perfectly quiet; and the state of her soul seemed to accord with the outer tranquillity. She said—'I can scarcely speak to you. The sense I have of the presence of God is so powerful, that it almost overcomes me. He has often manifested himself to me; but never in such a manner as this night. Indeed I feel ready to exclaim with Job—"I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee." She said very little more, being evidently too deeply impressed to converse; but—her cousin adds—'I shall never forget that night.'

Yet this sacredness of feeling was mingled with cheerful delight. It was truly Hooker's 'reverend gaiety'—'Oh!' said she one day to a friend, 'he gives me to speak to him "face to face;" and sometimes, when I am so weak that I cannot utter words, his "Spirit helpeth my infirmities, and maketh intercession for me with groanings that cannot be uttered." I love to feel my weakness, that I may experience "his strength made perfect in weakness." I delight to lie low before him.'

She loved to speak of the character of God. Her mind appeared to be much expanded in the contemplation of his unsearchable nature and glorious perfections. 'How delightful' she observed on one occasion, 'to think that "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." All his dispensations are light; and though now they seem dark to us, hereafter, all clouds will be dispelled.'

Her desires for a clear and full knowledge of God were most intense. 'What'—she exclaimed one day—'are ten thousand worlds compared with one ray of the knowledge of God!' The ardour of her soul, unsatisfied with former manifestations, was continually stretched out for higher and deeper views of the Divine glory. She was not afraid to offer that prayer, which seems scarcely befitting an archangel's lips, and which only the clear warrant of the gospel preserves from the stamp of presumption. "I beseech thee; show me thy glory." Often did she intreat her minister to pray, that more might be revealed to her in this world. Nor was the petition unheard. For, in reply to her dear mother's question a day or two before her death, her answer was, 'I could not feel happier.'

The concentration of all her thoughts upon eternity was peculiarly striking and edifying to those around her. This main concern for the last few months of her life absorbed her entire interest. Nothing unconnected with it seemed to possess any claim upon her attention. The engrossing delights of intellectual study were relinquished for ever. She had no enjoyment of any train of conversation, except that which directly led her mind and contemplation heavenward. Communion with God was the one object of her desire. The word of God now occupied her whole attention. All other books—even her favourite authors—Romaine, Leighton, Milner—seemed comparatively uninteresting. This heavenly absorption of mind is finely depicted in the following short extract from one of her late letters to a friend:

Stoke Fleming, Oct. 1, 1830.

'My dear ——, knowing that my life hangs upon a thread, I dare not delay answering your letter: I pray God to enable me to speak the truth to you in love, and to dispose you not to think me "your enemy, because I tell you the truth." But I must, as long as I continue to live, continue to urge you on the subject of religion. I speak not now willingly on any other subject; I desire to have no more to do with earthly things, but to turn my whole joyful expectation to that blessed Saviour, whom I believe I shall soon see face to face, through that infinite undeserved love and kindness of his, which has taught me to put my whole trust in him for salvation.'

Connected with this feature, we may add, that she seemed so perfectly weaned from the world as scarcely to have an earthly wish. Several times she took leave of her beloved relatives. In parting with her young cousin about three months before her death, she writes—'I have not one earthly care or wish; for even my cares for her are now all cast upon God, whose tender love will, I trust, lead her all her life long, as it has led me. She is going one way, and I shall soon depart in another way; but I would wait patiently. One day earnestly recommending a friend to "cast all her care upon God"—she gave the same expression of her mind—'I have no earthly cares—no earthly wish. But' added she—'I have spiritual cares—spiritual wants; but I cast even them all upon God.' Christ and eternity filled up the whole vacuum, and left nothing else to be desired.

Resignation to the will of God was prominently marked during her illness, and was to her the source of much heavenly enjoyment. After meditating upon her Saviour's words—"My meat is to do the will of him that sent me,"—she observed,—'Though I cannot now do the will of my heavenly Father, I can suffer his will.' She looked forward with great calmness to a protracted life of suffering, when the medical attendant gave his judgment, that she might probably live for many years, but would never regain her health. As she was naturally of an energetic disposition, ardent in forming and executing her plans, this state of acquiescence to so inactive a life appeared manifestly to be the effect of Divine grace. Once indeed she remarked with tears, that the prospect of lying on that bed for many years—of seeing her friends die around her, and those whom she loved remove away (alluding to the anticipated removal of the Rector's family, which, however, she did not live to see) was a melancholy thought. But the passing cloud was soon dissipated, and she regained her usual cheerfulness.

The same warm temper of love to the Lord's people that had distinguished her general profession was ruling to the last. Even in her state of distressing weakness, she could not be satisfied without seeing some of them round her bed, that she might enjoy sensible communion with them. However weak they might be in faith, or low in condition, her heart was fervently drawn out in union with them. In referring to some refreshing intercourse with two eminent Christians—she observed—'How good my gracious God is in thus sending his saints to commune with me upon those deep and precious things which now form my only consolation—my "joy and the rejoicing of my heart." But'—added she—acknowledging the supremacy of her heavenly Friend—'after all, his presence is the only unfailing source of happiness. "With him is the fountain of life; in his light shall we see light."'

The expressions of her deep humility, were peculiarly striking during her illness. All her attainments in the Christian life were never thought of, but as dross and dung. Her sense of unprofitableness kept her low in the dust, while the recollections of faith, exercised in habitual application to the blood of her Redeemer, upheld her from despondency. When her minister ventured to express the advantage which his own soul had derived from attendance upon her, she exclaimed with vehemence—'How should such a dead dog as I am, be of any use?' She sometimes seemed, as if she could scarcely conceive the possibility of being the Lord's instrument for the good of his people, while at the same time she continued to employ her every power of body and mind in their service.

This self-abasing apprehension was, however, combined with ardent gratitude to God as the author, and to her friends as the channel, of all her mercies. Every attention, every act of kindness from her parents and nurses, excited the most lively emotions of thankfulness. Speaking one day of the kindness of her nurses, her minister observed,—'But oh! how kind, how much kinder is Christ.' 'Yes'—she replied—'but even all this kindness of the creature flows to me through his love, his kindness.' Thus did all her earthly comforts receive a double relish—thus also were her bitterest trials sweetened by being traced up to their Divine source, and by flowing into her soul through the delightful channel of the mediation of her Saviour.

The same flood that had nourished her throughout her journey, continued to supply strength and vigour for the last efforts. Her Bible was more invaluable than ever to her. It was her constant practice before she went to rest, to repeat a text to her beloved mother, and to require one in return—assigning as a reason, that she might have them to think upon after she was gone.* She pursued the same habit of Scriptural

* A few months before her death, she presented her little Bible to her mother, having obtained from her the assurance, that she would read a chapter every day with prayer. In order to keep this promise in mind, if the precious treasure was at any time out of repetition with her affectionate cousin—the constant attendant upon the last months of her illness—adding to it the privilege of social prayer, except when attacks of illness prevented it. "Ask, and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full"—was her favourite text to the last.

As in health, so especially in her last sickness, she had great delight in communion with the Holy Spirit. She used to address her prayers much to him, thought of his personality, and found the contemplation of it most refreshing to her soul. She would often speak with comfort of her expeperience of his distinct influence upon her heart.

Hymns were also a source of much refreshment to her soul. She used to repeat many to herself, especially during the night, and was thankful to the last to have them repeated to her. The last that her cousin read to her two days before her death, was one by Madame de Fleury, beginning, and Gambold's beautiful hymn,

'Ye angels, who stand round the throne,' &c.

'That I am thine, my Lord and God,' &c.

was a great favourite. Cowper and Toplady also, were a source of great delight to her.

She expressed to her minister her strong desire to receive the sacrament, the mention of which had been refrained by her friends on account of her great weakness and sudden attacks of violent pain. She feared, however, that she had too long neglected it, and could not be satisfied without the refreshment of this holy ordinance. When speaking of it before the administration—she said—'Oh! I desire a full communion. I long to see as many as possible of the dear children of God to partake with me of this blessed ordinance.' She expected, as she was justly warranted to do, a rich blessing in the fulfilment of the last command of her dying Lord. Nor was she disappointed. Twice she received the sacred emblems from the hands of the venerable rector of the parish (since departed to his rest); and in the following affecting letter written in pencil with great difficulty immediately after one of these occasions, she expressed to him her grateful acknowledgment of the consolations which he had instrumentally imparted to her soul.

'My dear Sir:—I thank you very affectionately for the comfort I have received to-day through your means. When I saw you, I regretted that I could not tell you so myself. But it is the Lord, who hath both dulled your power of hearing, and weakened my power of speaking; and he does it with both of us, to warn us gently, that these frail bodies must soon be quite taken to pieces, and lie till we are "clothed upon" with "a body like unto his glorious body." It will give you pleasure to know, that, while you administered the bread and wine, I was enabled to cast my whole soul as a miserable sinner on the free mercies of him, who died that we might live; and to rejoice in the thought of our meeting ere long, through the same free grace, at the marriage supper of the Lamb.

'I wish to write these few lines to explain my own feelings to you. For my dear mamma, in her anxious love, so much fears my seeing one, to whom she thinks I could not talk without exertion, that I fear it has never been properly explained to you, that though I feel unable to talk to you, I should be most happy to listen to you.

'Accept, my dear sir, the Christian love and thanks of your truly and gratefully attached,

'Mary Graham.'

The support which was vouchsafed to her in the midst of her intense bodily sufferings, was such as might have been expected from the known and tried faithfulness of her God. Such was her enjoyments at some seasons of agony—that her 'pains,' as she said on one occasion, "were sweeter than honey or the honey comb." At one of her times of distress she remarked—'I am a child lying in the arms of Christ, and he treats me with more than a mother's tenderness.' Truly, indeed, was she "strengthened with all might, according to the glorious power of God, unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness."

It is almost needless to add as the concluding article of detail—that the sting of death was removed from her.

'It is not death to me'—she would say—'Jesus hath tasted death for me, and hath drunk up all its bitterness.' The prospect of eternity was entirely divested of its terrors, and beamed with the bright anticipation of everlasting joy. We may take the following glowing view of her hopes given for the conviction of one of her young friends.

Aug. 7, 1830.

'I am going to mention a sentence in your letter which grieved me; not as it regards myself, but as it leads me to fear, that you are not fully acquainted with those things, which can afford real and solid satisfaction on a near view of death. You speak of feeling satisfaction in death, as it affords a cessation from all pain. Dearest ——, did you remember at the time, that death is something more than a cessation?—that it is an entrance into an eternal world, and that to those who have "washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb," this is an entrance into eternal glory. Bear with me, while I tell you from my own actual experience, what it is that ransomed sinners rejoice in at the approach of death. I have stood lately more than once on the very brink of eternity, and thought myself on the point of taking the awful step. This makes heaven and earth, temporal and eternal things, appear in their strong and true point of contrast. And now that I am called back to the things of time for a little longer, if I can be of the least use to one of my fellow-sinners and sufferers here, I shall not regret the delay. It is not the cessation from pain, that can make Christians view the approach of death with satisfaction. For, believe me, they have not one pain too many. Not that they love pain, or are not glad to be freed from it, when the Lord pleases. But they know that every one of their sufferings is necessary and good for them, and that they come from the hand of a kind and tender Father. They are willing to bear as much pain as his love sees fit to inflict. Their pains are very sweet to them, as they come from him. And, O dearest ——, could you know how he "strengthens them upon the bed of languishing, and how he makes all their bed in their sickness;" you would almost envy them even their pains, sweetened as they are by "the peace of God which passeth all understanding!" Wherein do they rejoice? In the hope of being "for ever with the Lord!" of seeing him, "whom having not seen, they have loved; in whom, though now they see him not, yet believing, they rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." Oh! to behold this "King in his beauty" and beholding, to be transformed into his glorious likeness! and then to cease from sin! this is the blessed cessation after which real Christians pant. To love their holy and reconciled God without any coldness or unfaithfulness; to offend him no more by one unholy, or rebellious, or selfish or unbelieving thought; to be pure as he is pure; to be "without spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing;" and then to praise him, to give him glory, to cast our blood-bought crowns at his feet, through the countless ages of eternity! Pray, my beloved ——, that in the hour of death you may be so filled with these causes of joy, that the mere escape from a few bodily pains may seem not worthy to be mentioned in the comparison. The Bible tells you, that "except you be born again, you cannot see the kingdom of God," and that "if any man be in Christ Jesus, he is a new creature, old things have passed away, behold, all things are become new." Examine, I beseech you, whether you have undergone that mighty change in all your views, tempers, and sentiments, which these expressions imply. If you die without being born again, and made a new creature in Christ Jesus, I shall never meet you in heaven; for God, who cannot lie, hath said it. But pray, pray, O pray to him, that he would thus convert your heart. He will hear and answer you. There is nothing else worth living for, but that, living or dying, you may be the Lord's. May this be your happy case.'

She would sometimes speak of herself as a disembodied spirit, as if she realized in the fullest perception and assurance, her entrance into the world of blessedness. Her frequent reference to her departure was in calm composure—like making preparation for a short journey, or a temporary absence. At other times it was in joyful hope. On one occasion—six months before her death—when she was thought to be dying, she unexpectedly revived, and, seeing her weeping friends around her, asked her dear mother why they were all in tears—adding with great animation—'Do you think that I shall be with Jesus to-morrow?' At another of these times, she exclaimed—'If the Lord should come and take me this night—but, oh! that is too much to hope for.' After a violent attack of coughing and spasm, a friend observed—'I fear you suffer much.' 'Oh, no!—she replied—'I delight to feel the pins of the tabernacle taking out.' She burst into tears, when a physician who occasionally saw her, informed her, that the disease had not made the progress he had supposed. This, however, was but a momentary feeling. For, upon her mother's reminding her—that she was only not quite so near home as she had expected, she replied—'Oh, no! this is wrong;' dried up her tears, and returned to her usual serenity and cheerfulness. Writing to one of her friends in reference to a beloved saint, who had died in the triumph of the gospel—she remarked—'Well; I shall have one friend more to welcome me, when the Lord's time shall come to "administer" to me also "an entrance into his everlasting kingdom." Oh, blessed hope! happy sinners saved by the blood of Jesus.' Then she adds this affectionate exhortation—'Oh, my dear, my beloved friend, I charge you so to devote yourself to the Lord, that "the full assurance of hope" may cheer you now, and at the hour of death.' Upon receiving the intelligence of the sudden death of another Christian friend—she exclaimed—'I have heard the good news. She has rent the veil at once. Mine is taking down piece by piece. By and by I shall find a chink large enough to get out of; like a bird confined in a cage, and fluttering about to extricate itself in vain, till at last, the door being open, the happy prisoner wings its flight towards heaven.' There might probably be an occasional mixture of infirmity in these intense desires for her home. It is indeed the dictate of Christian wisdom to prefer the gain of death. But it is equally the part of Christian obedience to embrace the service of life; and the desire to depart, so for as it is not subjugated to the readiness to wait, partakes of the nature of self-will more than of holy affections. Generally, however, the ardency of her desires appeared to be subdued to a resignation to the Divine will. Thus in reference to her dissolution she writes to the aged minister who, during her residence in London, had been the means of communicating established peace to her soul—'Blessed be my all-sufficient Saviour, that, accepted in him, a few months more or less can make no great difference; "Neither life nor death can separate us from his love."' On one occasion, after expressing her earnest longing to depart, she checked herself, and added—'But I am willing to sit here a hundred or a thousand years, if it be the will of God.'

Her mind maintained its vigorous character in the midst of her protracted sufferings. The subjects of her conversation were usually of a highly interesting character. She would often speak with considerable clearness combined with deep humility of the more mysterious parts of Revelation. such as the distinct persons of the Holy Trinity; the Person and glory of Christ; the ministry of angels; the state of separate spirits; the prospects of the church of Christ. It is much to be regretted that no particular details of these conversations are preserved. The resurrection and future glory of the body were favourite subjects with her. She delighted to dwell upon 1 Cor. xv. 'What a wonderful change'—she observed on one occasion—'takes place in nature in the acorn; which from so small and insignificant a seed afterwards expands and grows into a noble tree, the glory of the forest! What a remarkable transformation also is that of the caterpillar; which, after having been changed into apparently dead matter, at the appointed time bursts its shell, and becomes a beautiful winged insect! Had we not witnessed such changes, we should not have believed them possible. But having seen them in nature, shall we doubt the possibility of that great change, which will take place at the resurrection day, when "this vile body shall be fashioned like unto the glorious body" of our Lord?

For a short time, however, before her death, the enemy was permitted to harass her soul, and her lively apprehensions of the gospel were occasionally obscured. At one of these times she said to her minister, 'Christ is not so precious to me as he deserves.' 'No,' it was replied, 'he is so to none.' 'But' she added, 'he "feeds me with food convenient for me," though I do not experience those spiritual enjoyments I so ardently long for.' Of a distressing season of temptation which happened about this time, her minister writes, 'I shall never forget the state of her mind. It seemed as if "a horror of great darkness had fallen upon her." 'Oh' she said, 'I cannot pray; I can only utter words. It is mere wind.' She earnestly called upon me to strengthen her, by repeating the promises of the gospel. God at that time seemed to give me words. For when I scarcely knew what to say, words of effectual consolation were put into my mouth. Once in her impatience to hear the word, she exclaimed, 'Oh! say something to me from God—whether a word of comfort or reproof.' I think of that proverb, "The full soul loatheth the honey-comb; but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet."' At these times of "needful heaviness, through manifold temptations," while "walking in darkness, and having no light," she was, however, manifestly enabled to "trust in the name of the Lord, and to stay upon her God." She could not enjoy the full manifestation of her God, which she had known in times past—'Yet, though' she said, 'I cannot love God with that warmth which I so earnestly desire, I can act faith upon Him.' She complained much of deadness in prayer. Yet her faith was in exercise, upholding her soul upon the sure word of promise, that her Lord would return to her in his own best time. She would at such seasons cheer her soul by repeating suitable promises. "When the poor and needy seek for water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth them for thirst, I the Lord will hear them; I the God of Jacob will not forsake them." On this encouraging promise she rested in one of her seasons of distress and desertion. At another time she would say—"Rejoice not against me, O mine enemy: when I fall, I shall arise: when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall be a light unto me." And again—"The Lord my God shall enlighten my darkness." At these times of trial, the book of Canticles was much upon her mind." "By night I sought my Beloved, but I found him not." Then she added, 'but I sought not in vain.' She appeared at this time much enlivened in speaking of her Saviour as represented under the figure of the bridegroom. 'He loves us to such a degree, that he seeks after us, he desires, he delights in us, all which is to be seen in this wonderful portion of Scripture.' At another of these times she remarked, that often in the experience of the Lord's servants, a season of darkness had preceded some special manifestation of his love. Thus, as she observed, 'Jacob wrestled a whole night; and it was not until the break of day that the angel revealed himself. Thus for a while our Lord seemed to disregard the cry of the Canaanitish woman; but "the trial of her faith was" eventually "found to praise, and honour, and glory." Thus also the disconsolate state of the disciples in their journey to Emmaus was the prelude and harbinger of a blessed display of their Master's light and love.'

The dark clouds which "for a small moment" had been permitted to spread themselves over her soul, were however shortly dispelled; and "at evening time it was light." Her extreme weakness indeed prevented her utterance; but the few words that could be gathered from her, were descriptive of the peace and joy that reigned within. 'My weakness' she said, 'reposes on his strength—my folly on his wisdom.' When her minister, in allusion to her late painful exercises, observed, 'God was "leading her by the right way to the city of habitation"'—she replied—'Oh! yes—but how different is the case of those, who "wander in the wilderness in a solitary way, and find no city to dwell in!"' In the last visit of this beloved attendant—'God'—she said to him—'is the rock of my salvation.' Then speaking of her being detained in her earthly tabernacle—she added—'It is a comfort to think that "Christ has the keys of death and of hell." All is well. May God be with you, during the remainder of your pilgrimage! I can only lie as an infant in the hands of God.'

Her bodily sufferings at the last period were most severe, arising from a complication of diseases. Her lungs, which had been supposed to be sound, were discovered after her death to be fatally diseased. Her heart also was found to be enlarged. Her weakness and inability to recline for so many weeks, produced dropsy in her feet and legs. This was, however, from time to time relieved by incision. Her life terminated at last by a rapid mortification in one of her legs. The last day of her life was a day of intense agony. She was obliged to take doses of opium, which before, she could not touch, so that the day and night, till she expired, were passed in a doze, or in the most violent suffering. A few words only were preserved at this affecting crisis. A day or two before her death, she cried—'Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly; "nevertheless not my will, but thine be done."' At another time, speaking of "the glory that shall be revealed"—she exclaimed—"Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard; neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him." Alluding to those who watched by her side, she said—'What a comfort that we are not watching alone. "He that keepeth Israel, shall neither slumber nor sleep." Then again, shortly after, "I know whom I have believed." Then again, in a moment of excruciating suffering to her mother, 'Pray for me, that my patience may not fail me at the last.' The last words she was heard to utter before her death in a moment of deep agony, were, 'I am come into deep waters; O God my rock, "hold thou me up, and I shall be safe." The next morning, on Friday, December 10, 1830, without a sigh or struggle, she entered into her eternal rest.

Thus upheld by the good hope of the gospel—thus having displayed in lovely concord the diversified graces of the Christian profession—thus having been abundantly refreshed by the consolations of Christ, this blessed sufferer, this ransomed sinner, this victorious believer, fell asleep in the arms of her Saviour and her God. She heard, and gladly obeyed the call of her Lord—'"Come up hither." Lay down the cross, and take the crown.'

"To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and set down with my father in his throne."

CHAPTER VII.

REMARKS.

The writer, in bringing this interesting sketch to a close, ventures to crave further indulgence of his reader in drawing out a few points of important and suitable application.

First, The review of Miss Graham's painful, though temporary, apostacy marks the great moment of being well-grounded in the elementary principles of the Gospel. A few hints may be here suggested to the inquiring and serious mind. First, the danger of a cavilling temper. Here lurks the first rising of the spirit of infidelity. Miss Graham's natural character was especially open to this temptation. Indeed this is the fleshly indulgence of every intellectual mind undisciplined by the principles of the Gospel. It gratifies the love of distinction. It is the worship of self, that worst idol, that most subtle enemy of vital religion. "Vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt," is the Divine and pointed illustration of the folly and littleness of this natural principle of the heart. Solid satisfaction and rest in the Scriptural revelation will only be found in cultivating what Calvin calls—'a kind of learned ignorance,' a well-instructed contentment to be ignorant of what God has foreborne to declare. But to begin with the speculative instead of the practical truths of Revelation, and to insist upon an explanation of its difficulties as a pre-requisite to the acknowledgment of its authority, and personal application of its truths—this spirit resists faith, the appointed medium of Divine light; and thus gives to infidelity all its force, and leaves the heart the unconscious victim of its own delusions. The more we are disentangled from speculative inquiries, and occupied in the pursuit of Scriptural truth, the more settled will be our conviction of the genuineness of the testimony, and our consequent enjoyment of its privileges. Let us not therefore trifle with temptation, by suffering the objections of a cavilling infidelity to "lodge within us." Let us instantly bring them to the test of conscience, "to the law and to the testimony." Thus let us "resist the devil, and he will flee from us."

Secondly, We would inculcate an implicit faith in the Divine Record. And here we trace the source of all the sin and misery that have deluged the world for nearly six thousand years. God's unchangeable declaration, "Thou shalt surely die," was diluted to an uncertainty. Thus when confidence in the word of God was weakened, Satan's lie easily prevailed. On the other hand, how fully did Miss Graham's unreserved reliance on the promise, "Ask, and it shall be given you," recover her fine mind to its true position; entrenched upon the supreme authority of Scripture; prostrate in a sense of her ignorance; honouring her God, and honoured by him, in a trembling reverential submission to his word. How many cavilling questions arise in the defect of this spirit! The difficulties which cannot be presently explained are considered reasonable grounds for unbelief. Man, under the pretence of a desire to satisfy his doubts, rebels against what he does not understand, and begins to "reply against God." But in fact we want not more light, but more humility. Herein consists the important difference between the caviller and the sincere inquirer. The one questions, speculates, and is dissatisfied. The other in the consciousness of his "blindness," is willing to be "brought by a way that he knew not, and to be led in paths that he had not known." He follows under the guidance of the Spirit of Truth, like Abraham under the direction of Providence, step by step in implicit faith. He asks not, "How can these things be?" but, "Thus saith the Lord," determines all his difficulties without gainsaying. And this practical acknowledgment of the supremacy of Scripture is the just demand of God. We must not, according to the principles of neology, degrade the authority of his word, by subjecting it to trial at the bar of reason. We must not descend from our high vantage position of faith, to the lower ground of disputation. This inversion of the respective offices of reason and faith casts down God from his throne, and turns our light into darkness. Reason must indeed be exercised in examining the credentials of the revelation; for to receive an unauthenticated testimony is credulity, not faith: and scepticism is less culpable than belief. But the credentials being once established, we are bound to receive its contents with the most implicit submission. Having once, therefore, admitted the Divine claim of Scripture, we must yield to it our unreserved homage. The question is not, "What thinkest thou?" but "How readest thou?" This is the humility of faith, the child-like spirit of the Gospel, the evidence of the conversion of the heart to God. "Whosoever shall" thus "humble himself as a little child, the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven."—The enriching light of Divine teaching dispels many difficulties of the reasoning mind. "If the eye be single, the whole body shall be full of light." "Sitting with Mary at Jesus' feet," and "learning of our meek and lowly" teacher, we "shall find," instead of uncertainty, confusion and wretchedness, "rest unto our souls."

Thirdly, We would impress the importance of a solid experience of the power of the gospel upon thy heart. When the objections against Christianity are fairly answered, the main hindrance to its reception yet remains. There is a strong connection between the speculative principle of infidelity, and the "evil heart of unbelief." Unbelief is the disease—not of the understanding—but of the heart. It comprehends the "fulfilling of the desires of the flesh and of the mind." In the one case it is the love of sin resisting the holiness of the gospel. In the other case it is (as we have just illustrated the subject) the unsubdued pride of the heart rejecting the humility of the gospel. A full and practical reception of the truth of God is therefore a powerful defence against the subtle and encroaching enemy. It was a defect in this point, that exposed Miss Graham to the baneful influence of her investigating mind. Her early principles of religion, though sincere, were not inwrought in her soul in deep and permanent influence. This unfixed character formed therefore an ineffective safeguard in the atmosphere of powerful temptation. Her neglect of prayer threw her off for a while from her dependence upon God. Her doubts thickened upon her. The strength of her soul was paralyzed. The enemy was at the door, and took advantage of her loss of inward perception to gain a temporary ascendancy. However strong and satisfactory is the external evidence of the gospel; yet we want the apprehension and proof of its adaptation to our necessities to endear and establish it to us in all the strength of sensible demonstration. When "the gospel comes in power, and in the Holy Ghost," then does it come with much assurance. "He that believeth hath the witness in himself." The transforming power of the gospel into the Divine image is the most decisive evidence of its Divine origin; and this is an evidence which is always present with us—connected with all our Christian habits of thought and practical life—and accumulating in weight of testimony, in every successive instance of its efficacy throughout the world. The unbeliever therefore (for this is the real character of the merely nominal professor of the Bible) enters into conflict with the infidel at very serious disadvantage. He may probably be inferior to his opponent in power of reasoning, and subtlety of argumentation. He may be unfurnished with a distributive view of the historical evidence of the gospel, to repel the attacks that are made upon it; and, being unable to strengthen his points by the demonstrable evidence of his own senses, he is in great danger of being shaken from the first principles of his faith. Or even supposing him to be on equal terms with his adversary—well-furnished with an outward coat of armour; yet if his interior be not defended by "the whole armour of God," the poisoned arrows may find an entrance into his inmost soul. If he be ignorant of the spiritual blessings of the gospel, he can have but a very imperfect conviction of the importance of its principles. They hang loosely about him. There is a want of energy in the grasp to "hold them fast;" and not being "grounded and settled in the faith," never having had a real possession of "the hope of the gospel," he cannot be secure against being "moved away from" the profession of it. His indecision is the first step to apostacy, and, should it proceed to this ultimate point, it is only his just punishment for neglecting to walk closely and humbly with his God. It is therefore most difficult for him to keep the field at all points against the infidel upon the low ground of external argument. For though we protest against the supposition of any vulnerable, or even debateable points on the side of Christianity; yet the strength of the infidel side, as we have just hinted, bears upon his opponent with mighty influence connected with the appetites of his own heart. Thus man becomes not only a rebel against his God, but a traitor to himself, and the murderer of his own happiness. Living, therefore, without prayer—we should assay to go to the intellectual conflict with armour that we have not proved, and therefore that would render us but uncertain protection. Unexercised in Christian faith, we cast away the only "shield, whereby we could quench the fiery darts of the wicked one." In proportion to the practical influence of the principles of the gospel will be our intelligent conviction of their Divine origin. A holy taste will enable us to receive the evidence of Christian truth. In every step of spiritual religion will the invisible realities of the gospel be embodied and appropriated. The light to discover their external evidence will be thus increased by the removal of a counteracting internal bias; and the believer, retreating in a heavenly atmosphere of communion with God, will be little disturbed by speculative doubts—"Thou art my hiding-place and my shield; I hope in thy word."

Lastly, let the mind be informed, expanded, strengthened in its positions by an intelligent acquaintance with some of our most valuable treatises upon the evidences of Christianity—those most especially, that connect the testimony of internal perception with external proof. Thus covered at all points of intellectual or spiritual warfare "with the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left"—the simple-minded Christian will "be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh him a reason of the hope that is in him with meekness and fear."

II. We would mark from this Memoir the high importance of a settled profession of the gospel. We have already seen the rich and matured character of Miss Graham's doctrinal sentiments. Hers was not the religion of feeling, (though her feelings were powerfully engaged,) but of solid intelligent conviction. There was no excitement of impulse or imagination, no love of novelty, but a contentment in solid, Scriptural, and practical views of Divine truth. Here was a ground-work for that steady consistency of Christian profession, in which she was enabled to serve her God and Saviour with acceptance and usefulness. It would be a painful investigation to trace the various causes and symptoms of that unsettled aspect of religion, which the present state of the church so largely exhibits. Too often we find the profession to be of a superficial, and therefore of an uninfluential character. A susceptible temperament opens the door to self-delusion. The religion of the imagination is substituted for the religion of the heart. Sentimentalism captivates the mind by a sort of confused ideal sublimity. Unorganized excitement is mistaken for solid practical principle. External separation from the world is identified with the spiritual love of holiness. A habit of serious thought and partial reformation is commenced without any defined motive or object. Hence, when the temporary impulse has subsided, the baseless fabric resting upon it begins to shake. The religion of novelty and interest becomes irksome drudgery, without any spring of activity or privilege. The peace and joy, which had been anticipated as the immediate result of a certain train of feelings, ends in disappointment; and the "goodness" which had no connexion with tenderness of heart, humility, and faith, "passes away as the morning cloud, and the early dew." The man who had been living upon notions, doctrines, and feelings—not upon realities—sinks down into the character of a dry, heartless professor, with no genuine response to the vitality of godliness.

Of others again we would speak with special tenderness, while we are constrained to consider them as wanderers from "the old paths," where the church of God has hitherto found "rest," refreshment, and establishment. But we cannot view without the deepest concern the attempt now made by true disciples of Christ (for such undoubtedly are many of those to whom we allude) to degrade the Son of God to a sinful participation and sympathy with our nature. We feel bound to protest against that 'great truth,' now for the first time opened to the church---that believers in this life of sin and imperfection, attain at least equal communion with their God, and participation of Divine influence with their heavenly Saviour. Thus is the child of fallen Adam complete in himself, not in his Saviour. He needs no exercise of contrition, no application to the blood of the atonement for his daily deficiencies, no High Priest to "bear the iniquities of his holy things." The plenary baptism of the Spirit precludes the need of an atoning and interceding Saviour for present deficiencies and defilements, and perfects what is called an holiness in the flesh, an inherent righteousness, which blots out the character of sinners, and obscures the glory of the righteousness of the Redeemer, as the exclusive ground of justification before God.

If we look for the external seal of these anti-scriptural doctrines, it will be found in the exhibition of certain tongues (dissimilar from the primitive manifestations, because unknown, and therefore unfruitful to the church) connected with impulses of an extraordinary character, both of which have been confessed by some of the most accredited subjects to have been the offspring of delusion. Does not all this seem to invest the Apostolic caution almost with the character of prophecy—"I fear, lest by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so your mind should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ?" That these doctrines come not from Christ is manifest from their obvious tendency to exalt self, and to stain the unspotted holiness of our Divine Saviour. That they are not the fruit of the unction of the Spirit, is equally clear from their results, in obscuring the light and authority of Scripture by some super-induced credentails, and thus confounding "the spirit of truth" in the word, and "the spirit of error" in the new revelation. That as novelties they have no stability, we are encouraged to believe from the gracious deliverance that has been manifested to some, who were fast bound under their seductive influence; while those who are yet beguiled claim (though perhaps they may not thank us for putting forth the claim) our Christian sympathy, forbearance, and prayer.

What are wanted on all sides as the basis of an established profession, are—First, brokenness and contrition of heart. Here, as we before observed, Miss Graham's deficiency exposed her to "the snare of the devil." Not being deeply impressed with the sense of her own vileness, she could not lie low enough before her God to receive his pure and heavenly light in her soul. He was therefore pleased to humble her thoroughly, till he had brought her to his feet; that happiest, lowest, yet most exalted place for a redeemed sinner. What Job learnt in his prostrate frame of humiliation, made all the former attainments of this "perfect man" of God appear as nothing in his eyes. And indeed there is much to be acquired in a self-abasing walk with God, and in a well-digested study of our hearts, before there can be any capacity for receiving a Scriptural apprehension of the doctrines, that are the matter of present controversy in the church. The decided views on these subjects, that are sometimes received at an early, and perhaps uncertain, stage of the Christian profession, have been probably obtained under the influence of excitement, rather than from Divine teaching—from an implicit submission to some professed leader in the church, rather than from a simple exercised study of the sacred volume. In the spirit of brokenness of heart this deluding power of excitement is subjugated to a chastened temper of tenderness and self-distrust. One want absorbs every faculty and desire of the soul. There is no temptation to linger by the way in busy idleness amid the attractions of novelty. There is a careful guard against all entanglements of disputation, that might, by diverting the mind from the main object of pursuit, palsy the spiritual affections, and pervert even the word of God to an occasion of erasing instead of fixing permanent impressions upon the heart. In this spirit of "simplicity and godly sincerity," the mind will gradually be enabled to receive Scriptural statements, that before it had been unable to comprehend; and will grasp, with an intelligent habit of faith, the fulness of Divine truth in all its happy and practical influence.

Connected with this temper, spiritual apprehensions of Christ are of the utmost moment. This was the main principle of Miss Graham's steadiness of profession. She was accustomed, as we have before noticed, to "consider Christ." Hers were not transient glances at the glorious object of faith. Her religion was characterized by a contemplative habit of connecting every part of the Christian system with Christ. And in this great subject, the most intellectual mind will find full employ. Unfathomable depths, after a long life of research, will yet remain to be explored. Here we may advance with deeper intensity of interest at every successive step, until the whole soul is "filled with all the fulness of God!" A mind sustained and invigorated by these sublime contemplations, will lose its speculative taste; will try "doubtful disputations" by their reference to this grand subject; and, while enlarging to the utmost its compass of sacred truth, will be drawn off from uncertain doctrines to those that are evidently Scriptural in their character, clear in their light, fruitful in privilege, holy in influence. "Not" being altogether "ignorant of Satan's devices," the Christian will readily trace to its proper source all diverging from this concentrating point, and will steadily guard against this baneful "corruption from the simplicity that is in Christ." And thus living by faith, he will live upon the vitality of the gospel. The unfolding of Christ makes holiness at once practicable and precious. His principles, as they expand in knowledge, will become more practical in results; while these results will reciprocally exercise his principles in a more lively and delightful glow of Divine light.

For the cultivation of this spiritual contemplation, habits of retirement seem to be of importance. Leaving the time, measure, and rules to every man's judgment and conscience, and being fully aware that a difference of character generates in this particular a diversity in the operation of Divine grace—we cannot forbear inculcating the general subject as applicable to the several departments of the church. Doubtless Miss Graham drew much advantage from her retired habits to exercise her mind in heavenly contemplation. Probably much of the defective standard of attainment and privilege in the present day may be traced to the neglect of the habits now adverted to. Christians actively engaged in the service of God may be ensnared by the very activity of their engagements. Those of a more quiet and collected temperament, will connect their "times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord"—their most solid, stable, invigorating comfort—with the cultivation of this habit. Those who are enabled still to maintain the freshness of their early impressions, feel their need of this advantage, and mourn over the deprivation of it as a loss, for which no Christian society—however refined, elevated, or holy—can compensate. All who realize the difficulties of their daily path, and the weariness that belongs to incessant watchfulness and conflict, must feel; that as the body cannot be sustained without sleep, so neither can the soul thrive without the active rest—so to speak—of retirement with God. A recollected habit of mind—shutting out the world, and calling home our thoughts to Christ and eternity—is indispensable to give life and spirituality to our religion, to bring the one object of faith into fixed contemplation, and the more enlivening prospects of eternity into more constant influence.

Need we further suggest the incalculable importance of a deep and spiritual study of the word of God, in connection with an established profession of the gospel? Miss Graham's exclusive study of the word after the period of her recovery from infidelity—('the Lord helping her to pray over every word she read') must have been productive of a rich harvest to her soul. And indeed the general supremacy and entireness of this sacred study throughout life was a main source of her mature apprehension of the doctrines of Christ. May not a partial study of Scripture explain the difficulty—why sincere Christians—praying for the promised "guidance of the Holy Spirit into all truth"—should yet be left under the influence of error? Do they heartily desire to be guided into all truth—into practical as well as doctrinal—into humbling as well as the more exciting—truths? Is every part of the holy book, after the example of this devoted saint, honoured as the word of God—carefully explored, and earnestly prayed over? The promise supposes a diligent search of the whole field of Divine truth, and the neglect of any part of this field shuts us out from the sphere of the promise. Perhaps also a superficial study of "the word of Christ"—even when the whole surface is surveyed—is one of the most prominent causes of slight profession in the present day. It too often lodges only—not "dwells" with us; or it dwells with us—not in us; or the "riches" of the treasure-house are too little regarded; or Christian "wisdom" is little exercised in the application of its contents to our several emergencies. In some cases we mark a disproportionate attention to the externals of scripture, which betrays a criminal indifference to its spiritual excellences. The holy simplicity of study is deteriorated. The mind is contented to feed upon husks, while the heavenly pleasures connected with the internal study of the sacred volume are untouched and unknown. With others again the subjects revolve before the mind, but without research. The difference is inconceivable between the act of reading, and the habit of meditation and search in the sacred volume. If the mind does not ponder often upon Scripture, no definite views will be obtained; no profitable instruction drawn out from it. Whereas a spiritually reflecting mind will extract rich meaning from its apparently difficult and barren portions. Being made the subject of thought, and formed into materials for prayer, Scripture knowledge becomes of a more heavenly character; and meditation upon a single passage becomes more fruitful than the general reading of large portions of the sacred book. Perhaps there is no precept more intimately connected with Christian establishment, than that which has been indirectly adverted to—"Let the word of Christ dwell in you richly in all wisdom." Let there be no part of us, where the word does not dwell. Let there be no part of the word, that does not dwell in us. Here is a new world of heavenly light, where the intellect is called forth into its full exercise. Here the soul is refreshed, and the heart is moulded under the influence of Divine wisdom; and hence stability of our profession "in the simplicity of Christ."

We would venture to add a few words upon the high responsibility of cultivating "the spirit of a sound mind." The high estimate which the apostle formed of this faculty may be seen in his placing it among the special gifts for the work of the ministry, and in his prayers for his own son in the faith, and for his beloved flock, that they might maintain it in constant exercise. His own example proves, that—instead of a sound judgment cooling the fervour of zeal (as it is sometimes supposed to do)—it increases its effect by directing its movements. Indeed a weakness in this point brings with it many hindrances to a settled consistency of profession. A luxuriant imagination often obscures the well-regulated and implicit exercise of faith. The truth is often clothed with adventitious attractions. It is not received simply as of God. There is a want of clear perfection and determined grasp of the points presented to view. Again, an excited temperament without a staid judgment, opens many avenues of delusion. This is a matter of frequent notice in the cases of a defective religious education, or of late conversion; or in a rapid transition from the cares of business or the warfare of the camp, to the heated atmospheres which are now to be found in the church. The dazzling brightness of truth breaking in upon unfurnished minds, and often upon palpable darkness, overpowers the faculty of discrimination. The overturn of their former opinions has destroyed confidence in their own conclusions; and together with their old prejudices, their intellectual stability is swept away.

In another direction, also, lively affections and weak judgment give a wrong bias to the character. The Christian under an enlivening sense of the Saviour's love is ready to embrace any new view or doctrine, which he conceives calculated to honour and exalt him. Now a controlling power is as necessary for the healthful regularity of the mind, as an invigorating principle. Opiniative decision is too often mistaken for spiritual principle. We want the influence of "the wisdom from above," not only to open to our minds expanded and attractive views of truth, but to enable us to affix to every part its just proportion—that no favourite doctrines be suffered to absorb our interest, or be raised to an undue importance—that essential points may have their preponderance over those of a more doubtful character—that every step of our progress may present to us a more complete view of the harmony of the system. The multitude of excursions in the theological field, without and beyond the rule of revelation, are an evidence of that wandering of the mind from reality, and that triumph of imagination over truth, that denotes a mind not in the full possession of its own powers. But let us in another track be careful that the sublime contemplation of the gospel does not pamper a prurient curiosity: but rather that it gives a more settled character to our faith, and a wise and active direction to our practice. Let us watch, also under the exercise of this sound mind, that the fear of uncertain doctrines does not quench the ardour of Scriptural investigation—that we continue our research "unto all the riches of the full assurance of understanding,"—that we go on as long as there is one point of the sacred book unexplored—"forgetting the things that are behind, and reaching forth unto those things that are before."

We cannot but remark, how frequently a defect of soundness of mind is connected with unsteadiness of Christian profession. And indeed in all cases, important talents of influence are wasted, and valuable spheres of usefulness are contracted, by this evil. What servant of God, therefore, conscious alike of his responsibility and weakness, will not present his frequent and earnest petition to the throne of grace, "Teach me good judgment and knowledge?" These inestimable blessings are not the exclusive accomplishments of highly-gifted intellects. The believer, weak in natural intelligence, but simple in dependence upon his God, will be not only guided, but established in the truth, even in the midst of abounding errors. He will be taught "not to believe every spirit, but to try the spirits, whether they be of God." He will be led to "try the things that differ" in the church—not by the holiness of their several professors, (which—even if it were more perfectly apprehended—is not the decisive Test of Truth,) but by "the law and the testimony;" being assured, "that if they speak not according to this word"—though they be "angels of light"—"there is no light in them."

III. The memoir before us may also point out the ground and blessedness of Scriptural enjoyment. Miss Graham's full reception of the high principles of the gospel made Christian devotedness a privilege, and Christian resignation the path of peace. Her clear views of sovereign grace; her tender spirit of assured confidence; and the bright beaming rays of her hope of glory, were sources of incessant energy and heavenly cheerfulness. The spiritual atmosphere in which she lived, communicated life to her fainting spirit. Her heart received a new bent, and found a new home in the bosom of her God. The staid sobriety of her character, the happiness she found in entire consecration of herself to God; her quiet composure of mind in the chamber of suffering; the overcoming strength and vigour sustaining her soul in joyfulness; abundantly proved, that she had not embraced an empty cloud, that she had not caught a shadow under the delusion of enjoying God; but that God was indeed the rest and portion of her soul.

But what, on the other hand, is the portion—what the prospect of the man (whether destitute of the profession of the gospel, or holding it in delusion), who lives "without God in the world? He must raise his "altar," if he thinks of worship at all for the quieting of conscience—"To the unknown God." He makes to himself a God after his own fancy, his own heart; and it proves to be an infinite nothing. He cannot know his Creator.* He cannot therefore enjoy him. For want of this knowledge and enjoyment, he dooms himself to everlasting misery. He will not rest in God. He cannot rest in any thing short of God. If ever there was a remedy designed for man, bearing the character of Divine love, it is the gospel of Jesus, opening an uncreated source as alone sufficient to quench the thirst of immortal souls, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price. Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labour for that which satisfieth not? hearken diligently unto me, and eat ye that which is good, and let your soul delight itself in fatness. Incline your ear, and come unto me: hear, and your soul shall live."

Let us hear the breathings of the holy and seraphic Baxter, after this soul-satisfying portion. 'In thee I expect my true felicity and content. To know thee, and love thee, and delight in thee, must be my blessedness, or I must have none. The little tastes of this sweetness, which my thirsty soul hath had, do tell me that there is no other real joy. I feel that thou hast made my mind to know thee, my heart to love thee, my tongue to praise thee, and all that I am and have to serve thee. And even in the panting languishing desires and motions of my soul, I find that thou, and only thou, art its resting place; and though love do now but search, and pray, and cry, and weep, and is reaching upward, but cannot reach the glorious light, the blessed knowledge, the perfect love, for which it longeth; yet by its eye, its aim, its motions, its moans, its groans, I know its meaning, where it would be, and I know its end. My displaced soul will never be well, till it come near to thee, till it know thee better, till it love thee more. Wert thou to be found in the most solitary desert, it would seek thee; or in the uttermost parts of the earth, it would make after thee. Thy presence makes a crowd a church; thy converse maketh a closet, or solitary wood or field, to be akin to the angelical choir. The creature were dead, if thou wert not its life; and ugly, if thou wert not its beauty; and insignificant, if thou wert not its sense. The soul is deformed, which is without thine image; and lifeless which liveth not in love to thee, if love be not its pulse, and prayer and praise its constant breath. The mind is unlearned, which readeth not thy name on all the world. He dreameth, who doth not live to thee. Oh! let me have no other portion! no reason, no love, no life, but what is devoted to thee, employed on thee, and for thee here, and shall be perfected in Thee, the only perfect, final object for evermore. Upon the holy altar, erected by thy Son, and by his hands, and his mediation, I humbly devote and offer to thee this heart. Oh! that I could say with greater feeling—this flaming, loving, longing heart! But the sacred fire which must kindle on my sacrifice, must come from thee. It will not else ascend unto thee. Let it consume this dross, so the nobler part may know its home. All that I can say to commend it to thine acceptance, is, that I hope it is washed in precious blood, and that there is something in it that is thine own. It still looketh toward thee, and groaneth to thee, and followeth after thee, and will be content with gold, and mirth, and honour, and such inferior fooleries no more. It lieth at thy door, and will be entertained, or perish. Though alas! it loves thee not as it would. I boldly say, it longs to love thee. It loves to love thee. It seeks, it craves no greater blessedness than perfect, endless, mutual love. It is vowed to thee, even to thee alone, and will never take up with shadows more; but is resolved to lie down in sorrow and despair, if thou wilt not be its rest and joy. It hateth itself for loving thee no more, accounting no want, deformity, shame, or pain, so great and grievous a calamity.'

Christians! You, like this holy man of God, have made trial of this portion; and you alone are competent to speak of it. You can bear testimony that the knowledge and enjoyment of God, coming to us through Christ, our Head, our All, is unspeakable bliss. It fills the most enlarged appetite of the soul. It fixes our hovering thoughts and restless anticipations. It perfects all our desires in holy delight and joy. It is the triumph of everlasting love over all the wretchedness, wants, and guilt of man. It gives supreme enjoyment in life, hope in death, a portion for eternity.

"Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire beside thee. My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever."

THE

OF THE

CHRISTIAN COMFORTER

ASSERTED AND EXPLAINED,

IN

A COURSE OF SERMONS ON JOHN XVI. 7, PREACHED BEFORE THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD, AT THE LECTURE FOUNDED BY THE LATE REV. JOHN BAMPTON, M.A., CANON OF SALISBURY.

BY THE LATE RIGHT REV. REGINALD HEBER,

BISHOP OF CALCUTTA.

Extract from the last Will and Testament of the late Rev. John Bampton, Canon of Salisbury.

——"I give and bequeath my Lands and Estates to the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the University of Oxford for ever, to have and to hold all and singular the said Lands or Estates upon trust, and to the intents and purposes herein-after mentioned; that is to say, I will and appoint that the Vice-Chancellor of the University of Oxford for the time being shall take and receive all the rents, issues and profits thereof, and (after all taxes, reparations, and necessary deductions made) that he pay all the remainder to the endowment of eight Divinity Lecture Sermons, to be established for ever in the said University, and to be performed in the manner following:

"I direct and appoint, that, upon the first Tuesday in Easter Term, a Lecturer be yearly chosen by the Heads of Colleges only, and by no others, in the room adjoining to the Printing-House, between the hours of ten in the morning and two in the afternoon, to preach eight Divinity Lecture Sermons, the year following, at St. Mary's in Oxford, between the commencement of the last month in Lent Term, and the end of the third week in Act Term.

"Also I direct and appoint, that the eight Divinity Lecture Sermons shall be preached upon either of the following subjects—to confirm and establish the Christian Faith, and to confute all heretics and schismatics—upon the divine authority of the holy Scriptures—upon the authority of the writings of the primitive Fathers, as to the faith and practice of the primitive Church—upon the Divinity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—upon the Divinity of the Holy Ghost—upon the Articles of the Christian Faith, as comprehended in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

"Also I direct, that thirty copies of the eight Divinity Lecture Sermons shall be always printed, within two months after they are preached, and one copy shall be given to the Chancellor of the University, and one copy to the Head of every College, and one copy to the Mayor of the city of Oxford, and one copy to be put into the Bodleian Library; and the expence of printing them shall be paid out of the revenue of the Land or Estates given for establishing the Divinity Lecture Sermons; and the preacher shall not be paid, nor be entitled to the revenue, before they are printed."

LECTURE I.

Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

This was the prominent topic of consolation and encouragement among those which our Saviour suggested for the support of his earthly friends under the impending affliction of his own departure from the world; and it is evident, that a more than common interest belongs to expressions thus awful in themselves, and pronounced on so awful an occasion.

Had Jesus of Nazareth been no more than a human teacher of virtue and philosophy, adorned as he was with every good and perfect gift to which our nature had previously aspired in vain, we should have attended, doubtless, with affectionate and reverential curiosity, to the latest instructions of matchless wisdom, the concluding result of a life, in every stage of its career, distinguished by more than human purity. The words of dying men have, mostly, willing auditors. The universal prejudice of mankind (and what is an universal prejudice but the voice of human nature?) ascribes to the instructions of Death a something like divinity; and he who was wise and just amid the struggle of contending passions and the confusion of worldly cares, may address his disciples with still greater effect and authority when those passions and those cares are gone by for ever. He who is himself to reap no benefit from fraud can hardly be suspected of intentional deception; he, from whom the world is receding, may discern, in that remoter prospect, the perfect proportions of its general form and value, which (while the mass was nearer to his eye) were lost in the minuter detail of its parts, or obscured by the intervening breath of admiration of calumny.

Nor can it be denied, that we naturally affix a greater value on that wisdom and friendship of which we are no longer to enjoy the protection; that we cling with peculiar fondness to whatever is the last of its kind, and that the recollection of the past and the fear of what may follow, conspire, under circumstances like these, to stamp the present with a tenfold interest and importance.

But there is yet another and a peculiar reason why the latest revelations of Jesus have, of all other truths, the strongest claim to our attention.

A prophet of the most High, (for as such he is acknowledged even by those of his followers who think most meanly of his person and nature,) and the greatest of all to whom the name of prophet has been at any time applied; we cannot inquire, without the strongest and most reverential curiosity, what truth that was which he reserved to be the last of his discoveries to mankind; which, as the most important feature of his commission, he deferred to communicate till the communication would be most awful and impressive,—till it would be remembered with the greatest accuracy, and its consolation would be most required.

This discovery was the promise of the Comforter, and this promise he introduces with a solemnity of asseveration which might seem almost unnecessary, if it were not obviously and admirably calculated to excite in his followers' attention the most profound, the most implicit and submissive faith.

"I tell you the truth," are his words to whom falsehood was unknown, "I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come; but if I depart, I will send him unto you."

The value of this boon we may in some measure estimate by the intensity of the loss which it was designed to repair, the departure of our Saviour from the world. "Vidisse Christum in carne" was, in the opinion of Augustin, the height of mortal happiness; that must have been no common blessing which could dry the tears of the children of the bride-chamber when the Bridegroom had been so recently taken from them: nor is the epoch of our Saviour's decease any otherwise described by the Prophets or by Christ himself, than as a season of desolation and mourning to all.

"I will smite the Shepherd," said God, "and the sheep shall be scattered." "When the Bridegroom is taken from them," were the words of Christ while on earth, "then shall they fast in those days." "Ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice, and ye shall be sorrowful."

And for such a sorrow they had, doubtless, ample cause: the time was coming, wherein whosoever killed them should think he rendered an acceptable service to God; a period of trouble was to follow the Messiah's removal, "such as never was, since there was a nation, until that time." "When the father was to be against the son and the son against the father," and "when a man's foes were to be they of his own household."

And into this bad world, these times of cruelty and moral convulsion, they were sent out as sheep among wolves, without his guardianship who was their only Shepherd, under whose guidance they had hitherto lacked nothing. Well might it be, that, when he had announced to them his approaching departure, their hearts were filled with sorrow, when Jesus himself had wept in pity for the evils which were coming on the world!

Nor was this painful sense of their loss and of their orphan and destitute condition to be removed, though it might be rendered less intolerable, by the knowledge of their Master's triumph over the gates of death.

For, though assured, by this means, of his happiness and glory; assured that they were the objects still of his invisible affection and favour, the friends whom he had loved on earth, and for whom he now, in heaven, interceded; yet the withdrawing of his visible presence, the cessation of his converse, the cheerless void which occupied the place of all which had constituted the former grace and glory of their sect,—were sufficient to justify in minds of firmer texture than those which the Apostles appear to have possessed, the greatest imaginable degree of grief, of anxiety, of apprehension, of despair. Accustomed to such a Teacher, how could his place be supplied among men? Deserted by such a Guardian, how could they hope for safety from the world, from the devil, from themselves? When that smile was withdrawn, in which innocence and childhood loved to repose; that majestic countenance, before which guilt sank down abashed, and hypocrisy dropped her saintly mantle; that voice which neither the spirits of hell, nor the deaf and boisterous elements could disobey or sustain; what occupation, what ambition could have a zest for those who had been accustomed to the service of such a Master? On what could their thoughts repose when the centre of their affections was gone? and how weak and unavailing would the consolation have been to trace his footsteps in those cities where his power had been displayed; to visit, in mournful pilgrimage, the scenes where they had eaten and drank in his presence; the paths by which they had walked to the house of God in company? "Let us also go that we may die with our Lord" had been, on a former occasion, the sentiment of one among their number; and, if the desire of death were ever either justifiable or natural, it must surely have been both the one and the other in the Messiah's surviving followers.

But from this state of depression the coming of the Paraclete was to set them free; from this depth of bitterness he was to arouse their spirits to the lofty destinies of their appointed mission and ministry; their sorrow was to be turned into joy, and their joy neither persecution, nor affliction, nor poverty, was thenceforth to take away. Nay, more than this, the loss of Christ was to be their eventual gain: not only does the Messiah comfort them by the hope that they were to be no losers by his departure; the compensation which he promised was to be such as should overflow in their favour; and, on this account alone, and abstracted from that other consideration of the remission of sin by his blood, (of which our Lord himself, for reasons which may be hereafter shown, but seldom spake, and spake in the obscurity of parables,) it was expedient for them that Christ should go away.

Nor, though this would be amply sufficient to excite our ardent curiosity, does the importance of the inquiry terminate with the consolation which the Paraclete afforded to those with whom Christ had sojourned in the world, and who regretted him as a visible Benefactor. An accurate comprehension of the expressions employed by our Lord is necessary to the comprehension of that entire system of salvation which it was his errand to accomplish and secure; necessary to our faith, inasmuch as from hence, in no small degree, the grounds of our faith are derived; necessary to our love and gratitude, inasmuch as from hence we learn the full weight of that mercy which we have obtained from our Maker and Redeemer. By ascertaining the fulfilment of the promise we may be encouraged to a holy confidence in our Christian warfare, and schooled to a submissive dependance on that power and those merits, through which alone such assistance is accorded. By fixing the extent and character of God's help we may be prevented, on the other hand, from an unauthorized reliance on his influence in points to which that influence was never intended to apply; we may obtain a sufficient canon to measure the opposite statements of irreligion and enthusiasm; to detect the extravagant claims of the last, and the unreasonable cavils of the former; and to decide, with somewhat more exactness than has hitherto been attempted, in what respects the promise applies to the universal Christian world, and in what, more especially, to the earliest teachers of Christianity.

It is my intention, therefore, in the following Lectures, to discuss, to the best of my power, the nature and office of the Comforter promised by our Lord, and the benefits which the apostles in particular, or, in general, the great body of believers in Christ, were authorized by that promise, to expect through his means. And I am the rather induced to undertake this arduous inquiry, because, though the importance of the questions which it involves has been at all times acknowledged and by all; yet has the attention of theologians been, perhaps, less occupied by this, than by any other specific discussion.

Those mighty champions of English and Christian orthodoxy, who, in the demonstration of our Lord's Divinity and of the atonement of sin by his blood, have left behind them labours which no sophistry can shake, no talents hope to rival, have been contented, for the most part, to refer incidentally and slightly to the being and functions of the third Person in the Trinity, as if He, by whom we are sanctified to life eternal, were of less moment to Christians than He, by whom we are created and redeemed; or, as if the existence of the Holy Ghost were not exposed to the same, or even ruder assailants than have denied the Godhead of the Son.

Nor, of the few whose inquiries are professedly directed to the assertion of the being and elucidation of the office of the Holy Ghost, is there any one who has embraced so copious a view of the subject as to deny to succeeding labourers the hope of advantage in discussing its subordinate branches. With much of natural acuteness, and a style which, though unpolished, is seldom wearisome, Clagitt had too little learning to be ever profound, and too much rashness to be always orthodox. Where he exposes the inconsistency of the Puritan arguments, his work is not without a certain share of usefulness; but for the purposes of general edification we may search his pages in vain; nor would he have preserved so long the share of reputation which he holds, if it had not been for the circumstance that he was Owen's principal antagonist. Ridley, whose talents and acquirements have not been rewarded with the fame to which, far more than Clagitt, he is entitled, has erred, nevertheless, in the injudicious application of heathen traditions; and both Clagitt and Ridley have altogether neglected the consideration of the office of God's Spirit as the peculiar Comforter of Christians.

With those who are not members of our English Church Dr. Owen's voluminous work on the Spirit is held in high estimation; and, in default of others, has been often recommended to the perusal, not of dissenters only, but of the younger clergy themselves. But in Owen, though his learning and piety were, doubtless, great, and though few have excelled him in the enviable talent of expressing and exciting devotional feelings, yet have his peculiar sentiments and political situation communicated a tinge to the general character of his volume, unfavourable alike to rational belief and to religious charity. His arrangement is lucid; his language not inelegant; and his manner of treating the subject is at least sufficiently copious. But, as he has most of the merits, so has he all the imperfections characteristic of his age and party; a deep and various but ill-digested reading; a tediousness of argument, unhappily not incompatible with a frequent precipitancy of conclusion; a querulous and censorious tone in speaking of all who differ from him in opinion; while his attempt to reconcile the Calvanistic doctrine of irresistible grace with the conditional promises of the gospel, may be placed, perhaps, among the most unfortunate specimens of reasoning which have ever found readers or admirers.*

Of recent authors, where blame would be invidious, and where it would seem presumptuous to bestow commendation, I may be excused from saying more than that the plan of the present Lectures will be found to differ materially from any with which I am yet acquainted. There is another, however, and a greater name than all whom I have noticed, whose Doctrine of Grace (those parts at least which belong not to temporary fanaticism and factions best forgotten,) must ever be accounted, so far as its subject extends, in the number of those works which are the property of every age and country, and of which, though succeeding critics may detect the human blemishes, the vigour and originality will remain, perhaps, unrivalled.

But, on the Personality and Deity of the Holy Ghost, the genius of Warburton is silent; and that occasional rashness, which is the attendant curse on conscious power, has destroyed, in his writings, that uniform and wary accuracy which alone can so far occupy the ground as to preclude the necessity of additional illustration or inquiry. On ground like this, indeed, (the most fertile, perhaps, in tares, and the most liable to invasion of any in the Evangelical heritage,) our labours can never be superfluous; nor are they to be despised, who bear, with whatever strength or fortune, their efforts and offerings to the common stock of knowledge and virtue; who, following the path of more illustrious adventurers, beat down, as they revive, the hydra heads of sophistry; whose occupation it is to eradicate those weeds of error which aspire to wreathe their poisonous tendrils round the fairest pillars of the sanctuary, and to chase those obscene birds of darkness and rapine, which from time return to scream and nestle in the shadow of the altar of God.

It has been urged, however, (and it is an objection which, doubtless, would apply, if to any theological subject whatever, to one which, like the present, confessedly involves the most mysterious topics of Christianity), it has been urged on grave authority, that the painful examination of religious mysteries is at once unnecessary and unwise; that, while open infidelity and open irreligion assail, with more than menaces, that faith and those morals in which we are all agreed who assume the name of Christians, it is safer and better to forget our internal feuds in the common danger of the great confederacy. It is urged that the churchman, neglecting the outworks of his peculiar system, should concentrate his efforts to the maintenance of those points which are really essential to salvation; that he will find sufficient employment in conciliating infidels to adopt these necessary features without the additional disgust of mystery; that to vanquish the vices of Christians is a nobler and easier task than that of confuting their heresies; and that, if the heart be insensible to the morality of the gospel, it is to little purpose to inform the head with the refinements of polemical divinity.

It is to this effect that Ogden reasons in his Tenth Sermon on the Articles of the Christian Faith; and the doctrine is so favourable to the indifference of some and the indolence of others, that we need not wonder that a very numerous proportion of the world should regard with contempt, or dislike, or pity, whatever efforts are made to understand or assert the more intricate passages of Scripture.

Those who are engrossed in other cares, and those to whom all care is hateful, are alike unwilling to embark in discussions which involve in their very preliminaries an obligation to patience and to toil; and the caution of the grave and the ridicule of the gay will often join their strength to bring us back from these thorny labyrinths into the safe and beaten common places of that general morality, of which the inherent beauty attests its divine original, and which commands the assent and admiration of every reasonable being.

Beauty and strength, however, are not synonymous; and it may, perhaps, be doubted, whether (to enforce those rules of action which we are called on in our practical discourses to recommend) it be not necessary to deduce their obligation from those very mysterious truths whose discussion is thus interdicted. The Almighty himself is a better judge than any one of his creatures, what propositions respecting his own essence and his intercourse with men, are advisable or necessary for men to know. If we have really any means of ascertaining his intentions in these respects, it must be by the observation of what truths are revealed in Scripture; nor has our Maker ever shown himself so prodigal of the tree of knowledge, as to induce us to believe that any thing is thus revealed which it does not greatly concern us to examine.

The assumption, then, on which the whole of those arguments proceed, which seek to deter us from all discussion of the Christian mysteries, in itself is, apparently, such as no system can safely repose on. For, if it be shown that the knowledge of such truths is important to man, (and their importance may be fairly inferred from the circumstance that God has thought fit to make them know to his creatures), if this importance be demonstrated, it must follow that, on this ground alone, it is our duty to state them fully and fairly to mankind, without perplexing ourselves farther as to their absolute necessity, or attempting to decide how far or in what manner the ignorant or incredulous may be saved or punished. To us these truths are revealed, for we acknowledge them; and, if they are parts of that revelation of which we are, professedly, God's messengers to the world, it remains to be shown on what pretence we conceive ourselves at liberty to intercept or suppress any part of our commission; what right we can plead to establish a distinction which God has, certainly, not appointed between esoteric and exoteric Christianity.

We are told, indeed, that it is incumbent on Christians of all classes and denominations to sink their minor differences in the common and glorious defence of those leading truths of revelation in which all acknowledge themselves concerned, and which infidelity has attacked with a violence which calls on the united efforts of all to repel.

If there be any meaning in this assertion, it must be that, until the opposers of Revealed Religion in general are answered, it is unwise and unchristian to enter into the discussion of any topic on which all Christians are not agreed. And for this restriction, (which, if it be allowed at the present moment, must, to all human appearance, continue in force till the final victory of Christ in the valley of Armageddon), for this restriction two reasons are alleged; the first, that the defence of universal Christianity is more necessary than the detail of its subordinate features; the second, that the heathen and infidel are scandalized by our divisions, and that we cannot make converts to a religion of which the leading tenets are, even with ourselves, the subject of doubt and disputation.

* By a portion of our patrons, the sentiments contained in this and some other paragraphs in these Lectures, will not be approved; but as the main design of the work is the vindication of truths in which all evangelical Christians agree, we shall not, we trust, in consequence of its selection, incur the charge of forgetting our pledge to "carefully avoid sectarianism."—Ed. Ch. Lib.

But unless it can be proved, that the service of no single labourer can be spared, even a moment, from defending the boundary of the common vineyard, though it be to root out the tares which threaten to make that vineyard little worth defending; unless a necessity can be shown that every sermon which we preach, and every essay which we publish, should be devoted to the confutation of deism, this argument can hardly be considered as worth a serious answer.

We do not consider ourselves as called upon to settle the precedence of duties of which, as we contend, neither the one nor the other should be neglected. We do not pretend to derogate from the merited honours of those illustrious vindicators of our common faith, within whose scope and compass it did not fall to notice the shades of difference which unfortunately prevail among the professed disciples of our Messiah.

But this we do maintain, and we maintain it, as we apprehend, on every principle both of reason and revelation, that he who honestly and earnestly, and in the spirit of Christian meekness, contends for any single circumstance of revealed religion, is as laudably though not so conspicuously diligent in his master's service, as those superior spirits whose wisdom and experience have battled with the rage of the pagan dragon, or unravelled the serpentine wiles of atheistic seduction.

But further: the argument which is thus deduced, a majore et instantiore periculo, requires the supposition of a case, which, if it be not impossible in itself, has never been for a moment possible since the first promulgation of Christianity; that the individual to whom it is applied is the solitary defender of our common faith, and of his own peculiar confession. It supposes that the deist and atheist have never yet received a sufficient answer to their objections; that if we, unfit as we may conceive ourselves for such a struggle, do not buckle on our armour for this particular quarrel, and to the neglect of every other Scriptural inquiry, we shall find, like the warriors of Ai, that our successes in other quarters have only served to draw us farther from the defence of our citadel; that, while we chase the socinian on one side, the more formidable deist advances on the other; and that we shall be called, ere long, from the exultation of fancied victory, by the crash of falling towers, and the smoke of our expiring temple.

Yet, surely, that vanity is little short of ludicrous, which supposes itself, like Elijah, alone in an apostate world, or which apprehends that, because Quintus or Titius is engaged in a subordinate skirmish, no watchmen are left upon the walls of Sion. There are, God be praised, many thousands besides ourselves in Israel who have never bowed the knee to Baal; and while we are occupied in the assertion of any portion of divine truth, we may trust without difficulty to the Lord of all, that defenders will not be wanting to the general interests of his cause.

Η και εμοι ταδε παντα μελει was the answer of Hector to the proposal of Andromache, that he should concentrate his forces to the defence of what was most valuable in Ilium; and their apprehensions, who suppose that in the din of controversy the Scæan gate will be taken by surprise, have more of feminine weakness than of that soldierly watchfulness, which is content to maintain with unshaken courage the post allotted to his particular care, and commits the rest to that great Captain of his salvation whose eye embraces every part and region of the battle.

The second assertion, that it is best to be silent on the subordinate features of difference among Christians, lest the heathen or the infidel should hesitate to listen even to those positions in which we are all agreed, may be sufficiently answered by the admission, that, in controversy with the heathen, we by no means recommend an undue or unseasonable protrusion of controverted points; and that it may be, doubtless, wise to establish firmly the elements of Christianity, before we call on our convert to agree with us in the consequences which, according to our opinion, those elements involve. But though the being of a God, the truth of the Mosaic history, the miracles of Christ, his death and resurrection, are positions which are primarily necessary to the profession of Christianity, yet are they first in succession, not first in consequence; first as the foundation of the rest, not first as of more practical importance than that superstructure for whose sake the foundation itself, in fact, is laid.

And, though it may be inexpedient to introduce such topics out of their place, it would be a lamentable want both of candour and courage to deny them when imputed to us; or, when called on to give an account of our faith, to soften away its peculiaralities for the sake of cheating mankind into a nominal Christianity. All which is implied in St. Paul's expression of milk for babes in Christ, is no more than the necessity of advancing first the simplest propositions in a chain of argument; and the same St. Paul, who, of all men, had a spirit most truly catholic, and whose converts were of all Christian teachers the most numerous, was not more active in extending the limits of the faith, than in repressing the domestic errors of those who had already embraced it.

What is, indeed, (we may reasonably inquire,) what is the practice which these zealots for universal Christianity recommend to the several sects who call themselves by the name of Jesus? The suppression, on one part and on the other, of truths which we severally believe to be divine; the admission of practices or opinions which our hearts regard as contrary to the gospel which we profess to teach! And of such a sacrifice what is to be the object or the end? To impose on a few ignorant deists, (if any deists are indeed so ignorant as to be thus imposed on,) by the appearance of a false unanimity among ourselves, and to recommend to their acceptance, as the common faith of Christians, a mutilated and disfigured religion, deprived of every peculiar feature which can distinguish it from natural deism, every discovery of God's will or nature which could furnish an adequate motive for the preaching or sufferings of his Son!

It may seem, then, if it be truly asserted, (which, however, has never yet been proved,) that unbelievers are chiefly deterred from Christianity by the mysterious features of our system—it may seem the best and wisest (as it is surely the most candid) method of addressing them, instead of softening down those obnoxious truths, which are not less true because they are obnoxious, to state with calmness and sincerity the grounds on which we ourselves have been induced to believe them.

The result of such a statement must be committed to that God who will not suffer his altars to be approached with unhallowed fire; in whose eyes deceit is no more a justifiable method of conversion than violence; who rejects alike the forgery of pretended miracle and the dissimulation of pretended candour; and who has pronounced an equal curse against those who add to and those who take away from the words of his book, the system of his revelation!

Not even, therefore, for the sake of converting an unbeliever, not for the sake of saving a soul, (if it were possible that a soul should by this means be saved,) is it lawful to dissemble our faith. Still less, however, can their cowardice or indolence expect a pardon, who, for the sake of repose, or in the hope of popularity, are content to purchase the forbearance of their adversaries by the abandonment of doctrines which they still believe to be true, and desert what they are apt to term the outworks of Christianity, for the sake, as they tell us, of defending its citadel more effectually. Such men it may, perhaps, be useful to remind, that concession, as a sign of weakness, is in worldly affairs regarded as an incentive to fresh assault; and that to press hard on the heels of a retiring adversary is a maxim as well in polemics as in war. But in fact we can pretend no right to compromise or suppress any single circumstance of that which is in Scripture impressively denominated "the entire counsel of God," and it is our duty to contend earnestly for the whole of that truth which was originally delivered to the saints.

Let me not, however, be mistaken. There is an unanimity to which every Christian is bound, (and of which that holy and honourable name is the pledge and only boundary,) the unanimity of good offices and affection. Where our best endeavours fail to prevent religious disunion, where difference is unavoidable, it is in our power, at least, to differ charitably. If we cannot pray together, we may, at least, do good in company; and our reverence for those common principles whose truth we acknowledge, though, in our opinion, they do not constitute the whole of that truth which is in Christ, will lead us to rejoice in their diffusion, however and by whomsoever accomplished. Where disunion is needless, we cannot be too catholic; but to sacrifice on the altar of pretended liberality those distinctive circumstances from which our individual hope is drawn; to weaken the hands of those who think with us, and to confirm by our example the rest in their deadly error; this is a conduct more criminal than the worship of Naaman in the house of Rimmon, inasmuch as our knowledge is more perfect than that of the Syrian chief, and the mercy which we have received is greater.

It has been objected, lastly, that the time which we bestow on these abstruser subjects is far more than commensurate to their practical importance and utility; that morality suffers while we concentrate all our force for the expulsion of error; and that the heads of our disciples are engrossed with barren mysteries, while their hearts are hardened or unimproved.

This argument, it is plain, proceeds on an assumption no less preposterous than that which I have already noticed. It is assumed, that there are no preachers of the gospel besides him who now enlarges on its mysteries, or that it is his unvarying practice to confine himself to doctrinal discussions, without ever insisting on those moral inferences to which every doctrine of genuine Christianity, will, if properly discussed, conduct him.

For, so far is the assertion incorrect, that a contemplation of the mysteries of Christianity is unfavourable to the Christian character, that, if it be more philosophical and more efficacious to furnish motives than rules for conduct; if it be possible to purify the passions by employing them on the worthiest objects, and by contemplation of the Divine perfections to raise the soul, in some sort, to the Deity; no surer way can be found to improve and strengthen the spiritual part of our nature, than the gratification of that natural and laudable curiosity after things unseen, by which the soul of man, as if conscious of her future destiny, delights to expatiate, so far as advance is possible, in those boundless fields of inquiry which are connected with the ways and attributes of the Almighty, the secrets of his government, and his intercourse with our intellectual being.

Such inquiries, conducted with becoming modesty, may be expected at once to elevate and to humble the soul; to elevate her powers by exercising them on the noblest objects; to humble her self-estimation by the sense of those narrow limits which must confine her hardiest flight, by the comparison eternally presented to her notice, between finite and infinite wisdom.

Spiritual pride, indeed, and metaphysical pedantry can only arise from, and are certain symptoms of, speculations not carried sufficiently far, inquiry too soon contented. They who skim the surface may think that all is known to them; but he who strives to sound the depths of ocean may receive, it is true, a rich repayment of his time and labour; but must desist at last with a feeling very different from pride. Our finite successes shrink into nothing when brought in contact with immensity, and we cannot rejoice that we have penetrated so far without recognizing the weakness which has prevented our proceeding farther.

Yet is not the sense of weakness which we experience in such an inquiry in itself either painful or degrading. The excellencies of a beloved object may be contemplated not only with wonder, but delight; the lustre of a benefactor is reflected on those who are the objects of his beneficence, and we ourselves become in some short identified with that greatness and glory which is exerted in our protection and happiness. The more we are sensible of the intercourse between God and his creatures, the stronger may our faith be expected to become, our gratitude the more lively. We shall feel ourselves elevated the more above earthly wants or wishes; and that which philosophy vainly boasted to perform, will be the daily and hourly effect of religious meditation.

But, though the advantages of a continued contemplation of the Deity be thus conspicuous, it must not be dissembled that those polemical discussions, by which we guard and vindicate the distincter features of that faith on which the Christian delights to dwell, are rough with the thorns of human passion, and beset with the rocks and precipices of earthly pride. The chicane of argument; the boast of victory; the pertinacious rejoinder of unacknowledged discomfiture; the personal dislike which transfers to our adversary that detestation which should be confined to his doctrine; ambition lurking under the cloak of zeal, and vanity not labouring for the cause of truth, but declaiming in the hope of triumph; these are some few of the fiends which have continued to haunt the mansion of religious controversy from the days of Tertullian down to those of Calvin, from Marcion to Servetus, and from Jerome to Bellarmine.

Nor need we wonder that portals occupied by such a garrison should be seldom and reluctantly trodden by those who have been permitted to wander amid the bowers of philosophy, to trace in the works of nature the evidence of almighty goodness; or whose warfare has been carried on with the common enemies of the Christian name, not those who differ only in their interpretation of the divine authorities to which both we and they look up with equal reverence.

What is necessary, however, must sometimes be undergone; and the safety of our brethren, no less than the same authority and example of the apostles, calls on us to observe the errors of our misguided friends with as keen attention as the open malice of our enemies; to repress the domestic seditions of the Christian church, as well as to labour in the extension and progress of her empire.

Nor must it be forgotten, that to unreasonable violence, or uncharitable imputations, religious discussion is not more necessarily liable than any other question in which the happiness or interests of mankind are deeply involved. The systems of philosophy, the inventions of medicine, are in our own times debated with as much of acrimony as the abstrusest doctrines of religion. The senate and the bar have had their bigots and fanatics as fiery as ever disgraced the altar; and examples have not been wanting in the more illustrious advocates of our own and foreign churches, which have demonstrated that zeal and wrath are not always inseparable, and that it is possible to defend the truths of Christianity or the sacred institutions of our ancestors, without forfeiting that charity which is to religion what the ark of the covenant was of old to the Temple of God.

And to this effect the following canons will, perhaps, be found to contribute.

First, That a perspicuous distinction be made, both in the statement of our subject and the degree of earnestness with which we pursue its investigation, between truths which are really divine and eternal, and those institutions which are only of human authority, or, at most, of temporary expediency.

Secondly, That no opinion be imputed to our adversary which he himself disclaims, not even if such opinion should appear to be fairly deducible from premises which he acknowledges.

For, though the argument ab absurdo be a very powerful and legitimate instrument in the war of words; and though it is not only useful but charitable to point out to our brethren and to the world the natural consequences of an erroneous doctrine: yet, if such consequences be disclaimed by our antagonist, we have a right indeed to argue from his inconsistency against his ability to guide the faith of other men; but we have no right to accuse him of insincerity, or to maintain that, because our inference is logical, he must necessarily see it in the same light with ourselves. We may caution his followers against the blindness of their guide, but it is more reasonable, as well as more Christian, to believe that his blindness is real, than affected.

Thirdly, It is fitting that we never advance an argument to convince or confute our antagonist, of the force of which we are not ourselves well satisfied. Even as worldly advocates such a practice is unwise, since the unsoundness of a single pillar may subvert the noblest temple; and since one detected sophism will do more injury to our cause than many good arguments can repair. But the practice is distinguished from absolute falsehood by shades so nearly imperceptible, that we may be very sure the cause of divine truth can neither require nor tolerate so weak and disgraceful an auxiliary. This rule will naturally extend to the exclusion of all those vulgar arts of controversy, those arguments expressly and solely intended to captivate the multitude, those inapplicable citations of Scripture, and those appeals to human prejudice or passion which, unhappily, occupy too large a space in almost every controversy which has arisen since the time of the apostles.

But the offence is yet more flagrant when we descend to the retailing of uncertain and offensive rumours; when we refer to documents of which the falsehood has been already proved, or which we cannot but ourselves confess to be unsupported by adequate evidence.

Of such misconduct a lamentable instance is afforded by a man no less renowned and admirable than the great Augustine himself, who is not ashamed, in his dispute with Faustus, to take advantage of the popular slanders against the followers of Manes, though his own experience (for he had himself been of the sect) was sufficient to detect their falsehood. And in later times, that we may omit those darker charges to which particular sects have been rashly exposed, (charges which the most positive testimony alone can justify, and which it was, a priori, in the highest degree improbable that any Christian sect could deserve;) in later times the Romanists have, in spite of repeated and satisfactory answers, continued to urge against our church the romance of Parker's consecration, while we ourselves are not altogether guiltless of falsely imputing to their public formularies the systematic omission of that commandment which we make the second in the Decalogue.

Nor is the impropriety of these doubtful charges diminished, if they are advanced on the authority of others, while we cautiously abstain from expressing any opinion of our own as to their truth or falsehood. If we believe them, why hesitate, with becoming firmness, to avow our conviction to the world? If we do not believe them, why are they advanced at all? Why, if it be not in the hope that our hearers may be convinced by those arguments which have failed to convince ourselves; that they may be induced to lean their confidence on that broken reed of which our keener eyes cannot but detect the insecurity?

Lastly, If we desire to avoid that bitterness of spirit which the obstinacy of a defeated, or the triumph of a more artful opponent is likely to kindle in our breasts, it is necessary to impress the mind with a thorough conviction of the very trifling importance of any single controversy in determining the faith of Christendom; the very small effect which our labours, even if most successful, might reasonably hope to produce on the opinions of the world; and the firm reliance which our faith should teach us in the ultimate triumph of true religion, though ourselves may not be among the appointed instruments by whose toils that triumph is to be purchased.

If with these impressions and resolutions we enter on the defence of truth, nothing else remains but a constant and studious comparison of our several positions with the final authority of Scripture, and an earnest and continual prayer to God that he would preserve in our hearts and our recollections those sacred principles, and that heavenly temper, without which it may be possible to cast out devils in the name of the Lord, and yet to find ourselves hereafter among those of whom that gracious Lord will be ashamed in the presence of his Father of the holy angels.

With these preliminary observations I now proceed to investigate the promise which, in the words prefixed to this discourse, our Saviour communicated to his disciples; in which discussion, it should seem, the following questions are naturally and necessarily involved.

It may, first, be demanded, who was that Comforter whom Jesus thus engages to send?

Secondly, Whether the promise of his aid were confined to the apostles only, or whether all believers in Christ in that and every succeeding age of the church have reason to believe themselves included?

Thirdly, Wherein that aid should consist which was thus graciously promised by our Lord?

Of these inquiries, the first, or that which respects the person of the Paraclete, would, at certain periods of ecclesiastical history, have been attended with difficulties which have long since ceased to operate, in proportion as the errors from which they arose have disappeared from the face of Christianity, or have so far purified themselves from their original grossness as to assume a less offensive form, and a malignancy less perilous.

Of those false Christs whose coming our Saviour foretold, there were some, it is said, who availed themselves of the character of the expected Paraclete to destroy or supersede that religion which the apostles had diffused through the world; who advanced against Christianity under the name of its appointed defenders, and assumed to themselves the impious power of explaining and amending that system of mercy and of power which, as the final dispensation of his will, had been confirmed by God through innumerable signs and miracles.

Even in the life-time of the apostles, and in those regions which, during our Saviour's abode on earth, had been distinguished by his personal presence, the magician Simon (whether he were the same Samaritan whose name is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, is nothing to my present purpose) aspired to perform that part during the golden age of Christianity, which in the days of its corruption the arch-imposter, Mohammed, too successfully attempted; and while he preached, as a more perfect gospel than that of Jesus, a wild and fanciful compound of evangelical truth, with the superstitions of Greece and Syria, he proclaimed himself boldly the successor and substitute of the Messiah; and applied to his own person, according to some authorities, (but, if we follow others, to that of his confederate and mistress, Helena,) the character of the Incarnate Paraclete.

The Heresiarch Manes was, in like manner, accused, and Montanus, doubtless, accused with justice, of assuming the same lofty title; nor did the followers of Mohammed omit to apply to their master so convenient an assertion of that Jesus whom he acknowledged to have been the greatest among the prophets and saints of the Most High.

Against all such claims, however, our Saviour has himself provided, by inserting a clause in explanation of his promise which effectually precludes all possibility of perverting his expressions to a mortal prophet or a second incarnation of the Deity. That clause, I mean, where he defines the novel term of Paraclete by one which was familiar already to his disciples and their countrymen: the Holy Ghost, or Spirit of God. "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name."

A title this, which we evidently cannot, with any degree of propriety, apply to a human or corporeal teacher; but it is also as evident, on the face of the assertion, and according to its literal tenor, that not only a spiritual effect or influence, but an intelligent and personal agent is intended, by whom those graces were to be dispensed which should entitle him to the name of Comforter.

It is, therefore, in the first place concluded, that the Holy Ghost is an existence or an intelligent person.

But, secondly, there are many passages of Scripture in which the person thus designated is adorned with the most striking and tremendous attributes of Deity. He is spoken of as omnipresent, as all-knowing; to lie to him is to lie to God; to blaspheme him is a crime the most awful in its guilt and consequences of which human nature is capable; and the inspiration of the prophets, which is in some passages of Scripture imputed to the Holy Ghost, is, in others, ascribed to the Almighty. Hence, therefore, it is argued that the Comforter is also God.

Thirdly, we read in the same clause of our Saviour's promise which identifies the Comforter with the Holy Ghost, that this Divine and Almighty Person was to be sent by the Father in the name of his Son. And, as the Person sent is, according to the necessary tenor of the expression, distinct from the sender, we deduce from hence the third particular of our belief respecting his nature, that he is a Person distinct from God the Father.

But, fourthly, as the unity of the Divine Essence is a truth so strongly and repeatedly disclosed in Scripture that we cannot deny it without at once renouncing the entire volume of God's Revelation, we conclude that the Holy Ghost, no less than the Word or Son of God, is, in some mysterious manner, at once distinct from, and united with, the Father; and that in these Hypostases or Persons, the one Almighty Spirit inseparably and eternally resides.

What further grounds we have to confirm us in these opinions, or how far our religious antagonists have succeeded in establishing a different interpretation, must be the subject of the following discourses; in which each of those deductions from Scripture which compose, on this article of our faith, the ordinary confession of Christians, shall, in their turns, be discussed and asserted.

LECTURE II.

Nevertheless, I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

It was asserted in my former sermon on these words of Christ, that in the name and character of a Comforter, Teacher, or Advocate, (in whichever sense we choose to understand the original word Παράκλητος,) not only an effect but an agent is implied, by whom the comfort, instruction, or protection, was to be conferred on those who were its objects. It was not consolation which Christ undertook to send to his disciples, but a person who should console them; it was not security, but a guardian; and one who should defend their cause and his own amid the storms and calumnies of the world.

This was the sense, no doubt, in which those impostors understood the promise, who themselves, as we have already seen, assumed the name and character of him whom Jesus foretold; and this, as our antagonists are compelled to acknowledge, is the obvious, at least, and literal meaning of the expression.

If the letter, then, of God's word, were to decide our present question, that question would be thus far decided already. It might still, indeed, admit of doubt, (for it is a doubt which belongs to a different period of the inquiry,) to what rank in the scale of spiritual existence the Paraclete is to be referred. The Sabellian who identifies his Person with that of the Almighty Father, the Arian and Mohammedan who regard him as a created Intelligence, might still advance their separate claims on our attention, and each support his own hypothesis as to the nature of the person intended. But that the Holy Spirit was, in the language of schools, an ens, not an accident; an agent, not an action; an actual being, not a quality or mode of existence; would remain in the number of those truths of which the application indeed may vary, but of which the reality is placed by common consent beyond the reach of argument or cavil.

Accordingly, those Christian sects who deny the Spirit's personality, are compelled to understand the Scripture in a manner which I have too good an opinion of their critical powers to apprehend that they would employ in the interpretation of any other work whatever, and to resolve those expressions, however simple in themselves, which speak of him as a real existence, into the airy vehicles of eastern ornament and allegory. And this resource is rendered necessary, not by the present text alone, but by many other passages in Scripture, in which actions and properties are ascribed to the Spirit of God, altogether inapplicable to a virtue or quality.

For as the only two classes of existence, of which we have any conception, are those of matter and mind, so whatever is capable of action or passion must belong to one or other of these grand divisions of being. Qualities, in fact, and influences, and powers, as they are, properly, only modes in which one being makes an impression on another, or itself receives one; so they have, in themselves, no real existence at all, nor can they be asserted either to do or suffer any thing, except by that common but improper form of expression which speaks of an accident as if it were itself an essence, and describes the manner in which an effect is produced by terms which can only, in fact, apply either to the agent or the recipient.

Thus, when I say that darkness is coming on, I must not be understood as intending that the accident of darkness is capable of motion in itself, but I mean to ascribe motion to some real existence, whose absence or presence deprives my eyes of the power of discerning objects. If I speak again of power being given, I do not mean that power in itself can be touched or divided; but I mean that some alteration has taken place in my body or my mind, whereby I am enabled to perform what surpassed my previous faculties. And thus, whatever name the scholars of Socinus think fit to bestow on the Comforter promised by our Lord, yet if purity, motion, power, resistance, if doing or suffering be predicted (and predicted they doubtless are) of the Spirit of God in Scripture, they must, I repeat, ascribe these accidents to some real existence material or spiritual, or else they must maintain that our Saviour and his apostles have clothed an abstract idea under the form of an allegorical personage.

That the Holy Ghost is no material substance it may seem, perhaps, a waste of time to prove, inasmuch as I am not aware that it has been seriously maintained by any one. The wildest anthropomorphist, the most determined organic philosopher, will allow, I apprehend, that the expressions used in Scripture can apply, if literally taken, to no other than a being sentient and intelligent, which sense and intelligence, define them in what manner we please, afford a sufficient distinction from insensible or merely animal existence for the purpose of our present argument.

To prevent, however, any future refinement of the patrons of mechanism and irritation, I may be allowed to remind my hearers that will, moreover, and affection, and choice, and authority are ascribed, in Scripture, to the Spirit of God, no less than the power of producing an impression on the bodies or minds of men. The apostles appointed, by their own avowal, such laws as "seemed good unto the Holy Ghost;" while our Saviour, in the sentence which I have chosen for my text, and in the general tenour of his other expressions when speaking of the promised paraclete, speaks, it will be found, of HIM, not of IT,—of a person, not a thing or inanimate substance. "I will send," are his words in the promise which has given occasion to these discourses, "I will send HIM unto you"—πέμψω ΑΥΤΟΝ πρὸς ὑμᾶς. Καὶ ἐλθὼν ἐκεῖνος, (does our Lord proceed with an accuracy of expression of which the slightest knowledge of Greek is sufficient to make us sensible,) Ἐλθὼν ἐκεῖνος ἐλέγξει τὸν κοσμον." "When HE cometh, HE "will reprove the world." But, more than all, in a sentence almost immediately following, (as if to exclude all such material or degrading notions as might be prompted by the material nature of that wind or breath by a comparison with which the operations of the Holy Ghost are illustrated), we find again the masculine pronoun employed, though coupled with a neuter substantive. The words, which are rendered in our translation, "when he the Spirit of Truth shall come," are, in the original, "ὅταν δὲ ἔλθη ἐκεῖνος τὸ Πνεῦμα τῆς Ἀληθείας." ΕΚΕΙΝΟΣ ΤΟ ΠΝΕΥΜΑ! How can this be explained, unless we admit that, under the name of Wind, an intelligent person, not a material substance, was shadowed by the Son of God?

After this it may seem, perhaps, superfluous to urge on your attention, that it would be absurd and unnatural to assert of a bodily and insensible agent, that "as he was to hear, so he should speak;" that such an agent could with no propriety be supposed to appoint overseers in the churches of Asia or Achaia; that Ananias could not with reason be accused of attempting to deceive an afflatus or stimulus; nor could our sins be said to grieve a being incapable alike of pleasure or pain.

I believe, indeed, (and my opinion is not shaken by any thing which has been advanced to show the uncertain meaning of the word רוח in the Old Testament, and of ΠΝΕΥΜΑ in the New), I believe that the instances are very few indeed which can be found of this supposed uncertainty. It is possible, and barely possible, that the celebrated passage in the first chapter of Genesis may admit of application to a material agent. But, with this exception, no instance has been shown, either in the Law or the Prophets, where the context makes it probable that by רוח אלהים or רוח הקדש a physical motion of the air is signified. Nor, in the writings of the later covenant can we find, as Athanasius has well observed, any single passage in which ΤΟ ΠΝΕΥΜΑ ΤΟΥ ΘΕΟΥ is not sufficiently distinguished from any material afflatus whatever.

Accordingly, of two hypotheses, either one or the other must necessarily be adopted; and if we do not acknowledge God's Spirit to be a sensible and intelligent person, we must resolve him into a metaphor.

But, in all expressions not professedly parabolical, it is, a priori, likely that the literal and obvious, not the metaphorical meaning is that meaning which the words are intended to convey. Were it otherwise, the use of language would be, in no small degree, overthrown, and the dictates of departed wisdom and the revelations of a merciful God would sink into a jargon of unmeaning sounds, or, at least, be degraded from a rule of morals and of faith into a field for the perverse and unprofitable ingenuity of the lovers of enigma and allegory.

Nor is it possible that our learned adversaries can require, in such a case, to be reminded, that they have, of all men, least right to depart from the literal and obvious sense of Scripture, who themselves profess to strip religion of its mysteries, and to restore or reduce the gospel of Christ to its primitive and intelligible simplicity.

But, if this projected reformation be only a return to the forgotten error of an internal sense in Scripture, if the plainness anticipated be the plainness of a riddle, and if we are called on to acquiesce in an interpretation of the Sacred Volume as forced, though not so edifying, as the devout refinements of Jerome, the splendid dreams of Origen, or the wild but not uninteresting phrenzy of Emanuel Swedenborg; but small are the gains which the multitude have reaped from the translation and dispersion of the Bible; nor will the tyranny long exercised by the knowledge of the few over the faith of the many be less extensive or less absolute, whether the words of life be in an unknown tongue, or in a style which is, to the vulgar, in every language, unintelligible.

If it be granted, however, which even a Socinian will not deny, that the volume from which our hopes of salvation are drawn is something more than a mere chain of allegories; that there are some facts, at least, in Scripture, simply narrated, and, at least, some few assertions to be taken literally; it may be reasonably required that, before we concede to our antagonists the fact that any particular passage is to be understood in a figurative meaning, they shall prove to us first, that the circumstances under which the disputed expression occurs are such as to make a recourse to allegory probable; and secondly, that the expression itself has those usual marks by which, in every rational composition, such figures of speech are distinguishable.

The motives are four, and four only, which can induce a reasonable man to depart from that general propriety of language, to violate which, without sufficient reason, is a transgression at once against good sense and natural feeling; and these motives are as follow:

First, if he desires to perplex the judgment and to tax the ingenuity of his readers or auditors: Secondly, if a future event is to be dimly shadowed, which it would be inconvenient to express beforehand with too much precision: Thirdly, if a disagreeable truth is to be cloaked under a less offensive form: and, Fourthly, if an apt illustration of the subject implied is afforded by the outward circumstances of the fable, or allegory, or metaphor.

The first of these motives is that harmless love of superiority, which, from the time of Sampson downwards, has vented itself in hard questions and enigmas,—but which, however harmless, the gravity of our Saviour's character, no less than the peculiar solemnity of his discourse and the mournful occasion on which it was delivered, must effectually prevent us from expecting to find in his gracious promise of a Comforter.

Of the remaining three, the first had been answered on former occasions by the several figures under which our Lord described, beforehand, his death and its painful circumstances; the second by those various comparisons of the vineyard, the fig-tree, the entrusted talents, which he employed to reprove his countrymen for their impenitence and spiritual pride: and, of the last, an instance may be found in his manner of instituting the Eucharist, where, by bestowing on the bread and wine the name of his body and blood, he exemplified in them his own approaching sufferings.

But, in the promise now under consideration, if it be still regarded as allegorical, not one of all those ends is answered, for which only we can suppose that allegory would be employed by the wise and holy Jesus. There was no necessity for concealing, nor did, in fact, our Lord conceal from his disciples the nature of the comfort which they were to receive; no reproof was softened, no aptness of illustration obtained by attributing such celestial favours to the distribution of an imaginary agent, and we must, therefore, continue slow to believe that the agent introduced is imaginary.

With still more reason, however, we may require our learned antagonists to point out to our attention in the tenour of our Saviour's discourse some one or more of those characters and notices, the want of which must render any figurative expression whatever, (I will not say enigmatical, for to enigmas themselves these principles apply,) but altogether fallacious or unmeaning.

They are notices like these, indeed, which, however conveyed, afford, in fact, the only difference between fiction and falsehood; between a parable and a lie; between the forged adventures of an imposter and the imaginary incidents of a romance; between an incorrect and unnatural description of objects and events, and the elegant illustration of those events and objects by the use of metaphor or allegory.

I do not mean that it is always necessary that the author or orator should introduce his illustrations with a definite preface that he is about to speak in parables; that he should prefix to his flowers of language the formal title of enigma or metaphor; or guard us, with the fantastic caution of the Enthusiast of Geneva, against believing that fishes can speak, or that the trees of the wood can assemble to elect their monarch. The same notice is more elegantly, and as effectually given, first, when the circumstance related would be trifling or out of place in our present discourse, unless it had some deeper meaning than our outward words imply, and, secondly, when the assertion, if literally understood, would be in itself absurd or impossible.

By the first of these marks, when our Lord had shadowed out to his countrymen their own impenitence and final ruin, the Jews were able to perceive that the tale of the fig-tree was spoken against themselves. By the guidance of the second, we readily understand that, when Christ gave the name of his own blood to that fluid which the apostles well knew to be ordinary wine, he could only mean that his blood should in like manner be poured out or spilt. And it is on the same identical principle of the impossibility of a literal meaning, that we understand and employ the figure of personification, whereby abstract qualities are represented under circumstances which can properly belong to real existence alone; whereby virtue is described as a celestial nymph, and justice equipped with her balance, her fillet, and her sword. But for these distinctive marks of allegory, we may in the present instance inquire in vain. There is nothing either trifling or impossible in the literal sense of our Saviour's expression, and it is difficult, therefore, to show, on what principles of criticism or common sense the apostles could have understood their Master any otherwise than literally.

But, further, the personification of an abstract quality, (since it is in this manner that our learned antagonists desire to understand the term of Holy Ghost or Spirit of God,) is only then either proper or intelligible, when the name assigned to the imaginary person is the known and constituted representative of the species which we desire to comprise; as justice is the abstract term for a succession of just actions; temperance and mercy for repeated conquests over our animal inclinations and continual gentle affections; and virtue, in general, for that habit or disposition of mind which produces all the several actions of justice, temperance, and mercy.

When, therefore, we speak of virtue as a celestial nymph, and when we dress out justice in that garb which she wore in the ancient pantheon, our hearers are well aware that neither corporeal beauty nor material weapons can, any otherwise than figuratively, be possessed by either the one or the other.

But if an abstract idea be personified under any other name than that which conventionally and usually represents it; if I speak of the awful beauty of Arete, or menace my auditors with the sword of Themis, it is impossible that those, who are not apprised that Arete and Themis imply in Greek what virtue and justice do in our own language, should understand by my expressions any other than real individuals, of whom the one is literally stately and fair, and the other so armed as I described her. No one, therefore, in his right mind, if he did not really desire to deceive, would make use of similar expressions, or employ a name to represent an abstract idea, of which that name was not the proper representative. But no series of actions, no moral or physical quality can be instanced which the Holy Ghost can be said to represent. He may be the giver of virtue, but he is not virtue itself; he may dispense either wisdom, or goodness, or power, but however he may, in himself, be strong, or good, or wise, his name is not synonymous with any one of these several accidents or habits. If the term of Holy Spirit do not represent a person, it will be difficult to say of what idea it is the proper or natural sign, and it is most natural therefore, and most reasonable to suppose, that a person was thereby intended.

But this probability is still further increased, if the effects described be attributed to an agent, which, according to the preconceived opinion of my hearers, and in the conventional meaning of the word, is a real existence or intelligence, and competent, without any figure at all, to produce the phenomena ascribed to it.

Had Socrates, when speaking of that invisible monitor by whose dictates he professed to be guided, described it under the name of his prudence, his foresight, or his conscience; (though he still might have imputed to it the actions of a preceptor of a friend;) it would have then been clearly understood that his language was metaphorical, and that by the imaginary personage of prudence, conscience, or foresight, he meant only to express a natural process of his intellectual faculties.

But, when Socrates declared himself to have received advice and intelligence from a friendly demon, his countrymen must have understood, (and he, doubtless, intended that they should so understand him,) that he was attended by one of those beings superior to man, whom, under the name of Demon, they were accustomed from their infancy to fear, to propitiate, to adore.

In like manner, if we had read in the book of kings, that the disobedient prophet was overtaken, in his return from Bethel to Jerusalem, by destruction sent from God, we might, certainly, have understood the words send and overtake to be poetical ornaments only, and have interpreted the story by the simple circumstance that the prophet had died on his journey. But when we are told by the sacred historian that a lion was sent to destroy him, that would be a strange hypothesis indeed which should maintain, that the whole is an allegorical description of an apoplexy or a stroke of the sun, and that the animal called a lion was entirely unconcerned in the slaughter-

But, in the present instance, and with those Jews and Jewish Greeks to whom the gospel was first delivered, the name of Spirit, it is acknowledged by all, was no less appropiate to a particular class of animals than with us the names of lion, or man, or eagle. It meant, we know, like the demon of the Greeks, a race of sentient and intelligent beings, and, though it included in its wildest range the whole sweep of immortal and immaterial existence from the Almighty to the human soul, it was most generally used to designate the inhabitants of the invisible world.

It is little to our present purpose to inquire how far the above application of the word רוח (of which the Hellenistic πνεῦμα is a translation) was an essential or primitive feature of the Jewish theology; whether its meaning were originally confined to breath, or air, or acuteness of intellect; or whether, as is surely more probable, the suspicion of invisible was coeval with the knowledge of visible existence, and the most subtile substance which was obnoxious to sense, was naturally employed to designate that still purer mode of being which was only perceptible by their fears. But, whether the doctrine of Spirits were primitive or no, or whatever degree of antiquity we assign to its prevalence; whether it went up with Moses from Egypt, or passed with Ezra from Babylon; in the time of Christ we know the name was used to express a real or fancied personage, of power and knowledge excelling those of man; of wisdom more refined as being unshackled by sensual imperfections; of strength not less to be dreaded because the arm which smote was unseen.

It was the denial of such a race which divided the Sadducees from the great majority of their countrymen; it was to their agency that the Jews were accustomed to ascribe every phenomenon of nature, and every accident which befel the body or the mind, and our Saviour himself, when he returned from the dead, was apprehended to belong to their number.

But, to such a being, all the actions which Christ ascribed to his promised Comforter were strictly and peculiarly appropriate. The guardianship of a Spirit was perfectly intelligible to those who believed in tutelary Genii: that a person of this kind might dwell with them and be in them was the universal faith or superstition of the East; and to the actual illapses or inhabitation of such good or evil intelligences, the ravings of madness, and the lofty strains of prophecy, were imputed by the common voice of antiquity. The Sibyll was supposed, at the time of inspiration, to labour with a present Deity. It was not the Damsel of Philippi, but the Pythonic demon within her, who recognized in Paul and his companions the servants of the Most High God; and when the fiend was cast out, or the Divinity had retired, the power of the prophetess was gone.

It was not then, by any communicated energy, but by their actual presence and prompting, that the beings of the invisible world were supposed to give to man either supernatural knowledge or supernatural power. Had our Saviour menaced his disciples with a visitation of the evil spirit, we are sure that they would have understood him literally; the spirits of fear, of infirmity, of dumbness, were all, in the mythology of the Rabbins, supposed to be real personages; nor has any adequate reason as yet been assigned, why their notion of the spirit of truth should vary from this general analogy.

It is said that the Messiah conformed his expressions to the usual language of the time, without heeding whether the notions which that language implied were, in themselves, philosophical or accurate? That, as he was content to ascribe, in contradiction to the truth, and in compliance with popular superstition, corporeal disease to an incorporeal agent; he was content, in like manner, to express supernatural gifts under the name of a visiting or protecting spirit? The first of these suppositions, if it be not altogether blasphemous, is, at best, of a questionable character; nor will those, who believe the Lord Jesus to have been, himself, all wisdom and truth, be inclined to allow, that, under any circumstances whatever, he would have lent his sanction to a false notion of the manner in which his Father governs the world. But the conduct ascribed to him in the second part of this hypothesis is more, far more, than a simple acquiescence in error. The wisest and best of men may suffer, under particular circumstances, a mistaken opinion to pass unexplained; but that man is neither wise nor good who, in making a promise, unnecessarily employs such terms as are likely to deceive his hearers. Jesus might, surely, have engaged to endue his disciples with supernatural power or celestial knowledge, without the introduction of any fabulous machinery. "My Father," he might have said, "when I am taken away, will bestow on you such internal comfort and such outward marks of his favour, that ye shall have little reason to regret my departure from the world. Ye are heirs to my miraculous powers, and shall, with a commission derived from me, and in a field of utility far more extensive than that in which I have laboured, succeed me as teachers of righteousness." This he might have told them on Socinian principles, but how different are such expressions from those of "the Father shall send you another comforter,"—"the Spirit of Truth, who is with you, and shall be in you." "If I go not away, the comforter will not come; but if I depart, I will send him unto you."

It has been objected, however, that the Holy Ghost, or Spirit of God, was understood by the Jews themselves in a different sense from that which they applied to the term of Spirit in general; that it was a customary and conventional figure to express a particular operation of God's grace, and was strictly synonymous, in the usage of the ancient synagogue, with the modern term of inspiration. And, in aid of this opinion, two passages have been frequently cited: the one of St. Jerome, where, after accusing Lactantius of denying the personality of the Holy Ghost, he calls such denial a Jewish heresy; the other of Maimonides, who defines that Spirit by which the prophets spake, to be "an intellectual power communicated to them by God."

But that these passages are sufficient for the purpose of our antagonists, the following reasons may induce us to do more than doubt.

The meaning of Jerome was possibly no other than, under the name of a Jewish error, to stigmatize the peculiar doctrine of a single sect, and to tax his antagonist with Sadducism. And it may be also worthy of notice, that, if Jerome had no better foundation for his charge against the Jews than he had for that which he has brought against Lactantius, the synagogue of his time was, in this instance, but a very little way removed from the kingdom of God. Lactantius, though that particular work be lost to which his accuser chiefly refers, has left enough behind him to evince the grossness of the calumny; and, though he ascribe, in common, as may be hereafter shown, with many others of undoubted orthodoxy, the name of Spirit both to God in general, and, more particularly, to the Son of God in his pre-existent majesty; he distinguishes, nevertheless, in his description of the Saviour's baptism, the Spirit, peculiarly so called, both from the Father and the Son. Nor have any of the ancient Christians more happily illustrated the difference between the accidents of material existence, and the eternal and intelligent emanations of an eternal intelligence, than this pious and eloquent champion of the faith, whom, on the accusation of one whose warmth too often rendered him unjust and uncharitable, the orthodox have, without inquiry, been ready to fling into the hands of a party at least sufficiently anxious to obtain any illustrious accession to their number.

If we should concede, however, to the assertion of Jerome and the similar testimony of Epiphanius, that the majority of the Jewish nation did really, in their time, deny the Personality of the Holy Ghost,—yet will not the prevalence of such an opinion in the fourth century after Christ, be regarded as a sufficient evidence of the original doctrines of the synagogue. Those doctrines may be naturally supposed, in the course of twelve generations of mutual bitterness, to have receded considerably from the ancient confession in every point which favoured or resembled the tenets of their Christian rivals. And the more recent, and therefore less forcible authority of Maimonides is liable to the further objection, that this ingenious writer has evinced himself in several instances disposed to depart from the usual tenor of Rabbinical orthodoxy. Disgusted with the legends of his countrymen, and anxious to obviate the discredit which their dreaming commentators had thrown even on the Law of Moses itself, the system which he has embodied in the More Nevochim, is, throughout, a sort of freethinking Judaism, as much at variance with the general confession of those whose cause he pleads, as the works of Crellius and Socinus with the prevailing tenets of Christendom.

And that, in fact, no small number at least of the more learned Jews, even so late as the fourth century after Christ, acknowledged the Spirit of God as a distinct and intelligent being, is shown by the positive assertion of Eusebius, (who quotes the Hebrew doctors as assigning him a local habitation in the region of the air;) by the fact which will be hereafter more minutely proved, that the Christians of the circumcision, however in other respects heretical, in the Personality of the Holy Ghost agreed with the Gentile Churches; and above all, by very numerous passages in the Rabbinical works themselves, which speak of him in terms altogether inapplicable to a virtue or abstraction only. By these writers the Holy Ghost is expressly opposed to him, whom we know the Jews regarded as a person, the spirit or power of evil; he is said to dwell in the hearts of men as another and a better soul; he is called a Holy Guest who honours the Sabbath with his presence; we find him described in their usual jargon as the Spirit of the Window whereby God's glory is revealed, and the Spirit by whom the dead are raised.

And, as it cannot be said that our souls are enlightened and our bodies raised by the same or a similar operation; as the acts described are distinct, the Spirit by which they are effected must, plainly, be an Agent, not a process; a Dispenser of various graces, not any single grace personified.

It is needless, therefore, to refer to the ψυχὴ or νοῦς of Philo, and the Binah of the Cabbalists, to ascertain the ancient creed. It is true, indeed, that these Hebrew testimonies fall very short of that standard of knowledge which the Christian Church has attained; and that the rank of the Holy Spirit, and his union with the Deity, were imperfectly, if at all, comprehended, by the Jews of any sect or era. But, neither can this admission be allowed to militate against the truth or importance of this article of the Catholic faith, without abandoning at the same time the resurrection of the dead, and all those other features of our religion, which it was a part, at least, of the Messiah's office, to reveal, or assert, or explain.

The illumination, in fact, of the moral creation of God, during the course of his dealings with mankind, has, like the advances of the physical day, been gradually and slowly progressive. The darkness of ignorance has been dispelled by a process almost similar to that which chases every morning the darkness of night from a part of the creation; and the leading truths which almighty wisdom has thought fit to reveal to mankind have been enveloped, at first, amid the clouds of type and mystery; in promises which might sharpen the attention of the soul, and in shadows which might soften to her eyes the too sudden glare of wonder and miracle.

At first, with the first men and early Patriarchs, we are introduced to the thin dawn and twilight of Revelation; the covenant taught by the mystery of the serpent's head, and by the institution of bloody sacrifices. Then came the dawn of day, but faint and cloudy still with ceremonies and allegory, and Christ appeared afar off, and reflected from the face of Moses. Still it grew lighter and more light as, to successive generations, successive Prophets announced, with increased precision, the approach of the destined Messiah; till, bearing in himself the full brightness of the Godhead bodily, with healing on his wings, the sun of righteousness arose!

True it is, that of the glorious prospect which the Christian day-spring opened to mankind, the component features were not new, though a new splendour encircled them; the roses of Sharon and the trees of Paradise were not then first planted, though their beauties were then first discernible; and the mountain of God's help had stood for ages, though its form was indistinct before.

When the secret of a knot is unravelled in our presence, we wonder that what is now so plain should have so long escaped discovery; and thus, we are told, did the hearts of the disciples burn within them, when they found that all the mysteries of the new covenant had been originally contained in the old, in those ceremonies which had occupied their hourly attention, those prophecies which had been read to them every Sabbath day.

But, till the knot is untied, its artifice is still an enigma; till the problem is solved, its component parts appear irreconcilable: the mystery of the triune Godhead, though it be implied, is not expressly revealed in the scriptures of the former covenant; nor can we expect from those Jews who so erroneously estimated the character of their Messiah, any accurate idea of the yet more mysterious Comforter. It is enough for the purpose of our present argument to have shown that, among the countrymen of Christ, the Holy Ghost was not considered as a merely abstract notion; that the spirit, which God caused to dwell with his saints, was believed, like other spirits, to be a real and sentient existence; and that no reason, therefore, remains, which could induce the disciples to understand their Master's simple language in a figurative or parabolical meaning. It is almost needless to add that it is, therefore, highly improbable, that such a meaning was intended by one whose object was, not to perplex and deceive, but to confirm, to enlighten, to console.

And this probability will be augmented in a tenfold proportion, if it shall appear on inquiry, (as it will, I apprehend, appear to all who inquire with sufficient candour and diligence,) that, of those believers for whose use, in every age of the world, the promise of our Lord was, apparently, intended, the great majority have, in every age, adhered to the literal interpretation.

If of a numerous assembly, the major part misconceive the purport of an oration, the mistake will be, in common life, attributed to a wilful or involuntary defect of clearness in the orator; he will be supposed to have purposely concealed his meaning from the passions and prejudices of the vulgar, or to have failed from natural infirmity in producing that effect on their understandings which was the ostensible object of his endeavours.

But neither mysticism nor weakness can, without the wildest impiety, be imputed by any Christian sect to our common Master. He came to give light to mankind, and he would employ, we may be sure, in that glorious mission, the means which were best adapted to his end. The manner, then, in which the majority of the Christian church have, in every age, agreed to understand any expression of their Lord, (though this agreement will be no absolute proof that their interpretation is true,) yet will it certainly go a considerable way to persuade a candid man that it is so.

And the presumption of its truth will be stronger still, if we find that, in this majority of believers, those ages are included which come nearest to the time of the apostles,—and that in antiquity, no less than universality, it has the advantage over the opposite opinion.

For, though nothing, doubtless, of divine authority, (and no authority can be absolutely conclusive which is not divine,) be ascribed to those remoter periods: yet, as every stream, in proportion to its length, is exposed to adulteration; and as every machine gathers rust by the very act of continuance; so is it reasonable to compare, as far as possible, our own opinions with the opinions of those ages, when the very youth of Christianity exempted her from some of those corruptions which are the attendant curse on time. But, in the weight of antiquity, no less than of numbers, the orthodox lay claim to victory.

To such a claim, however, two leading objections have been made: the first, that the ancient Christian writers were incompetent judges of scripture; the second, that those writers to whom we appeal were the favourers of a small, though learned party, who were themselves the corruptors of that faith which was primitive, and, till their success, universal; and who brought from Alexandria, among other Platonic absurdities, the doctrine for which I now contend.

These objections are neither of them new, and each has been already answered. So old they are, indeed, and have been so often refuted, that the time might seem but wasted which is spent in their discussion, were it not needful, that so long as they are urged they should not be urged unnoticed; lest the pertinacity of our antagonists should assume the garb of victory, and they should pretend, at length, to the triumphant possession of that field on which a superior arm has long since laid them breathless.

The accuracy or intelligence of the ancient fathers as interpreters of Scripture, I am little concerned to vindicate. As divines they were little better, and as critics, too often considerably worse, than many among the moderns, who must never hope to be referred to in the schisms of contending nations. But it is not as expounders of the gospel, but as historians of public opinion, that the theological writers of former ages are chiefly entitled to our respectful notice. Were their original observations less valuable than they are, (and it is vain to deny, to many at least, among their number, the praise of natural acuteness, of extensive learning, and indefatigable diligence,) yet, as contemporary witnesses to the ancient faith of the churches of Christ, the dates at which they flourished must always give importance to their decision; as in a question of prescription we are accustomed to refer to the evidence of the oldest neighbour, though that neighbour have no other quality but age, which can induce us to pay a deference to his opinions.

It is proved, then, in answer to the first objection, that, to our present purpose, the early Christian writers are not incompetent authority; since they are not adduced to decide whether the doctrine under examination be absolutely true or false, but only whether it was really the prevalent opinion in those ages with which they were best acquainted.

To the second objection, which refers the introduction of those opinions which we call orthodox to the commencement of the second century from Christ, and to the labours of Justin, Irenæus, and Tertullian, we may first reply, that this hypothesis is directly contrary to the witness of such primitive, or, as they are usually called, apostolic writers, as have transmitted any portion of their work to posterity. The passages are well known which have been produced from these venerable relics in affirmation of the divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is more to my present purpose to observe, that, on the personality of the Holy Ghost, their testimony is equally decisive.

Hermas, whom St. Paul salutes by name in his Epistle to the Romans, opposes in his "Shepherd" the Spirit of God to the evil demon, in terms which can only suit the opposition of one real person to another. The work of Hermas is, indeed, confessedly allegorical; yet is it, apparently, to an attentive reader, no difficult task to distinguish in what parts he is speaking by a figure, and in what expressing his own serious conviction; and when the good or evil genius is spoken of, we have no reason to believe that he is not in earnest, or that any other individuals are intended than Satan and the Spirit of God.

But, whatever doubts may exist as to the meaning of Hermas, none can be entertained as to that of Clement, the fellow-labourer of the same great apostle; who, as quoted by Basil, no less than in that epistle which only now exists in the Syriac translation, but of which Wetstein, no incompetent judge, so strongly urges the authenticity, attributes life, and anxiety, and active agency to the Holy Ghost, in the same manner as to the Father and the Son.

Ignatius, in like manner, in his Epistle to the Magnesians, (a work which has stood the severest test of criticism,) describes the apostles as rendering a like obedience to all the several persons of the Trinity. And the blessed Polycarp, in his expiring prayer, as preserved by those brethren of the Church of Smyrna who attended his captivity and wept around the flames of his martyrdom, gives glory to the Holy Ghost in almost the very words of our present doxology,

This form of praise, indeed, which was recognized by Dionysus of Alexandria as the ancient order of Christian invocation; which concluded the hymn of the martyr Athenogenes; and that yet more ancient Canticle εἰς ἐπιλύχνια, which was in the fifth century of universal and immemorial usage among the meaner Christians; is in itself an illustrious evidence of the ancient opinion of the church, and may prove that in the earliest times, as now, the unlearned majority were orthodox. It was, we learn from Basil, a pious and popular custom to return thanks in this form to the three persons of the Godhead by name, when first the lamp was lighted in the evening. Now, to customs of this sort, when they are universal, and above all, perhaps, when they are confined to the uninstructed and the poor, we can hardly ever err in imputing a very high degree of antiquity. For an unwritten prayer to grow into general usage may require, as it should seem, the lapse of more than a single century; and those of our order, whose duty has thrown them among the peasantry of the remoter provinces, will have had ample occasion to observe their tenacity of ancient customs. In the hymns, the legends, and the artless devotions of our English poor, it is often not impossible to trace the relics of superstitions long since passed away, of Pagan and Roman Catholic prejudices; but seldom, indeed, can we find a form of recent introduction among those habitual ejaculations of prayer or praise, which lull poverty to rest on her rugged couch, or welcome in the hard and wholesome repast of labour. In a cottage family the religious instruction of the young invariably devolves on the aged; the child is taught by his grandmother the same words which she herself had, in like manner, learned during her infancy; and thus, from year to year, the same address goes on, acquiring an additional sanctity in each successive generation. It will not be pretended by our learned antagonists, that the use of the Doxology can possibly have been of Pagan origin; and they will be perplexed, I apprehend, to assign to a custom which, in the days of Basil, was popular and immemorial, a less than apostolic antiquity.

But, be that as it may, the sentiment which it conveys is the same, as we have seen, which, amid the smoke and ashes of martyrdom, could raise the hopes and inspire the courage of the last surviving disciple of the last apostle, the beloved hearer of him who was himself the beloved of the Lord. If Polycarp were mistaken, who shall hope in these latter days to unriddle an evangelist's meaning? If St. John himself had erroneously expounded the promise of his friend, we may well close the volume of Scripture in despair, till the lion of the tribe of Judah shall return to open its seals.

Nor are the testimonies of the Apostolic Fathers, whether relating to the divinity of the Son, of the Personality of the Holy Ghost, of a nature which affords even the slightest internal reason to suspect interpolation or imposture. They are either pious ejaculations under circumstances wherein the soul of man would naturally revert to prayer; or they are arguments or illustrations connected with the discourse which contains them, and, therefore, not to be excluded without injury to its general texture. And, above all, the comparative vagueness of their expression may prove them to have proceeded from devout and simple minds, while incidentally speaking of truths which it was not their immediate business to defend. The hand of interpolation would have been coarser and more decisive; and, if the object had been to enforce the Trinitarian opinions, the expressions employed, we may be sure, would have been far more technically orthodox. The moderate tone and general nature of those passages where the Triune Godhead is implied, may convince us at once that the text is not in these instances corrupted, and may induce us also to believe that those tenets had been hitherto very little questioned, which are mentioned thus unguardedly.

If, then, we should admit the assertion to be accurate, that a majority of Christians were, in the days of Justin and Tertullian, averse from the orthodox doctrine, we might rather conclude that a departure from ancient principles had taken place among the more ignorant believers, than that, in the second century, those doctrines were new to Christian ears, which had been taught in the church by Clement and Ignatius and Polycarp.

In truth, however, those passages of Justin and Tertullian, which have been advanced with much parade of learning and no little scorn of those who have ventured to explain them differently, may be proved, on a candid inquiry, to apply to purposes far different from that for which they are ordinarily cited, and, instead of convicting the orthodox doctrine of novelty, are, on the other hand, very strongly in its favour.

Tertullian complains in his treatise against Praxeas, that certain Christians, whom he grants to be the majority of the church, though he at the same time objects to them, that they were, "simplices, imprudentes et idiotæ," having been converted from the worship of many false divinities to that of the one true God, and not understanding how this unity was to be believed together with the trinitarian distinction of persons, were alarmed at the thoughts of such distinction. And hence it is inferred (to use the words of one, who, if not the most distinguished, is at least the most forward of the modern apostles of unitarianism,) that, "the majority of Christians, being plain unlearned men, zealous for the divine unity, warmly resisted the trinitarian doctrine which some philosophic Christians were then endeavouring to introduce."

It is impossible not to regret that this ingenious person, no less than several greater names on both sides of the controversy, have referred to Tertullian for the purpose of controversy only, and have, therefore, regarded the present passage as distinct and insulated, not only from the general purpose of that work to which it belongs, but from the immediate and necessary context. To this we owe those idle verbal criticisms on the insignificant word "idiotæ," and the application of those rules of language and propriety to the fiery presbyter of Carthage, which would have been applicable, perhaps, to a Roman of the Augustan age. But if, instead of tearing in pieces a detached expression, we refer to the work itself, we shall find that Tertullian was not complaining of the difficulty which he experienced in introducing a new doctrine into the church, but that he was deploring the progress which a recent (a very recent) error was making in the west of Christendom.

Far from complaining that those opinions which were adverse to a faith in the trinity, were the result of deeply rooted prejudice, he speaks of them as "a novelty of yesterday," and reminds his fellow-Christians that this, "like every former heresy, may be confuted on the simple principle, that whatever has been from the beginning is true." Now, without discussing the truth or falsehood of his principle, it is evident, that the simple fact of his adducing such a rule of faith is altogether inconsistent with the conduct of one who was labouring either to corrupt or reform an ancient opinion, or who had offended the ears of the church by the introduction of philosophical novelties. His language is that of the jealous asserter of antiquity, the strenuous guardian of established doctrines: it is (and in their contest with heretics, this is the almost uniform characteristic of the Catholic party) the defender, not the assailant, who addresses us. But, if a Protestant in Rome, or a Socinian in England, were endeavouring to disseminate his tenets among the people, he would not, we may be sure, exhort his hearers to stand on their ancient paths, and beware of new-fangled teachers;—his arguments would be directed against the folly of inveterate prejudice, and he would urge the necessity and reasonableness of judging for ourselves, without regard to the canons and precedents of our fallible predecessors. Tertullian has been called by Mr. Belsham a philosophic Christian: but he must have been an idiot in the strictest modern meaning of the term, to have spoken as we find him speaking, had not the doctrine of the trinity been already in prescriptive possession of the minds of men.

What, then, is the meaning of his complaint? Exactly that which every jealous supporter of established doctrines brings forward, with whatever reason, on the appearance of a new religion,—the progress which it makes among the vulgar. And this progress, exaggerated, as usual, in such cases, by his fears and jealousies, he ascribes, with sufficient candour, to the inherent and admitted difficulties of the established creed, and the consequent eagerness with which the lower orders flocked to a preacher who professed, like Praxeas, to vindicate the unity of God, and to reconcile, as he undertóok to do, that attribute with the divinity of the Lord Jesus.

For, let not the modern Unitarian expect to find in Praxeas or Noetus a precursor of Socinus or Priestley; or anticipate, from the transient success of the ancient heretics, an abundant harvest of converts to the modern reformation! Whatever were the opinions of Sabellius, (of which our accounts are too contradictory to enable us to form any adequate judgment,) the doctrines of Praxeas are sufficiently known, and have no parallel, perhaps, in modern error, except the visions of Emanuel Swedenborg. He taught, indeed, one only person in the Godhead; but he taught that this person was no other than that God who was, at once, the Creator, the Redeemer, and the Comforter of mankind; who was born of a virgin, crucified under Pontius Pilate, and afterwards descended in a shower of fire on the apostles in the day of Pentecost. In other words, he united the several offices of the trinity in the single person of our Lord Jesus Christ.

To that Unitarianism, which, as described by Mr. Belsham himself, would rob us of every rational ground of confidence in the mercy of heaven; which casts on us again the burthen of those iniquities, under which the whole creation hath groaned and travailed; which reduces the Messiah to an earthly prophet, of whom we are ignorant whether he is in Heaven or no, to whom we owe no gratitude for favours now received, from whom we have nothing to hope or to fear,—to that Unitarianism the Christians of Rome and Africa were, in the age of Tertullian, strangers. The tenets of Noetus and Praxeas I am far from being inclined either to believe or defend; their inconsistency I shall have occasion, in the course of these lectures, to expose: but thus much may, at least, be urged in favour of their comparative innocence, that the fountain of salvation is not, by their means, rendered dry; and that, while they strangely confound the person of the Redeemer with those of the Father and the Comforter, they leave us, nevertheless, the consolation of an almighty Saviour, and an all-sufficient sacrifice for sin.

The complaint, then, of Tertullian, cannot, if rightly understood, be regarded as adverse to the antiquity or universality of those opinions for whose orthodoxy I now am pleading. And the words of Justin, in which he admits that some revered the virtues of Christ, who refused to believe that the Supreme Being should be born of a woman, and suffer by a shameful death, will be found, on examination of their context, and the occasion on which they were spoken, altogether as little favourable to the system of our antagonists.

Justin, it will be recollected, having already nearly worsted his Jewish adversary on the point that Jesus was the expected Messiah, the rabbin, as usually happens with the weaker party, diverts the argument to that which had only incidentally become a question, our Lord's pre-existence and divinity. Jsstin, therefore, reminds him, as any disputant would in such a case have done, that the Deity of Jesus was not the point under immediate discussion; that, on whichever side the truth might lie as to the peculiar tenets which Justin himself maintained on this mysterious subject, Trypho was not therefore justified in resisting the arguments drawn from the ancient prophets, to prove the general fact of our Saviour's mission from God. "There are some," he continues, "I do not think them right in such their opinion, but there are some who allow that Jesus is the Christ, though they deny his miraculous incarnation. We may, then, discuss the first of these questions distinctly from the other, since there is, in fact, no necessary connexion between the proposition, that Jesus was a prophet sent from God, and that he was an eternal and almighty Person incarnate."

That this is the general tendency of Justin's argument, our antagonists themselves will not, I apprehend, deny: nor, from such a statement can it by any means appear, either that Justin thought (which we know from his strong expressions elsewhere he certainly did not think) the doctrine of the Trinity unimportant to Christianity, or that the persons whom he mentions as holding opinions adverse to that doctrine were, in his time, the majority of Christians. Whatever, indeed, were their number, it is apparent that those individuals denied not only the Divinity of Christ, but his birth from a virgin, and that they must therefore have differed not from Justin only, and the orthodox Christians of later times, but from Socinus and Crellius themselves. And though the modern Unitarians have made so large advances on the scepticism of their more cautious and more learned predecessors, yet have few of them, as yet, attained so lofty a pitch of free-thinking as to reject the authority of St. Matthew and St. Luke, and to degrade our Saviour to the mortal son of Joseph the carpenter.

But, further, it is apparent, that it was the interest of Justin, so far as the success of his argument was concerned, to assign as much of weight as could with truth be assigned to the number and authority of these dissidents, since we find him urging their example on Trypho. He calls them, however, τινὲς not πολλὲς, far less πλείονας or πλείστους—"certain," that is, not "many persons." And the force of the word τινὲς is so far opposed to the notion of any considerable number, that it is known to be almost equivalent to ὀλίγοι, "a few."

Justin repeats, however, and repeats it with considerable earnestness, that he himself was far from assenting to an opinion so degrading to the Lord whom he worshipped; and he concludes by declaring, as our antagonists themselves understand the following sentence, that he should continue in his present sentiments, even though the majority of Christians should maintain the contrary.

According to their own interpretation, then, the sentence is obviously hypothetical; "In case it should so happen," he is made to say, "that the majority of Christians should embrace such an opinion, even in that case I would not assent to it." The Syrian martyr, then, might rather seem to contemplate the future possibility of encroaching heresy, than to acknowledge that tenets similar to those of Socinus and Dr. Priestley were, at that time, the prevailing sentiment of the church.

It may be doubted, however, with reason, whether the words themselves of Justin be capable of that rendering which Thirlby and Waterland have given them, and which only, though those learned men contemplated no such consequence as possible, can be applied to support the Socinian hypothesis. The sentence, οἷς οὐ συντίθεμαι, κἂν οἱ πλείστοι ταῦτα μοι δοξάζοντες ὦσιν,—which Waterland translates, "whom I assent not to, no not though there were ever so many concurring to tell me so,"—is convicted by such a rendering of a solecism of the most obvious kind, inasmuch as συντίθεμαι, a verb in the indicative mood, can with no propriety be placed in opposition to ὦσιν in the optative. If Justin, then, had desired to express the sentiment which they impute to him, his words, if he had spoken good Greek, would not have been οἷς οὐ συντίθεμαι———κἂν οἱ πλείστοι, but οἷς οὐ συντίθεμην, κἂν ἂν πλεῖστοι ταῦτα μοι δοξάζοντες ὦσιν.

But though the language of the Syrian martyr is doubtless far from classical, yet will not it be easy to find in his works any similar instance of contempt for the rules of grammar; nor can that be considered as judicious criticism, which, whether for the sake of avoiding a fancied tameness of expression, or of serving the ends of a sect, will adopt an ungrammatical sense, when another may be obtained without violating any principle of diction. The particle ἂν is, in the present passage, plainly, not disjunctive, but expletive; and the only sense of which the words are capable, is one directly adverse to that which the Socinians would have them convey,—an assurance, namely, that there were not many who, in the days of Justin, disbelieved our Saviour's Deity. Οἷς οὐ συντίθεμαι, κἂν οἱ πλείστοι μοι ταῦτα δοξάζοντες ὦσιν. "Quibus—neque ipse assentior, nec multi sane hæc mihi opinione ducti dixerint."

And that this is the proper rendering is apparent, if we consider, that in the days of Justin, and little more than a century from the death of our Lord, it is contrary to all evidence to suppose that the authority of the church was carried to a height so pontifical, as that even a question could suggest itself of a man's submitting his faith to the decision of the majority, or of guiding his conscience in a point of such importance by any but the written or traditional words of inspiration. The words which follow, therefore, and which have been sometimes supposed to be the reason given by the Syrian martyr, for dissenting from the usual doctrine of the church, are, in truth, no more than the reason why the universal church were so earnest to inculcate those opinions which were a stumbling-block in the way of Trypho's conversion, but which, as received from the Deity himself, their principles would neither allow them to suppress nor to compromise. Ἐτειδὴ οὐκ ἀγροικίαις δόξαις ἐκελεύσμεθα, ὑπ' αὐτοῦ τοῦ Χριστοῦ πεπείσθαι, ἀλλὰ τοῖς διὰ τῶν μακαρίων προφητῶν κεκηρυγμένοις καὶ δι' αὐτοῦ διδαχθεῖσι.

That the Son, indeed, and the Holy Ghost, were, as well as the Father, adored in the days of Justin, by the great body of Christians, we learn from Justin himself, in a treatise, where, of all others, a mis-statement of their opinions in this respect would have been most wicked and most useless,—his Second Apology for the Christians; a work wherein he justifies the great body of believers from the charges of atheism and superstition brought against them by their Pagan enemies; and wherein he professes to give an accurate exposition of those doctrines which they really believed and maintained.

Now I am convinced, that in those numerous apologies and (to use a word which has, during these few last years, become popular and almost technical) those "portraitures," which the advocates of different sects have, in our times, sent forth in commendation or defence of their respective tenets, no instance can be found in which the Apologist has ventured to ascribe, as an article of faith, to the universal sect, those opinions which were confined to a small though learned part of it. Not even where the tenet was of a popular character, and likely to conciliate the good will of those for whose perusal the Apology was intended, would such a conduct be hazarded. There are Quakers who dress themselves like other men; but would any of these, in controversy with an Episcopalian, maintain that this harmless conformity to the world was the general opinion and practice of the society for whom he was pleading? There are Protestants who reverence the Episcopal institution as of primitive and apostolical appointment; but should I, or any other Protestant who holds this opinion, maintain, in a friendly conference with a Romanist, that the universal body of Reformed and Lutheran churches in this respect agreed with me? Still stronger, however, does the case become, when the tenet in question has been the subject of derision or persecution; when it is esteemed the most offensive peculiarity of the sect, and that from which their enemies have taken most occasion to accuse them of blasphemy or madness. The doctrines of materialism and necessity have been maintained, we know, by many of the leading members of that sect which chiefly, in the present age, opposes the opinion of a Trinity; yet how explicitly do their ingenious supporters disclaim both materialism and necessity as essential or universal doctrines of the infant church; how strongly are we assured, that, whatever be the notions of individuals on these important subjects, such notions are neither taught nor received by the majority of freethinking Christians.

But the divinity of a crucified Man was a doctrine more revolting to the Greeks and Romans than the materialism of Priestley to the majority of modern believers: the injurious manner in which the influence of the Holy Ghost and the notion of a Trinity in Unity were derided by the Heathen, is apparent from the few ancient libels against our faith which have descended to the present generation. It was incumbent, therefore, on the Apologist of Christianity to show, that those opinions (whether he himself adopted them or no,) were the opinions of a small party only; that they were points on which the church permitted every man to think as he pleased; and that ignorance only or malignity could visit their supposed impiety on the universal body of Christians.

Such would, such necessarily must have been the conduct of the eloquent and (our adversaries themselves being judges) the honest and candid Justin, were the Unitarians correct in their hypothesis, that their present opinions were, in his time, those of a great majority in the Christian world. But how different is the declaration of faith which, not in his own name only, but as defender of the Catholic religion, he advances in his Second Apology!

"In gods like these," (he is speaking of the Pagan deities,) "we own ourselves to be unbelievers; but not in the most true and faultless God, and Father of justice and purity, and all other virtues. Him, and the Son who came to teach this Gospel to us, and the Prophetic Spirit, we with a true and reasonable service worship and adore!"

Such, in the days of the elder Antoninus, and barely half a century from the death of St. John, was the confession of the Greek and Syriac Churches. Forty years later, we have seen, on the authority of Tertullian, that a belief in the Trinity was the predominant and prescriptive creed of the Christians in Western Africa; nor can we better sum up the result of these testimonies than in the words of Irenæus, who was contemporary both with Justin and Tertullian and Polycarp himself, and who, as a native of Syria and a Gallic bishop, was enabled to speak with greater certainty of the predominant opinions in the Eastern as well as the Western world.

"This doctrine," he tells us, after a clear and copious exposition of all those points for which the orthodox are now contending, "this doctrine and this faith the Church, though scattered through the earth, has received, and guards as if her members were one single family. This she believes as with one single heart; this as with one single voice she proclaims and teaches, and delivers to her progeny. There are many languages in the world, but the tenour of our tradition is the same. The Churches in Germany believe and teach no otherwise; nor in Spain, nor in Gaul, nor in the East, nor in Egypt, nor in Lybia, nor those which are in the midst of the world, and in the central provinces of Italy. But as all the world is enlightened by the self-same sun, so does the doctrine of truth shine every where, and enlighten all who desire to come to it. Nor will the most eloquent of our Christian teachers add to this tradition, nor the weakest in the Gospel diminish aught from it. For when the faith is one, neither can an eloquent exposition add to its doctrines, nor the briefest statement detract from them."

It may seem, then, that little either of modesty or learning is shown in the assertion of the same surviving chief of Unitarianism whom I have already quoted, that one hundred and twenty years after Christ, "the majority of Christians, being plain and unlearned men, warmly resisted the Trinitarian doctrine." And not only will this supposed majority dwindle down into a comparatively small proportion, so small, indeed, as to have been alike unworthy the mention or knowledge of the defenders of the Church and its persecutors, so small as to have been unknown to Pliny and unnoticed by Justin, but of that proportion the tenets may, perhaps, appear to have been such as will by no means furnish a precedent to the modern Unitarian confession.

This inquiry, however, must be deferred to a future Sunday, when I propose to examine the probable source of those opinions which are peculiar to orthodoxy, no less than the recorded doctrines of those who, in the first and second centuries after Christ, dissented from the majority of their brethren.

LECTURE III.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi 7.

I have shown in a former Lecture, and shown, in part, from those very authorities to which our adversaries chiefly appeal, that, in the second century of the vulgar æra, and less than one hundred years from the resurrection of Jesus Christ, the doctrine of a Trinity of persons in the Godhead (in which doctrine the Personality of the Spirit of God is completely and necessarily included) was too widely diffused and too firmly seated in the churches both of the East and West, to have been, as our antagonists pretend, a heresy of recent introduction.

But neither can it be urged with any show of likelihood, that this opinion, or the other features of that faith which we call Catholic and orthodox, were derived from that little band of philosophical converts whom Christianity received, in those early ages, from the Platonic school of Alexandria. The mixture of that leaven with the church, if it ever took place at all, must, doubtless, then have been of a date too recent to produce the effects which we have contemplated; and the scanty infusion of learning, which was at no time sufficient to rescue her from the imputation of barbarism, can hardly have been an ally so dangerous as it is sometimes represented, to the primitive simplicity of religion. In ecclesiastical history the Platonists are conspicuous, because the share of knowledge which they possessed is advantageously contrasted with the general ignorance of contemporary believers; but that very ignorance would present an effectual barrier against the extension of their influence in the church. A jealousy of carnal learning and metaphysical refinement has been, in every age, the usual characteristic of men in that situation of life, and with those means of information, which we may reasonably ascribe to the primitive ministers of the gospel; nor is it likely that the poor and simple bishops of Gaul, of Pontus, or of Spain, should purchase the costly manuscripts, or attend to the airy reveries, of an Eastern or Egyptian philosopher.

The power of making proselytes on a rapid or extensive system is seldom, indeed, possessed by the recluse, the studious, or the refined. The habits of science are unfavourable to that activity which is the leading characteristic of the religious no less than the political reformer; and while Clemens or Pantænus or Origen were wearing out their days and nights in the composition of elaborate volumes, which few would read at all, and still fewer would read with unqualified assent, the banners of Christ were triumphantly carried through the world by those honest and unlearned missionaries, whose qualifications were confined to the courage of an ardent faith, and the untaught eloquence of feeling.

It is a problem, indeed, which the present is not the place to solve, to what extent the learning of a rising sect may contribute to its progress in the world. That some of its professors should be raised, by their acquirements, above the ordinary level of mankind, is a circumstance which may, doubtless, raise the general party in their own estimation, and in the estimation of other men; it may fling a grace and dignity over the adoption of their creed, and redeem their converts from those formidable imputations of enthusiasm or vulgarity by which every rising sect has, to a certain extent, been assailed. But learning to a rising sect is less a weapon than an ornament. The plume of the soldier, and the other pageantry of war, may illustrate, indeed, his triumph; but it is by the sword, not by the crest, that his triumph must first have been purchased: and it is by unlearned zeal and unpolished energy only, that a new opinion, or an infant state, can hope to conquer.

It may be doubted, perhaps, whether the students of Alexandria would have even desired to extend their peculiar tenets beyond the narrow bounds of Platonism. It is certain that they were neither qualified by their numbers nor their personal resources to extend a new opinion, in so short a space of time, through the numerous and scattered communities of the faithful.

And though some learned converts from the Platonic sect have, doubtless, adorned Christianity with some of the noblest monuments of genius and piety which our religion has to show; yet is it by no means true that a general approximation took place between the tenets of the academy and the gospel, or that any considerable influx of learning or talent was derived to the latter from the former. There was too much of interested monopoly, too much of priestcraft among the latter Platonists, to allow them to discover truth or merit beyond the limits of their sect; and the examples of Apuleius, Jamblichus, and Apollonius of Tyana, may prove that their leaders were more inclined to pretend to divinity themselves than to acknowledge the divinity of Jesus. And the following short review of the leading tenets of the modern Platonic, or, as it is called, the Pythagorean philosophy, may convince us, that their system can by no means be regarded as the parent of that which we now profess; and that much of prayer and more of grace was needful before a pagan philosopher could subdue his pride to the standard of the orthodox confession.

The leading question which, at the particular time of which I am speaking, divided the opinions and occupied the attention of the educated part of mankind, was the nature and origin of evil; a problem which the eastern Magi and the Alexandrian Platonists alike undertook to solve by the brilliant but unsubstantial theory of two opposing principles, to whose struggles they ascribed that chequered face of creation, of which the acknowledged beauties and apparent faults forbade them to ascribe the whole to either a good or evil fountain.

Of these two warring powers, this perfect and living light, this deadly and impenetrable darkness; this unaltered bounty, and this wickedness untameable; the first was God, the pure, the perfect unity, from whose creation only pure and holy things and beings like himself could issue. The light itself and the inhabitants of light were all alike his offspring; all which, on earth, was virtuous or fair, or wise, was only so far fair and wise and virtuous as it emanated from his perfection; and the time was anticipated when the final triumph of holiness and wisdom should be no longer delayed; and when the God of goodness should destroy or conquer all by which his gracious designs had been hitherto opposed or impeded.

But though their notions of the deity were thus pious and reasonable; and though, in some obscure expressions of their master, we may trace a yet nearer approach to the truth, in the adumbration of a Threefold existence in the Godhead: yet did they not, in practice, honour him as God of whose essence they had so clear a knowledge; and, by a prudent conformity with the superstition of the times, they paid a willing reverence to the gods and idols of their ancestors, as vicegerents of the One Supreme, and as those to whom he had committed all care of that mortality which was beneath his own attention.

Their opinions as to the material principle were of a nature still less conformable to religion or to reason. They did not, indeed, at the time of which I am speaking, (it is, perhaps, a vulgar error to suppose they ever did), ascribe to any thing evil or material either the name or characteristics of Deity. But to matter they nevertheless imputed an eternal being, a perception of pleasure and of pain, and a blind and stubborn instinct of self-preservation, which, inasmuch as its very existence was impure and opposed to the spiritual life, was exerted always in afflicting or debasing those spiritual creatures which were entangled in the vortex of its influence.

Of the evil demons, to whose agency no small proportion of the natural and moral phenomena of the present life were ascribed, two different opinions were held. Some there were who supposed them to be human souls or heavenly spirits, who by intercourse with matter had depraved their habits and affections: by others they were regarded as exhalations from the more fiery and vivacious particles of matter itself; a little elevated, indeed, above the lion or serpent of the visible world, but to be controlled, like their brother monsters of the forest or the fen, with menaces, or flattery, or food; to be bound by exorcism and allured or chased by odours.

But, whatever were their differences in these and other circumstances of superstitious detail, in one leading principle the several parties agreed; that matter was, in itself, incurably corrupt, the origin of all moral evil; that "the drop of heavenly dew" (for so Synesius calls the soul) was degraded and enslaved by its confinement in this earthly cistern; that the thoughts and wishes of the sage were capable of only one direction; and that his spirit coveted incessantly to exhale once more to that region whence she had descended.

From this opinion, when applied to practice, two very opposite systems took their rise. The professors of the one, regarding the body as an obstinate and malicious slave, enjoined their followers to macerate him with abstinence, and to punish him with stripes and chains; while the defenders of the other, detached from the world, and occupied without ceasing in the contemplation of the Divine Essence, professed to abandon the outward man to the guidance of his own instinct or passion, as one in whose sensual pursuits the soul had neither interest nor responsibility, and whose brutish gambols were beneath the notice of a pure and abstracted spirit.

It is evident, however, that these previous notions would conduct the Platonists to conclusions directly at variance with those peculiar opinions of which the introduction has been ignorantly ascribed to their influence.

I. As the reduction of matter into form was regarded as an office unworthy the immediate hand of God; and as the imperfections which they found or fancied in the visible world made them still more unwilling to ascribe its fabric to the Allgood and Allwise; they were accustomed to refer this work to a subaltern, perhaps an evil, agent, whom their hatred of the Jews induced them readily to identify with the Jehovah of that unpopular nation.

II. Having assumed as a principle the utter impurity of matter and all its accidents, the union of the soul with the body of man was regarded as a crime in itself, or as the punishment of former offences. They absolutely, therefore, refused to believe that a pure and perfect Being could subject itself to an union so unnatural; that the Divine nature could become incarnate, and as incarnate, so susceptible of hunger, of thirst, of bodily infirmities, and death.

Lastly, they denied altogether that the body once deceased could be raised to happiness or glory; much more that a person clothed with such an incumbrance could be admitted into the presence or enthroned at the right hand of God.

They were principles like these which produced, in Porphyry, the most formidable antagonist whom Christianity ever encountered; they were these which raised the empiric Apollonius to his subsequent fabulous eminence; which are sometimes supposed to have withdrawn the great Ammonius from the communion in which he was educated; which seduced the acute but pedantic Julian to the forgotten superstition of his ancestors; and which kept Synesius, beneath the mantle of episcopacy, more than half a Pagan still.

Among those few Platonists, indeed, who embraced a nominal Christianity, the same preconceptions led them for the most part to join any sect of Christians, rather than those whose tenets I am now defending; to deny, with the Docetæ, the bodily existence of Christ; or to degrade him, with the followers of Carpocrates, into a merely human philosopher. And, while almost all the heresies which distracted the church during the three first centuries are deducible from Platonic principles, the small number of philosophers who embraced the Catholic faith were rather orthodox in spite of their Platonism, than conducted by Platonism to orthodoxy. The words of Tertullian are well known, in which he calls the great master of the Academy, "the seasoner of all heresies;" and the contumely to which Origen himself was exposed in the ancient church may prove, that the allegiance of the Alexandrian school to Christianity was at no time free from suspicion among the more rigid and less learned believers.

But if the Platonists had really sufficient influence with the Christian world to infect, as our antagonists maintain, their faith with the doctrine of the Trinity, why, it may be asked, was the contagion limited to this one peculiar opinion?

Were the ceremonies of magic or the notion of the metempsychosis less likely to seduce an ignorant multitude than a speculation as to the manner of the Divine existence; or were they more at variance with the spirit of Christianity than, if we believe our antagonists, the adoration of the Holy Ghost and the Son? Or how can we believe that the Platonist, who, to gain admission into the Church, had renounced his more obvious peculiarities, should have raked out, from the darkness of the Timæus and the Parmenides, a doctrine which, far from being a conspicuous tenet of the Academy, was hardly known, it may be thought, to its students, till it was quoted against them by the Christians?

That a doctrine, however, may be found in the works of Plato which bears a resemblance, though an imperfect one, to the Catholic faith of one Divine Being displayed in three Hypostases, is a truth acknowledged by all. And though the above considerations may prove, that the Christians cannot have borrowed it from the Academy, the Socinians may do well to reflect, whether that opinion, which was espoused by the deepest thinkers of the ancient world, can be, in itself, so repugnant to natural reason or natural religion as its opponents would have us believe.

But, not only is it highly improbable that the orthodox opinion should have been introduced into Christianity by the Platonist, it may be shown, that we must, on every rule of likelihood (and independently of those proofs which it is in our power to produce from the Apostolic writings,) assign its introduction to the Apostles themselves.

For, first, we have already seen the confidence with which Justin and Irenæus and Tertullian appeal to Apostolic tradition and authority.

To the general weakness of such appeals in themselves I must not be supposed insensible: I am far from denying that, in the space of half a century, many actions or assertions might be fathered on the Apostles, of which the Apostles were altogether guiltless. But though Apostolic tradition be not alone sufficient to establish the truth of any particular doctrine, yet, from the frequency of these appeals two facts will necessarily follow: 1st, That the orthodox regarded the Apostles as the original founders of their sect; and, 2dly, That they acknowledged no interruption in the tradition of the Church; no subsequent loss and revival of the Apostolic tenets.

But as every innovation must have had its beginning, every religious sect its heresiarch, so will it also be allowed, that the doctrine of the Trinity (if it were indeed an innovation and a heresy,) must needs have been introduced, if the Apostles were still alive, in opposition to their authority; if after their decease, in opposition to the general sense of that Church which they had established.

Is it not plain, however, from the common custom and common sense of mankind, that a sect would hold in honour, as their teacher and spiritual father, that person from whom they had received their peculiar opinions, not those by whose authority such opinions had been originally opposed and anathematized? Do the Calvinists call themselves after the name of Luther, or will the Protestants appeal to the traditional sentiments of Bellarmine? Is it Ali or Omar whom the Sunnites reverence? and if Cerinthus or Carpocrates had superceded in the Church the authority of Peter and John, would the latter or the former names have stood conspicuous in the Christian rubric, and assumed, in our temples and our manuals of devotion, the attitude and halo of sanctity? Would not the Gospel of Leuce have in such a case supplanted that of Luke? and would not those who, sixty years afterwards, professed the same opinions, (instead of appealing to the real or pretended sentiments of those Apostles from whom they had revolted,) have told us of his triumphant zeal who had extricated, from the mists of Jewish error, that genuine religion which the original followers of Jesus had obscured or betrayed?

For those whom we call Apostles or Evangelists the heretical sects had no such implicit reverence. St. Paul was styled Apostate by the Ebionites; and in like manner, beyond a doubt, would the Trinitarians have proceeded, had they derived their origin from any of those whom the twelve had delivered to Satan.

"But the heresy," it will be said, "is the error of a later period; and the last of the Apostles had gone to his reward before Christ was worshipped as a God, or the Holy Ghost revered as a distinct intelligence."

I will not now remind our learned antagonists, that not only had these doctrines been taught by Clemens, Ignatius, and Polycarp, but that in the days of Justin and Irenæus they were the prevailing and prescriptive opinions of Christendom. I will not ask them to calculate what time is needful to disperse an idolatrous creed (for such they esteem it) through the many thousand Unitarian churches which must have arisen, during the lifetime of the apostles, in every region of the empire. But whenever the innovation was effected, it must, doubtless, have had a beginning; and if that beginning had been opposed by the scholars and immediate successors of the twelve, supported by their recent authority, the apostles, it is plain, would not have been held in such exalted reverence by the fathers of the succeeding age.

We may perhaps be answered, that "the crafty heretic who sowed such tares in the evangelical field, professed no novelty, but the revival of ancient opinions; that he grounded his system on the alleged authority of the apostles themselves, which the universal church, as he pretended, had subsequently corrupted or mistaken."

That this should be attempted, and attempted with success, at a time when the last of the apostles was hardly cold in his grave, and while many thousands were yet alive who had received from his living lips instruction, and from his hands ordination and authority, is a mystery, it may seem, as hard to be believed as any one of those for which the Socinians despise and revile us. If we granted, however, what can only be granted for the sake of argument, that this reply might solve the difficulty which arises from the frequent reference of the early fathers to apostolic tradition and authority, yet will another remain, which Unitarian ingenuity, I apprehend, can hardly obviate.

For, 2dly, the appeals of Tertullian, Irenæus, and Justin, to apostolic authority, are perfectly silent as to any interruption of that tradition to which they lay claim, or to any loss and subsequent revival in the church of those tenets which they profess to have been the tenets of our Lord's immediate followers.

But if the orthodox opinions arose in the church from any other teaching but that of the apostles themselves, there must, doubtless, have been a time at which they were unknown. And on whatever pretence and by whatever artifice their introduction was effected, its author, whether reformer or innovator, could not, we may be sure, have produced so great a change, without a painful struggle against previous opinion, and a display of talents of some kind or other which must have ensured him the veneration of his followers.

The name of reformer or restorer, in the general estimation of mankind, is little less illustrious than that of first discoverer. Luther, we know, as well as Melancthon and Calvin, professed to teach no novelties; but to inculcate a return to the primitive models of doctrine and faith and worship. Manes and Mohammed revived, as they pretended, the original tenets of the Messiah; yet when will these men or the changes which they effected pass away from the memory of the world? Had such a revolution as our antagonists suppose taken place in the Christian church during the first century of its existence, would not the volume of Eusebius have overflowed with its details, and would not the teacher by whose agency it was accomplished have assumed a scarcely less lofty rank in the estimation of his followers than Peter or James or John?

Such a teacher as is here supposed would have been honoured by Trinitarians as the second founder of Christianity; as the reviver of a church oppressed by Jewish prejudice; as the comforter and purifier of the afflicted household of Jesus. His patient journeys from Syria to Spain, and from Alexandria to Lyons, while disseminating the revived opinion; his arduous disputes with the patrons of established prejudice; his fearless indifference under the anathemas of the impious, and the holy zeal which mocked the arts of Ebionite blandishment; all which the Arians (if their sect had triumphed) would have related of their supposed reformer; all would have swelled, beyond a doubt, the annals of religious controversy, and have remained as a sacred legacy to the gratitude and imitation of succeeding Trinitarians.

But for this elder and greater Athanasius we search the page of history in vain. Of such a convulsion no traces are found in the writings of the earliest fathers. They, like ourselves, treat every opinion but their own as an impious and daring novelty; and acknowledge no other founder or renovator of the faith than that omniscient Spirit who separated Barnabas and Paul to the work of converting the Gentiles.

Nor will it be said by those who are even moderately acquainted with the ordinary progress of opinion, that a change so considerable could have been effected in night and silence; that "the corruption was so gradual that its original author is unknown; that the venom devoured the vitals of religion, before those outward symptoms were displayed which would have produced, at first, a prompt and efficacious remedy."[g]

The time was too short, the years were too few, the body was too extensive, for an imperceptible cause to produce effects so portentous. The corruption of a single church might have been effected in a few years of neglect and ignorance; but to pervert the whole empire of Christ with one universal and unobserved contagion, must have required the lapse of more than a single century. The transition which is rapid must be painful; and whatever is painful will neither pass unperceived nor be speedily consigned to oblivion. If such a change as this has not been noticed by contemporary writers, we may be sure that it never took place at all.

Nor can it be urged with any show of likelihood, that, in adducing the opinions of that body of Christians who have agreed in the worship of a Triune Deity, we are contenting ourselves with the party statements of a single sect; conspicuous indeed from the final subjugation of the Christian world, by their arts and their influence; but, at the period which is now in question, not more entitled to our deference, either from numbers or respectability, than many of those reputed heretical bodies, who have perished in the lapse of time, or under the sword of persecution. For that they to whom the titles are applied of the church and the Catholic Christians were, indeed, as those names imply, the great majority of believers, the assumption of such lofty titles, in opposition to all who dissented from their worship or jurisdiction, is itself no inconsiderable argument.

For when all alike were levelled by the iron hand of persecution, to what pre-eminence but the pre-eminence of numbers could any single sect lay claim? What endowment, what authority did the orthodox enjoy under the yoke of Severus or the Antonini, beyond the poorest Ebionite, the wildest and most frantic Basilidian? What were their privileges but a popularity more obnoxious to the jealous rigour of the law; an honourable but fatal preponderance in the noble army of martyrs; a more than common share in the distinctions of the cross, the gibbet, or the wheel? Where the authority of the church or assembly is appealed to by the ancient Fathers, it can be only that authority which arises from general opinion; and the appeal would have been worse than ridiculous, had those societies, against whom the church employed it, been able to muster as strongly as herself.

But, further, in the discussion of the spirit's personality, it is altogether unnecessary to confine our inquiries to the limits of orthodoxy alone, since not only the Catholic church, but by far the greater part of those who have dissented from her tenets, have maintained with no less precision than ourselves this common opinion, and have united with ourselves and our fathers to receive the promise of our Lord in its literal and obvious meaning. However they were divided as to his rank in the scale of nature, and the manner of his procession from the Deity, they did not cease to revere him as an actual Patron and Advocate; and Manes and Arius, and Mohammed himself, may be no less urged against the followers of Socinus than Athanasius, or Basil, or Hilary.

The first of these, whose opinions have been cleared from all their ancient obscurity by the patience and learning of Beausobre, assigned to the Spirit of God, an existence and habitation distinct from the Father, and offices and actions applicable to a person only; and the followers of Manes were by the avowal of Augustin himself, no less correct than that most orthodox Bishop in the confession of a perfect Trinity.

The opinion of the Arians is known from the concurrent testimony of Theodoret and Epiphanius; from the facts that Basil, in his treatise on the Holy Ghost, composed during the heat of the Arian controversy, is only concerned to prove the divinity of the third person in the Godhead, without regarding it as a necessary part of his task to vindicate his personal existence; and that Arius himself, in his epistle to Alexander, admits expressly the existence of three heavenly persons, though he denies their mysterious union, and allows to one of them alone the title of God. Mohammed, too, though he sometimes assigns the name of Holy Ghost to our Saviour, more usually identifies him with the angel Gabriel; and in either case can only be understood as imputing to him a distinct and intelligent Being.

And to these, by far the greatest streams which have ever emanated from the Christian source, may be added the more ancient suffrage of the first heresiarch Simon; of the primitive Gnostics, whose Ennæa and Monogenes can be no otherwise interpreted than of the spirit and eternal word; of the Ebionites, who, if we believe Epiphanius, acknowledged the Holy Ghost to be a real and most powerful Personage; of the Nazarenes themselves, in whom the modern Unitarians would gladly find a precedent for their error, but who, in two several passages of their own gospel, according to the Hebrews, must have learned the same opinion.

Nor must we omit, in this enumeration of evidence, the expressive silence of the orthodox fathers, who, in relating the errors of other ancient heretics, afford no reason to suppose that they were in this respect defective, though neither Epiphanius nor Jerome nor Theodoret were inclined to overlook or to soften the features of religious disunion. Where the innocence of Lactantius could not escape uncensured, there is little probability that real heresy would be allowed to pass without detection; and we must therefore confine the denial of the Holy Ghost to those sects only to whose charge it is expressly laid, to the Sabellians of ancient times, and the modern followers of Socinus.

Nor is there need of any further argument to show, that if we have erred in embracing in its literal sense the promise of our gracious Master, we have erred in company with the Christian world of every party and period; and that all, with the above exceptions, (which, how slight they are, is known to every one even moderately versed in history,) all have anticipated a powerful and personal agent in the Comforter by whom our Saviour's presence was to be supplied.

But let God be true and every man a liar! Though we expect, and expect with reason, no little weight of evidence to withdraw us from an interpretation of Scripture, which if it were not founded on truth could hardly have been universal; against evidence, nevertheless, however offered to our notice! against that evidence, above all, which is professedly founded on Scripture, our reason and our religion alike forbid us to rebel. An explanation may be true, (by bare possibility it may,) and if demonstrated from the word of God it may still demand our acquiescence, though it have slumbered for ages in the fairy shades of allegory; though the wandering genius of Origen have never disturbed its repose; though Manes and Augustin have failed alike to trace it; and though St. John himself have concealed its mystic clue from his disciples Polycarp and Ignatius.

We challenge, then, our antagonists to make good their hypothesis by the only proof which remains; and (since the literal sense of our Saviour's promise is, confessedly, in our favour) to demonstrate that the spirit of God is elsewhere spoken of in scripture, under circumstances and in language which prove the present passage to be allegorical.

And this has been attempted by the production of several passages from the Old and New Testament, where (by the common avowal of both parties) the term of Holy Ghost, or Spirit of God, is used under circumstances which cannot properly belong to a Person.

Thus we read of the spirit being given and received, and given in a larger and smaller proportion: the Holy Ghost is said to be extinguished by human carelessness, and to be improved by human piety.

"But a Person, and, above all, a Person of so exalted a nature is incapable," they tell us, "of accidents thus degrading; and if these accidents are predicated of the Spirit of God, that Spirit can be no intelligent Person."

This is the purport of the objection, as it is advanced by the most considerable teachers of Unitarianism; and it is an objection, I believe, which has had more effect than any other on those whom they have persuaded to adopt their opinions.

That it is not, however, an objection which a person moderately versed in the forms of reasoning need greatly fear to encounter, may appear from the following considerations.

In the first place, our antagonists must allow, that, whatever be the character of those passages from which the Personality of the Spirit is inferred, those texts which are advanced to prove the contrary are clearly and necessarily figurative. The expressions which have been referred to, if literally understood, are as completely inconsistent with their hypothesis as with ours; inconsistent, indeed, with every hypothesis, but that absurd one which would reduce the Holy Ghost to a material fume or afflatus. An accident, or modus operandi, which has no existence in itself; an abstract quality, which is the empty phantom of a rhetorician's brain; these can be no more conferred or divided than they can be sent or grieved or blasphemed. Nor are the latter expressions more appropriate to a person than the former to a substance or thing.

But qualities, attributes, virtues, powers, are nothing else, as has already been shown, than the manner in which certain effects either are or may be brought to pass; and whether the Holy Ghost be an accident or a person, it is plain that such expressions as those referred to are only intelligible as applying those characteristics which are proper to the thing produced; either to the manner in which it is produced, or to the agent which produces it.

Nor has any ground been shown why the latter of these metaphorical applications is not as proper and as possible as the former; or why, in the words of Glassius, as well the persona efficiens as the modus efficiendi may not be put for the res effecta. Yet it is on this assumption that the links of their argument depend; which may be reduced in effect to a syllogism like the following. "The name of a personal agent can never be employed to express the effects produced by his agency. But the name of the Holy Spirit is frequently employed to express effects which the same Holy Ghost produces. Therefore the Holy Ghost is not the name of a personal agent." If the major of the above propositions be not conceded, it is apparent, that all their examples to prove the minor will not accelerate their progress a single step towards the conclusion. But if it be conceded, I will not so far insult the solemnity of this hallowed place, or the understanding of my present audience, as to do more than instance the least preposterous of the conclusions, which, by a process equally legitimate with that of our antagonists, might be deduced from this single concession.

If we use on the authority of the Apostles such expressions as those of receiving and quenching the Spirit of God, do we not also use on the same authority (for repeated instances may be found in the New Testament no less than in the common practice of mankind) the same or parallel expressions, where the reality of the Person has never been the subject of debate? How often do we speak of the Book of Moses as if that volume were Moses himself! We talk of reading Moses; of dividing Moses into chapters; of comparing one part of Moses with another. Yet to assert or believe that the Moses of Scripture is a personification only of the singular care by which God conducted his people, an allegorical representation of their passage through the sea, (the etymology of his name would signally favour such an hypothesis,) or that he is no more than an abstract term for those Divine truths which are embodied in the Pentateuch, —to assert and believe all this would be as wild insanity as theirs, who reduce the entire Old Testament to an hieroglyphic ephemeris: it would be little less preposterous than the assertion of those learned men who would reduce the Spirit or God to an empty name!—Have we forgotten, or do we know so little of Scripture, that the fact has escaped our knowledge; have we so learned Christ, that we know not how often the name of Christ is employed to express the religion which he founded? "A man in "Christ;"—"a marriage in the Lord;"—a saint "to whom to live was Christ;" —are these less forcible expressions than those which have been pleaded as impugning the Spirit's Personality? Or what more certain grounds are afforded in Scripture to believe that God himself is an intelligent and real agent, than the distribution, and volition, and government, and testimony, and speech, and grief, and desire, which in the New Testament are attributed to the Holy Ghost? Let these be resolved into metaphor or allegory, and the name of Jehovah may be shown on the same indentical principle to be no more than nature personified; the Bible itself transformed into a manual of Atheism; and the desolate and silent abomination of Spinoza erected on the altar of the Most High.

But we are told again, and the objection has been urged so triumphantly, that our antagonists, to all appearance, are serious in producing it, that "if the Spirit of God be accounted a Person, we must extend, by a parity of reasoning, the same character of personality to the Schekinah, the power, the wisdom, the influence or finger of God, with many or all of which the Spirit of God is used as synonymous." Thus "the presence of God," in the first member of the eleventh verse of the fifty-first Psalm, is the same thing, if we believe Eben Ezra and Kimchi among the Jews, and Lardner among Christian critics, with his "Holy Spirit" in the corresponding member. And our Lord's expression, as reported by St. Matthew, of "casting out devils by the Spirit of God," is given by St. Luke as if he had not said the Spirit of God, but his "Finger."

It would be, perhaps, no difficult matter to prove that many, perhaps the greater part, of those texts which Lardner has cited to this point of the controversy, have been, in truth, misunderstood or misapplied. The task, however, is needless, since, though we should admit to the fullest extent the premises urged by Lardner, the objection which he deduces from them is, in truth, no objection at all.

With those who believe that the Holy Ghost is a Person, by whom and through whom the unseen and unapproachable Father has manifested alike his power, his presence, his gracious influence to men, no difficulty can arise from the acknowledgment that such a Person may be as properly styled the Finger or Glory as the Breath of God. Nor, as we contend, can any one of these titles (for titles they doubtless are,) nor all of them together, detract from the existence or individuality of Him whose nature and office and intercourse with mankind they dimly serve to shadow. With personality none of them are inconsistent, since the metaphorical illustration which they convey is as natural and as intelligible when applied to a person as to an attribute or modus operandi; and since in ancient alike and modern times the former of these applications is, at least, as common as the latter. Did the author of that ancient Epistle which bears the name of Barnabas, design to resolve the Son of God into a mere attribute of the Deity, when he styled him the Sceptre of the Most High? Was Simon Magus annihilated in the opinion of the Samaritans, when they called him, in superstitious veneration, the Great Power of God? The eyes and ears of the ancient kings of Persia are known to have been officers, by whose agency the monarch communicated with his provinces and armies; and, in modern days, we apply the term of police, or civil power, not only to the abstract idea of magistracy, but to the magistrates themselves, and executive ministers of justice.

With still less reason can it be denied, that, as many offices may be filled by the same individual, so may the names and titles of that individual be multiplied in proportion to the number of the relations which he bears to others. The Unity of the Father is not endangered, though he be called alternately and indifferently the Supreme, the Eternal, the Ancient of Days, Adonai, Schaddai, and Jehovah. The Lamb of God, the Lion of the Tribe of Judah, the Son of Man, the Bread which came down from Heaven, are all alike applied to the Person of the Lord Jesus Christ: and, in like manner, how great soever the diversity of operations and of gifts, we may recognize in each of them the same identical Spirit, the same God, which worketh all in all.

But further, if the Unitarians will concede, with Lardner, the identity of the Holy Ghost with the Presence or Glory or Schekinah of God, (these last terms are undoubtedly synonymous,) which on certain occasions appeared in a bodily form to the Israelites, and which was supposed by them, as its name implies, to be the constant and tutelary "inhabitant" of the sanctuary, they will find themselves not far, indeed, as will be hereafter shown, from the opinions of the orthodox or the Jews: but they will be involved, I apprehend, in a very considerable difficulty, to disprove the Personality of a Being which was seen, which spake, and reasoned, and commanded; or to prove the identity of a Visible Glory with the unseen and inaccessible Father of all.

In this latter question, indeed, on the distinctness or identity of the Father and the Holy Ghost, the controversy between ourselves and the modern Socinians must finally resolve itself; since, if the Spirit of God be, as they pretend, an attribute or operation only, he must be, as his name implies, an attribute or operation of the Almighty Father.

But attributes, operations, and every other species of accident, as they are, in truth, no more than modes in which one substance produces an effect on another; so whatever is, in poetry or oratory, predicated of them, is only predicated of the agent or patient in whom the accident itself is inherent.

When I say that the courage of Julius has won the victory, or that the pride of Marcus is easily offended, I do not mean that either courage or pride have any positive existence of their own, or in themselves are capable of impulse or feeling; but I desire to express the manner in which the persons who are courageous or proud have acted on others, or themselves been acted on.

Accordingly, the Spirit of God who strove with man in the Old Dispensation, and which descended on Christ in the New; against whose authority the Israelites rebelled in the wilderness, and whom the sins of Christians daily resist and grieve; whose amber glory was seen by Ezekiel in vision, and whose fiery unction rested on the Apostles in the day of Pentecost; this Spirit must be either identified with God the Father, or must be an intelligent Person distinct from him. For all which is said of a power, a manifestation, an influence, as if these names had any essence or being of their own,—all this, I must again insist, is nothing else than the circuitous manner of stating the former hypothesis. The Spirit, who was to console the followers of Christ after their Master's decease, must mean, by this interpretation, the Eternal Father manifesting himself, after a certain manner, to his creatures; and the Spirit who is grieved, resisted, blasphemed, is the same Father as he is acted on by those who, under particular circumstances, resist, blaspheme, or grieve him.

It is this question, then, of the distinctness or identity of the Father and the Holy Ghost, to which the dispute as to the third section of our Creed resolves itself between the modern Church and the best informed Socinians; as it was, in ancient times, the ground of difference between the primitive Church and the followers of Sabellius. And as, with respect to the Spirit's Personality, the Arians and Mohammedans themselves accord with the orthodox against the disciples of Crellius and Priestley, it may seem, perhaps, his Personality once demonstrated, no very difficult matter to induce the Unitarians to take part with us on the point of his Divinity against the followers of Arius and Mohammed.

And there are, in truth, so many strong and obvious texts in Scripture which ascribe the acts of the Holy Ghost to the immediate agency of God; he is so often mentioned in terms and under characters which are decidedly inapplicable to a created intelligence, of however exalted station, that the Arian hypothesis, which thus degrades his nature, is, of all the ancient shapes of error, that which, at the present hour, has fewest believers or advocates. For though, to an Angel or any other exalted Intelligence, the name either of Holy or of Spirit be, doubtless, applicable; yet is the Holy Spirit, the Spirit who is essentially and supereminently holy, a person unquestionably Divine. A Holy One may be one of many; the Holy One must be One who is above all; and the Holy Spirit of God cannot, surely, in himself be less than God.

The immensity, in like manner, of the Holy Ghost, who is present every where; his omniscience, who searcheth all things; his dignity, against whom all blasphemy is irremissible; all these, with the many other striking circumstances which Zanchius has collected, may well excuse me from entering more at large into this separate and less contested branch of the present inquiry. What time remains to us for considering the nature of the Holy Ghost, may be with more advantage devoted to an examination of what may be called, perhaps, the second position of our antagonists; that hypothesis which regards the Holy Spirit of God as one of the names whereby the Father Almighty has revealed himself to mankind.

But this hypothesis, though it be professedly an amended statement of the one which I have been so long examining, is liable, in truth, to the same and even greater objections than the former, inasmuch as it is still more at variance with the letter of our Saviour's promise, and still less susceptible of the aid of metaphor or allegory.

If Christ had intended only to assure the Apostles that, in his absence, they should become the peculiar care of God the Father, it must seem a very strange and forced expression to convey this assurance in the promise of sending them another Comforter. And that Christ had the power of sending God the Father; or that a person can be regarded as sent who does not really come; or that God the Father was actually visible in the tongues or flames of fire are assertions which, as our antagonists certainly will not understand them in the literal sense, so they are such as no metaphorical interpretation can, apparently, render intelligible.

In prescription, indeed, and in the opinions of several ancient sects, the Socinians may, doubtless, find authorities for the identity of the Father and the Spirit far earlier than any to which they could pretend in support of their former position. The error of Praxeas, however, which, with all its confessed absurdity, was at least a consistent and uniform system, identified, as I have shown, not the Father only and the Spirit of God, but the Father and his only begotten Son. It may be thought, indeed, with reason, that the Persons in whose names, without any expressed distinction, we receive the sign of baptism, must, inevitably, be either one or three: that if the Holy Ghost be merged in the Father, the Son cannot, with any colour of likelihood, be distinguished from him; and that the battered remains of such hostile tenets as those of Noetus and Socinus cannot possibly be expected, like the mutilated warriors in Strada, to coalesce into a single combatant.

Nor is the text of Scripture, on which their hypothesis mainly depends, to be really reckoned in their favour. That text is the eleventh verse of the second chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, where a comparison is instituted between the spirit of man and the Spirit of the Most High; and the knowledge possessed by the second, as to certain features of the Almighty's will, inferred from the corresponding knowledge which the former is know to possess as to the intentions and affections of the man himself.

"Who of men," are the words of the Apostle, "knoweth the things of a man, save only the spirit of a man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, save the spirit of God."

Hence it has been urged, that as the spirit of man which is in him is no distinct person from the man himself; so the comparison would not be perfect, if the Spirit of God were distinct from God the Father.

But it is evident that this passage of Scripture will no less accurately tally with the supposition of those Christians who believe in a perfect union, though of an ineffable kind, between all the Persons of the Trinity, and who, though they distinguish the Father from the Spirit, regard both Father and Holy Ghost as partakers in the common Godhead. For it is not the things of the Father, as such, and in his parental capacity, which the Spirit is supposed to know, but the things of that infinite Godhead in which the Father, the Spirit, and the Word, are eternally and indissolubly one. So that by the Homoousian, no less than the Sabellian hypothesis, the difficulty, if it were one, is completely done away; and the objection which might, indeed, apply against the Arian creed, must be quenched, like the other fiery darts of our oldest enemy, on the impenetrable shield of orthodoxy.

But, secondly, it is worth our observation, that, in this objection, our antagonists have, evidently, misconceived or forgotten the peculiar opinions which those whom St. Paul addressed, and, not impossibly, St. Paul himself entertained as to the compound nature of man.

Those opinions were taken from, or, at least, accorded with, the doctrines of that ancient philosophy, which distinguished the rational soul not from the body only, but from those animal affections to which the body is heir; and, which, under the names of the heart or will, they described as a secondary and mortal soul, which it was the business of its intellectual companion to examine, to understand, and, understanding, to govern and subdue.

This is the "natural man" whom St. Paul so often exhorts our spiritual nature to bind, to macerate, to crucify; this the organic intellect which beasts, no less than man, enjoy: the "anima" of the Latins as distinguished from their "animus," whose hylozoic faculties were bounded within the limits of self-preservation; whose use and existence was to terminate with the body which it loved, but from whose essence the intellectual soul was no less effectually distinct than the traveller from the animal which draws his carriage. I do not mean (God forbid that I should advance so wild a proposition!) that this comparison, carried to its length, would apply, or was intended by St. Paul to apply, to the Divine Existence: but as, in man, the spirit and the will were regarded as distinct persons, and as, nevertheless, the spirit of man is instanced as understanding every other constituent part of the being to which it belongs; so the Spirit of God, which guided and governed his Church in the way of truth, and which bare witness by signs and wonders to the truth of the apostolic doctrine, was a competent witness to the will and affection not of himself alone, but of the whole eternal Trinity.

For the question to be solved was not, whether God knew his own mind, of which no doubt could possibly be entertained; but whether the Spirit which governed the Church in the name of Christ was a sufficient pledge of the Divine affections and designs. And this doubt (a doubt, it may be observed, which never could have arisen if the Spirit had been conceived to be identical with the Father) St. Paul resolves in a manner which, far from contradicting, completely establishes the doctrine of orthodox Christians, by assigning to the Spirit a similar misterious relation with the Deity to that which the soul of man was thought to hold in our compound human nature, which was in certain respects the man himself, and in certain respects distinguished from him; at once another and the same.

But while the arguments on which Sabellianism depends may seem so little adequate to establish the confusion of Persons in the Deity, for which its advocates contend; the contradictions which result from their hypothesis are so many, and of such a nature, that, in truth, I almost fear to urge them on your notice, lest they should betray me into a levity unbecoming the place in which I stand, and the importance of any, even the weakest opinion, in which the nature of God is implicated.

It is, in the first place, revealed, to us, in the words which I have taken as a text for these discourses, that the Holy Ghost was to be sent by Christ. He was to be sent, as another Comforter, to supply, in the absence of Jesus, that παράκλησις, comfort, or instruction, which our Lord had himself, while on earth, afforded to his chosen followers. He was to come in Christ's name, or as his Deputy. He was not to speak of himself, but to receive from Christ the illumination of which he was the dispenser. "He shall take of mine," are the words of our Saviour, "he shall take of mine. and show it unto you."

Is it possible that a description such as this can apply to him whom all sects and parties agree to consider as the fountain of Diety, the God and Father of all? Or will not the warmest defender of our Lord's Divinity confess, that the opinion here expressed is inconsistent with that relation, which in every page of Scripture is implied, between the heavenly Father and his loving and obedient Son?

But our Unitarian antagonists! how can they be justified? They who account the Saviour of the world a man of men, a creature like themselves, a mortal and earthly frame, without a soul, and instinct with mechanism only! How can they hazard the assertion that such a being could send the Almighty to supply his place among men? How can they dream that the only wise God, in his intercourse with mankind, did not speak of himself, but became, in his turn, the Prophet of the wisdom and doctrine of the Man Jesus of Nazareth? Let us return to transubstantiation! Let us embrace as Gospel the less disgusting marvels of the Talmud, the Shaster, the Edda, or the Koran! But let not learned men expect us to embrace a system which must eclipse the Koran's eminence in folly, and put the wildest fancies of the Talmud to shame!

The Rabbins have taught, indeed, that, on a certain occasion, Elias was sent from God to ask from Rabbi Simeon the meaning of a passage in the Canticles: but this was not in ignorance, but in reproof of the heavenly spirits. And surely the boldest Rabbin of them all would start and tremble at the conclusion which follows from Socinianism, that the Almighty Father, in his intercourse with mankind, has received inspiration from an earthly prophet.

It will be urged, perhaps, in reply, that our Saviour himself explains, and, in some sort, apologizes for the phrase on which this objection is grounded, by reminding his hearers, in the following sentence, that those things only were his which he had himself received of the Father. "All things which the Father hath are mine; therefore I said unto you, that he (the Comforter) will take of mine, and show it unto you."

But though this be perfectly consistent with the mysterious but acknowledged economy, whereby the Son himself, though eternal and almighty, is, in the work of our redemption, subject as a Son to his Father; yet will it by no means solve the contradiction of the Father's receiving any thing from the Son, inasmuch as he could not be said to receive that which was his own, and which had emanated from him eternally.

But, further, we find, in the same passage of Scripture, that the Spirit of truth was "not to speak of his own;" "as he was to hear, so was he to speak."

Will it, then, be maintained that the Almighty Father had made over all knowledge to his Son, (to the Man Jesus, be it remembered, if we believe our antagonists, the man and no more than man,) so completely as to be obliged to borrow of him for his subsequent occasions? Or is there any blindness which can prevent our recognizing in these expressions, that article of the Catholic faith which speaks of God the Holy Ghost as proceeding alike from the Father and the Son, and as the sustaining and pervading Agent, by whom both Father and Son communicate with their chosen servants?

But the difficulties of the Sabellian interpretation will yet increase on us, if we recollect that the same Holy Ghost who is here announced by our Lord as the future Advocate and Patron of his Church against the malice and unbelief of the world, is, in other places of Scripture and in the discharge of other functions, represented not only as our Defender against men, but our Advocate also with the Father,—as making intercession for us before God with groanings not to be uttered. "A mediator is not the mediator of one;" he is a middle term which supposes two contending parties; he must plead the cause of those for whom he is interested at the tribunal of some other person. But with whom and before whom is the Father Almighty to plead the cause of his creatures? To whom is he to reconcile them but to himself; or whose pardon is he to procure for their faults but his own? Surely the learned and ingenious men, who have involved themselves in consequences like these, can boast with little reason of explaining or simplifying Christianity!

But these, alas, are not the only nor the greatest mysteries of Socinian godliness, since we find, in another part of our Lord's prediction, that the Father was to give this Paraclete to abide with Christians for ever; Christ was to send him from the Father: he was to come forth, (this same Comforter or Advocate,) or issue from the Father; and the Father was to send him in Christ's name. And yet the Holy Ghost whom the Father sends is the same, they tell us, with the Father who sends him!

The Orthodox, undoubtedly, cannot hope to explain or understand that incomprehensible union which subsists between the Persons of the Trinity. We cannot demonstrate in what manner that is possible which is above the limits of reason; but the time would be, surely, yet more completely thrown away, which should be bestowed in proving that what is contrary to reason never can be credible.

To those, if such there be, who can digest even Sabellian contradictions, it may be doubted, indeed, what argument remains to be offered. Shall we lead them to the banks of Jordan during the baptism of John, and point out to their attention the whole Triune Godhead made manifest in the several and consentaneous characters of the Dove, the Voice, the Beloved Son? Is it to their own baptism that we shall send them back, when the waters of regeneration were sprinkled on their brows in the name and by the joint authority of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost? Or shall we carry them, on the wings of the Evangelical Eagle, to that tremendous throne and glassy ocean intermingled with fire, where burns continually the Sevenfold Spirit of God, where lives the Lamb who was slain for us, and where sits enthroned the Ancient of Days, the Father Everlasting and Almighty?

Our knowledge, indeed, is small, our ideas are limited; we behold, as yet, the things of God through the dusky medium of mortality, and, oh, how feebly do we reason! Yet, surely, if the Spirit of truth have not deceived us in the literal account which he has himself afforded of his person and character; if there be any certainty in logical inference, any precision in the most solemn words of Scripture, the Spirit whom the Father sends forth must needs be distinct from the Father; if Christ, the first Comforter of fallen man, be a Person, that other Comforter whom he promises must be a Person also; if, in the baptismal office, the Son be distinct, the Holy Ghost cannot be identified with the Father, to whose name his name is joined. As, then, their inconsistency has been shown, who would reduce the Spirit of God to a quality or abstract name; let those explain, who apply to the Father whatever of action or passion is predicated of the Holy Ghost, let them explain by what subtility of distinction they can evade one half of the Sabellian system, while they contend so strongly for the other; and deny the Divinity of the Son while they assail the Personality of the Comforter. Or let not them, at least, revile the Orthodox as teachers of contradiction and absurdity, who can themselves believe and maintain that the Father sent himself,—poured forth himself,—maketh intercession with himself,—that the allwise God could require or receive inspiration from a mortal Prophet,—and that it is reasonable to believe a contradiction in terms, rather than assent to that which is beyond the limits of our experience.

Oh miserable perversion of human intellect, portentous blindness of pride, which can forsake the pure well of Salvation, to hew out for itself those broken cisterns, of which the rents and the chasms are ridiculous and offensive in the eyes of that reason which they loudly call on us to adore! For ourselves it is no new trial, that the God whom we worship should be accounted foolishness; but it may well afford some comfort to those who are accused of following after superstitious vanities, to witness how soon these preachers of a rational religion, professing to be wise, are become blind.

Let me not however be mistaken. The comfort which a Christian may feel in exposing the inconsistencies of his erring brethren, is not derived from pride, and is far, very far removed from the exultation of malice or of scorn. Sensible as we are of our own transgressions against reason and Scripture; sensible as we must be of our natural ignorance and weakness; creatures of education and habit; we cannot notice the mistakes of other men without recollecting, at the same time, by what school, what example, what providential chain of circumstances, our own eyes have been opened to the things which belong to our peace; to those hopes and grounds of hope which we feel and know are as necessary to our comfort here, as the truths on which they depend are to our eternal salvation hereafter. Call it ignorance, call it hardness of heart, call it reprobate blindness, which prevents our brother from agreeing with us in the essentials of religion,—we feel that what he is we also might have been; and that there have, perhaps, been moments in which many inconsistencies, which are now apparent to us, were in like manner hidden from our eyes. If we rejoice, then, in detecting the misapprehensions of our religious antagonists, if we are anxious to unravel his sophisms, if we are fervent in repelling his calumnies, it is not, I repeat it, in anger or in pride, but because we thereby confirm in ourselves that faith which is necessary to our happiness, and prevent, perhaps, in those whose opinions are yet undecided, the extension of the mischief which we deplore.

If any such there are, (and such their doubtless must be among the younger part of this assembly) whose opinions are not yet confirmed by time or inquiry in those doctrines which our church with reason inculcates as essential to our holiness here and our happiness hereafter; if such there be, let me exhort them not to shun those studies on which their faith must hereafter repose, nor (if such studies are begun with proper feeling, and continued with proper perseverance) to entertain any doubt as to their issue.

But let them recollect, during such their inquiry, that what is above reason is not, therefore, unreasonable; that, where difficulties are found on either side, the word of God is the only sufficient arbiter; and that the best means of understanding any single passage of Scripture, is to acquire an accurate and long acquaintance with the whole of the sacred Volume.

Yet, though Scripture be the test by which every doctrine is tried, it is by the sense and not the terms of Scripture that the conformity of an opinion to God's will may be most fairly estimated. It is no objection to a solemn truth that it should be conveyed in barbarous language; and, if our adversaries have compelled us to define, with scholastic precision, our faith in the Triune Deity, the fault, if fault there be, must rest with them by whom we are daily and falsely accused of idolatry.

But, brethren, I speak as to the wise; a name, ye know, is nothing; nor have ye so learned Christ (God forbid you ye should have so learned him!) as to believe his religion to be a system of sounds and syllables; or to fancy that a Scriptural doctrine cannot be contained in unusual or unscriptural language. Bear with us, then, in this our infirmity! Attend not so much to the terms which we use, as to the meaning which those terms convey; and, as ye honour the gift of reason, and as ye love the privilege of revelation, reject not an inference legitimately drawn from premises admitted by all; despise not the wonders of the gospel, because their heavenly nature transcends the grossness of our present faculties!

Nor fancy that we are leading you from practical truths along the dreary track of useless, perhaps of impious, speculation: or that the time is wasted which is employed in discussing rather than improving the spiritual graces vouchsafed to us by the Almighty.

In our religion is no truth so exclusively speculative, but it is connected with, and terminates in, practice. We study God's nature, in order that the more we know of him, he may offer a shape more tangible and more accessible to our faith, our affection, and our prayer. The more firmly the Personal Existence of his Spirit is imprinted on our minds, the more conviction do we feel of our own spiritual and immortal nature; the warmer gratitude to that eternal and almighty Redeemer, by whose merits and whose power this heavenly guest is brought down to dwell in the hearts of men.

In that Redeemer, indeed, as in the former Adam of Cabbalistic Mythology, all the rays of the celestial Sephiroth meet and terminate; all the splendours of revelation are embodied in him; and every minor difference of creed or discipline is extinguished in this central light, with those who offer up at the basis of his cross, their hopes, their doubts, their merits, their infirmities!

From that most holy and most happy company; from that innumerable multitude who, with more or less of knowledge, and amid less or greater errors, have sought redemption through the sufferings of Christ, and shall find it in his final triumph, the Socinian is self-excluded! Like the wind of the desert, where his doctrines pass, the fruits and flowers of Eden vanish or decay; and in that self-confidence which counts the blood of the eternal covenant a worthless thing, and doth despite to the Spirit of Grace; in that strength of prejudice which would rend from Scripture whatever page or passage contravenes his previous opinion; in that gloomy materialism which turns identity into illusion, and degrades our nature to the level of a speaking automaton, he stands alike anathematized by the primitive Faith and the soundest Philosophy; rejected alike from the Academy and the Temple.

That these renowned and venerable seats of learning and piety may, as they have embraced, continue long to hold fast the better part both in philosophy and religion, may he accord to our prayers from whom all wisdom and godliness flow; the Author of every good and perfect gift to man; the Ruler and Patron of that church which the Son hath purchased by his blood; who, with the same most blessed Son, and the Almighty and Eternal Father, liveth and reigneth ever one God, world without end.

LECTURE IV.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

Having shown that the Comforter whom Christ was to send is an Intelligence or Person distinct from God the Father, and having incidentally also shown the Deity of that Person; I may leave to our antagonists the task of discovering by what rational hypothesis, excepting that contained in the usual confession of the church, their ingenuity can reconcile Scripture to itself, or make the strong assertions which are found there as to the divinity of more persons than one, consist with those equally forcible passages which inculcate the unity of God.

For when we find on the one side, the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost, all three alike invested with the loftiest titles and attributes of Eternal, Almighty, Allwise, it would be reasonable, no doubt, in the first instance, to suppose that these three divine Persons were distinct and independent divinities.

But when, on the other hand, Jehovah our God is expressly asserted to be one Jehovah; when the Son instructs us that he and the Father are one; and when the presence of the Holy Ghost with the church is identified with the presence not only of the Father but of the Son; no conclusion can remain for us, but that we must either reject entirely all belief in Scripture, or that we must understand the words of Scripture in a different manner from that in which we should understand the same expressions in any other treatise, or, lastly, that we must acknowledge the Persons thus identified and distinguished to be, in certain respects, at once united and separate, in certain relations with each other, at once subordinate and equal.

Nor will this appear, on sufficient testimony, incredible, to any one who recollect how often in the works of nature an apparent contradiction is solved and rendered consistent by a more perfect discovery of relations and circumstances; how many peculiarities there are in those things which are most obvious to our senses, which we believe to exist in contradiction, utter contradiction, to the testimony which those senses offer.

That the sun is stationary, and that the earth is in constant and rapid motion, a motion more rapid than the swiftest bird, the dolphin, or the cannon-ball, some of us believe, because it has been demonstrated to us: but many more there are who acknowledge it against the evidence of their eyes and feelings, on no stronger ground than that they have heard the fact from others, of whose information and integrity they entertain a better opinion than of the extent of their own knowledge and the accuracy of their own observation. Let but so much of credence be given to the Omniscient, as we usually in facts beyond the limits of our own research accord to our fallible fellow creatures, and we shall hear no more of the impossibility of any doctrine which is explicitly revealed in, or correctly deducible from, those writings which we confess to be the oracles of God.

Of those, indeed, who assign as a sufficient ground for unbelief in a Divine Revelation, that its circumstances surpass our mental comprehension, it may be asked, in return, whether they themselves believe in the existence of a Divine and Infinite Being, who fills all space, who is Allwise, Allpowerful; whose justice and mercy are alike without end? Such a Being they will, doubtless, answer that they acknowledge; yet how many circumstances apparently impossible in themselves or inconsistent with each other, are involved in this short and usual definition!

If the presence of God be infinite, then must we acknowledge, with Spinoza all things to be God; or more than one individual must, at the same moment, be in the same portion of space. If his power and wisdom be infinite, where is the freedom of the human will? and if the will be not free, how can the Almighty judge the world? When these questions are answered, and the innumerable other mysteries are explained which beset the first entrance not of revealed only, but of natural religion; it may then be time to inquire, whether it be impossible that an Omnipresent Being should be manifested in more than one hypostasis; or that three distinct hypostases should be capable of a connexion so intimate as to be only one Divinity.

But to apply to spiritual existences, of which we know nothing, illustrations or objections taken from those bodily substances with which only we are acquainted, is to apply our knowledge to an end which it was never intended to answer; it is to measure space with the thermometer, or heat with the compass and square. To what extent, indeed, those glorious but finite beings who behold the face of God, are enabled by that blessed intercourse to understand the mode of their Maker's existence, we know not, nor does it greatly import us to inquire. But one thing we know, that we are, ourselves, as yet, in a state of pupilage; in which whatever we believe as to our future destinies, or the Being on whom we depend, is founded on testimony only. The state of the Sceptic is not dissimilar from that of a human being born and educated in a dungeon, who should deny the existence of light because his organs had never perceived it, and because the properties ascribed to it appeared, as to such an one they might naturally appear, inconsistent and contradictory. And if the distinction of colours should seem impossible to one with whom every thing alike was gloomy, if the fair variety of this upper world should militate against all the prejudices of him who had grown old and obstinate within the narrow compass of his four stone walls, what ground of conviction could his instructor offer but the pledge of his own integrity?

"You cannot," might be his words, "I know you cannot as yet understand me; but if these prison walls were away, you would be at once convinced of my truth. On that truth, however, and on the opinion which you entertain of my knowledge and veracity, must the certainty of all these wonders at present repose; and the faith which you retain that I would not deceive you must be your evidence of things unseen."

Nor is the utility of a revelation disproved, should its circumstances and detail exceed our present capacity, and should our faith be tried by information which we as yet imperfectly comprehend. Such information, like the elements of a science, has reference, we may conclude, to a future state of progressive knowledge and inquiry. By the glimpses of truth which it affords, we are induced to expect far brighter discoveries hereafter, and to contemplate with less of terror than of anxious hope, that period at which all our doubts shall be removed, and when those things which we now see through a glass darkly, we shall be permitted to look on face to face. Dissolve this tabernacle, rend but this fleshy dungeon in twain, and all shall at once be clear which now perplexes us; all shall be light which now appears obscure, and all which we doubt of now shall be known even as God knoweth us. This is the gate of knowledge; from this point our discoveries begin; and, the darkness of the grave once traversed, we shall enter into a refulgence of day which no cloud shall obscure, no evening terminate!

Meantime, however, though it be worse, perhaps, than merely idle to weary our souls by a fruitless curiosity after undiscoverable secrets, or to attempt to reconcile with our bodily apprehensions those truths which are not the objects of sense; yet is it a delightful and a holy exercise to ascertain, as far as possible, the limits to which the words of Revelation extend, to meditate often on the abstruser oracles of God, and to collect with humble and patient scrutiny those scattered facts which he has incidentally communicated respecting his own mysterious nature.

Nor is it any imputation on the truth or importance of a doctrine, that we discover it, like the Trinity in Unity, not so much from the direct assertions as from the implied meaning of Scripture; that it is a consequence deducible from revelation, rather than, itself, in express terms revealed.

For this is not the only instance in which the oracles of God convey most important information through circumstances seemingly indifferent, by an arrangement which contents itself to disclose the grounds on which our faith is to be founded, and which permits us from these grounds to infer the belief for ourselves.

When the Almighty announced himself to Moses in Horeb as the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and Jacob, it is evident that in these expressions no definite assurance was contained of a life beyond the grave. Yet, inasmuch as this opinion might be reasonably though incidentally collected from the premises afforded, our Lord, we know, referred to this single passage as sufficient to confute the Sadducees, and reproved them sharply for a culpable error in not having themselves made the right application.

Nor is there any thing in this manner of instruction at variance with those methods which we might previously have expected the Almighty to adopt in the illumination of his creatures, or different from the usual tenour of that more immediate intercourse which he has at times carried on with mankind.

The soul of man is not only delighted with knowledge, but if she be in a healthy and natural condition, she is delighted also with the act of learning. But that this act should be either agreeable or efficacious, it is necessary that we should do it for ourselves. What is merely didactic is always wearisome; and the most effectual advances are made and our progress is then most pleasurable, when, with no more assistance from others than is absolutely necessary, we master every difficulty by our own resources, and associate in our recollection the beauty of truth with the triumph of successful inquiry.

Accordingly, to confer on his creatures rather the means of knowledge than knowledge itself; to encourage them to elicit the truth by their natural faculties from data supernaturally communicated, is that conduct which we should, a priori, and in a gracious conformity to the frame of our nature, most reasonably expect from an allwise and beneficient instructor.

Such indeed, we find is the course which, in his arrangement of the physical world, the maker of that world has followed. He does not feed us, but he furnishes us with the means of procuring food; and how dull and inanimate would that existence become, which was never diversified by the ardour of pursuit, never stimulated by the craving of anxiety, nor rewarded with that luxury of repose which is the offspring of successful labour? What wonder then, if there are certain truths which he has reserved as the reward of an attentive consideration of those which he has expressed more clearly; what wonderful manifestations of his nature and government [illegible]

Accordingly, in the types, the prophecies, the parables of Scripture, the frequency of such a process is obvious even to a careless reader of the Bible. The religion of the Jew from his cradle to his tomb, conveyed in all its ceremonies a perpetual allusion to the future sacrifice for sin in the person of the Messiah, and the prophecies of the old and the parables of the later covenant, are each of them an exercise of that natural faculty, by which we reason to things from their resemblances.

We find, nevertheless, that the meaning of such expressions was not to be neglected with impunity; nor, when all who desired to understand them might easily find the key, could those plead ignorance as an excuse, whose indifference or prejudice was the real cause which had kept them thus excluded.

It was, therefore, at their own tremendous peril that the Pharisees refused to understand the ancient prophecies in their natural application to our Saviour; and the Sadducees were reproved by him as guilty of a grievous error, in neglecting to attend to the deduction which followed from the words of God in Horeb.

Not only, then, is it possible that a doctrine may be true which is incidentally only, and not in explicit terms revealed; it is, moreover, possible that such a doctrine may be of the highest and most vital importance to our conduct here and our eternal hopes hereafter; it may be such an one as, in itself or in its consequences, may affect our everlasting salvation. Nor, though it be presumptuous to decide as to the lowest degree of knowledge or of faith to which the mercy of our father may extend, can it be doubted that those doctrines in which the objects of our adoration are concerned, are questions of the highest practical moment.

It cannot be safe to neglect whatever God reveals to us respecting his own mysterious essence; nor can it be regarded as grateful to refuse whatever of prayer or praise is authorized and commanded in Scripture to be rendered to the Son by whom we are redeemed, and the Spirit by whom we are sanctified.

And, so far is the indirect species of proof from incurring, as our antagonists pretend that it incurs, the charge of weakness or insufficiency, that, in written documents, (and documents above all which have descended to us from distant ages, and have been exposed, as all such must be more or less exposed, to the injuries of time or the misuse of men,) a legitimate inference from unsuspected premises will often more avail in the establishment of an ancient opinion, than even the strongest positive testimony.

There is always a greater chance when such positive assertions are produced, that the text may have suffered by indiscreet or fraudulent zeal; and the more expressly and closely any passage corresponds with the faith or wishes of a particular sect, so much the greater reason will there be to apprehend, that those who anxiously desire to convince others, have not been always content to bring forward those proofs by which they have been convinced themselves.

But, when a proposition is presented incidentally to our notice; when it is elicited from recorded facts, or from assertions so circumstanced as to be a necessary part of the treatise or history in which they occur; when it follows as a necessary corollary from arguments of which the immediate reference is to another subject; there is no longer room to apprehend the collusion of partizans or the wilful inaccuracy of transcribers, and the proof has the same advantage over the strongest positive assertions, as that which is ascribed by lawyers to circumstantial, over direct but unsupported evidence.

It may seem, then, that the Scriptural proof of the Holy Ghost's personality, and of the existence of that Triune Godhead to which he belongs, is of the kind least obvious to rational suspicion, as being least open to fraud or negligence; and that the faith which the church confesses in her public formularies is, in truth, no other than that eternal rock on which, though it be a stone of offence to worldly wisdom, he that hopeth shall not be ashamed.

Having determined, then, the Personality, and ascertained, though briefly and incidentally, the divine nature of that Comforter whose advent our Saviour foretold; it remains that we examine, secondly, who were the objects of that promised appearance; and, thirdly, what were those effects which were to be anticipated from so awful a visitation. In other words, we have yet to ascertain, whether the Holy Ghost were promised as a peculiar Comforter to the Apostles only, or to the universal church of Christ; and in what respects and by what perceptible benefits, he was to evince, if I may use the expression, his title to the name of Paraclete.

And, of these inquiries, the first, apparently, need not detain us long; since the same Divine Teacher by whom the promise of a Paraclete was given, has promised also that he should remain for ever with those who were to be the objects of his care. But that this expression, "for ever," is not personally applicable to the immediate hearers of Christ, and that the promise cannot therefore be confined to them, is apparent from the very fact of their mortality. For the words of our Saviour do not, it may be observed, imply that the continuance of the Comforter with them was to be to the end of their lives. If this had been the case, we might reasonably have doubted whether succeeding generations were included in the promised benefit. But it was not "till death," nor "always," nor "continually," that the Paraclete was to abide with those to whom he was promised. It was "for [illegible] and it answered in purport to the remarkable expression whereby, after his resurrection from the dead, and immediately before his return to heaven, our Lord assured them of the perpetual continuance of his own protecting care. But an eternal guardianship and comfort can only be exercised on an eternal subject. It is therefore as a collective body, and as an endless succession of individuals, that the church of Christ received the promise here recorded: and it will follow that it was communicated to the Apostles, not as its exclusive inheritors, but as the representatives of all who in after ages, by their means, should believe on the Son of God.

Nor can it be reasonably urged in answer to this position, that the Apostles, though exposed to death, and destined, each of them, in a few years to die, were, each of them, nevertheless, in a certain sense, immortal, and that admitted, as they doubtless are, to a yet closer intercourse with the Spirit of Truth, it is improbable that such spiritual advantages as they in this life enjoyed, have in the succeeding life been taken from them. For it is not, we should observe, a spiritual communion simply speaking, it is not the presence and favour of the Holy Ghost abstractedly considered, which is the subject of our Saviour's prophecy; it is in his capacity of Paraclete that the Spirit was then about to descend; he was promised as an Intercessor for their infirmities at the throne of grace, as a Comforter under that distress which the departure of their Lord occasioned, as an advocate and orator in the cause of Christianity against the violence and prejudice of men.

But in paradise they need no Intercessor, for by their entrance there the object of intercession is obtained. In paradise they require no Comforter, for Christ is there, and has wiped away every tear from every eye: in paradise what room can be found for an advocate or a defender, for the accuser of the brethren is shut out from thence, and the storms of the world roll far from that asylum.

It is plain, then, that the office of Paraclete had respect to this world only, and that if the continuance of that office be commensurate with the world's duration, it is one to which every race of believers have a right to look up in all humble confidence for the fulfilment of our Saviour's promise.

As the promise, then, of the Comforter is to ourselves and our sons and our sons' sons for evermore, it is natural and it is necessary to inquire with all becoming eagerness, the purport of an assurance in which we are so nearly and greatly concerned, and to ascertain the nature of that goodly heritage to which the word of God is our title.

Before, however, we proceed to ascertain, in the third place, by what display of power, what gracious and benignant agency Divine and Eternal Spirit was to evince himself the Comforter of Christians, it is an inquiry neither in itself unimportant, nor irrelevant to the general subject, to ascertain the part which that good Spirit had sustained in the scheme of God's providence as previously displayed in the Patriarchal and Mosaic dispensations.

For, in all the works of God, and more particularly in that process of salvation, of which, from the beginning of the world, the Old and New Testaments are the continued and connected history; so much prevails of general harmony, that no single period can be otherwise than most imperfectly comprehended, unless such period be considered as a part of, and in reference to the whole. And we may expect, therefore, to find, on inquiry, the distinct operation of the third Person in the Trinity, in his character of the Christian Paraclete, in some respects at least analogous to those by which he enlightened or influenced or defended the primitive worshippers of the one true God, or the subsequent theocracy of Israel.

Of that definite and distinct interference, however, in the earliest ages of the world, it would, perhaps, be vain, and it certainly would be unreasonable to expect any recorded acknowledgment. Too little is known of the first two thousand years of the world's duration, to enable us to ascertain any more as to the opinions of its long-lived inhabitants, than the fact that they, like us, adored a God, and, like us, relied on a Mediator. And, with all due deference to the learning and piety of those who have attempted to demonstrate the mystery of the Trinity from the plural number of the word "Elohim;" and from the apparition of those glorious Beings who visited Abraham beneath the oak of Mamre, it is wiser and better to place no reliance in argument, on circumstances which must be allowed to admit of other applications, and of which the application thus given (whether true or false), has been found by experience less likely to conciliate those who are in error, than to give occasion to indecent raillery, and to the grossest imputations against that truth which we by such means endeavour to defend.

There is another passage, however, which has been, with far more plausibility, applied by the great majority of commentators to the third Hypostasis of the Godhead, but which the modern Jews, and those Christians who are concerned in the support of Socinianism, have been anxious to understand of a material and natural agent. That passage, I mean, in the first chapter of Genesis, wherein the Spirit of God is described as in the act of creation, and as brooding on the surface of the chaotic waters.

That a rational, not a material agent is there intended, can admit, perhaps, of little doubt.

No other instance can be found in Scripture (though I am ready to admit that the word "Elohim" is often adjectively used as an epithet of greatness and power) in which the phrase "Ruach Elohim" can be, from the context, applicable to a natural wind, however rough or violent. The words which are united here, wherever they occur besides in union, are, by that connection, sanctified to miracle and divinity, and to the still and tranquil whispers of that Holy Being, from whom, whether by the agency of the Spirit or the Son, all grace and goodness emanate. Nor does the quivering motion implied in the Hebrew word which we render simply "moved," though it admirably accords with the hovering of a bird over her young, or with the shudder of a sudden apprehension, (the only two senses in which it elsewhere occurs in Scripture), agree by any means with an agent so furious and rapid as a storm; should we even grant that a physical storm were possible before the atmosphere had, as yet, been formed.

It may, therefore, be assumed as the most probable hypothesis, that the "Ruach Elohim" of Moses was not a natural wind, but a Spirit Intelligent and Divine. But that by the Intelligence here described, as well as by the creating Spirit of Job, the third Person in the Diety is intended, is an opinion which may well be questioned.

For, it is a fact to which sufficient attention has not yet been paid, (and it is one which may lead, perhaps, to the explication of some of the obscurest passages in Scripture), that, by the ancient Jews, by the Christians of the two first ages, and by the sacred writers themselves, the name of spirit is very often applied, not only to the third, but to the second Person in the Holy Trinity.

This circumstance was noticed, in the first instance, by the learned Fell, in his notes on Theophilus; and it has since been confirmed from the apostolic Fathers by Albert Zum Felde, and from the early Rabbins by Schöttgen; to which we may add, that the same term is applied to Jesus Christ in a remarkable passage of the Koran. Lactantius, we have already seen, was, on the same account, assailed for heresy by the too ardent zeal of Jerome; but how unjustly he was thus accused is apparent, not from these examples only, but from several passages of the New Testament in which a similar language is held.

St. Paul, when quoting, in his first Epistle to Timothy, a prophecy uttered by Christ while on earth, introduces it as spoken by "the Spirit." The "second Adam," according to the same Apostle, was to be a "quickening Spirit;" and the same appellation is repeatedly given by St. John in the Apocalypse, to the Person of his glorified Master.

When the name, therefore, of "Spirit" occurs in Scripture, a doubt may always arise, (unless some note of distinction accompany it,) whether the second or the third Hypostasis of the Godhead is intended. And, while this community of name may account for that vagueness of opinion respecting the essence and character of the latter which is discoverable in the Rabbinical writings, we cannot but observe, in the examination of the present passage, that the act of creation is one which, on the authority of the Apostles, we ascribe to that eternal Logos, without whom "there was not any thing made which was made." Nor should we forget that David identifies, in the sixth verse of the thirty-third Psalm, the creating Spirit of God with his Word; nor that the Rabbins, in some of their oldest commentaries, explain the text which we are now discussing to signify "the Spirit of the Messiah."

But, while the application of the name of Spirit to the Person of our Lord is in itself a strong presumption, against the followers of Socinus, that he who is thus distinguished from all mankind must necessarily have been something more than man; and while this community of name should teach us greater caution in the interpretation of many remarkable passages in the Old and New Testaments, the analogy of Scripture will, nevertheless, forbid us to doubt that the functions of the Holy Ghost, peculiarly so called, were as important and as prominent under the ancient as the Christian Covenant.

Nor is it any objection to this hypothesis, if we should suppose, as many striking passages of Scripture lead us to suppose, and as the Fathers of the second century with one accordant voice maintain, that, during the Patriarchal and Mosaic ages, some few, at least, among the recorded revelations of the almighty Presence and Power were revelations of that Everlasting Son, who was destined himself, in fulness of time, to assume mortality.

For, such occasional displays of glory on the part of the Second Person in the Diety, will by no means preclude the Third in that mysterious union from a frequent, perhaps a more frequent intercourse with mankind, whether by visible manifestations of his Person and Majesty, or by the silent influence of Inspiration, and those more usual but not less blessed bounties which, under the name of Grace, are peculiarly ascribed to his influence. Under the Gospel Covenant, when Christ had now ascended to heaven, and after he had himself declared his intention of resigning to another Divine Person the ordinary guardianship of his orphan Church, we find, nevertheless, the Son of God appearing not infrequently in person for the instruction and consolation of his Apostles. Nor will it follow from the appearance of the Divine Word on particular occasions to Adam, to Abraham, and to Moses, that the Holy Spirit was not their other and their more frequent Monitor, any more than it would follow that the interference of the Paraclete is disproved in the diffusion of the Gospel, because it was Christ himself who appeared in vision to St. Stephen, St. Paul, or St. John.

Nor will it be, perhaps, a very difficult task to show, on the diligent comparison of Scripture with itself, that the distinction of Persons in the Diety is little less evidently implied in the Old Testament than in the New, and that to the Third Hypostasis in the Trinity, as distinguished both from the Father and the Son, we are to ascribe, on the authority of the Sacred Writers, not only the inspiration of the Scriptues of the elder Covenant, but the tutelary guidance of the Church of Israel, and the disposal, as a general and superintending Providence, of the political fate of empires, in so much at least as those empires were connected with the chosen people of the Lord.

When Joel predicts the more abundant fulness of glory and power which was to adorn the Dispensation of Grace, he ascribes, as it should seem, this ampler inspiration to the same influence, (the influence, that is, of the same identical Person,) as that whence his own prophetic powers proceeded. And our Saviour announces the Spirit who was to comfort the Apostles, as a Person whose name, at least, was already known and familiar to the devout expectation of his hearers.

The Church is therefore fully justified, when, in that common Confession of Faith in which both East and West agree, she ascribes to one and the same Divine Spirit, under either Covenant, the dispensation of prophetic knowledge.

Nor is this all.—For, unless we assign a certain and a very important part to the Holy Ghost in the original institution and conduct of the Jewish Theocracy, it will be impossible to reconcile Scripture to itself, or to understand the apparently different language of Moses and St. Stephen, when speaking of the same occurrence. The Law, says the Author of the Pentateuch, was received by Moses from God himself, face to face, as a man speaketh with his friend. The Law, says the Protomartyr, (and he is supported in his assertion by the similar assurance of St. Paul,) was given by the dispensation of angels.

It is evident, then, that the beings, to whose conduct was entrusted the guidance of Israel, were such as were at once divine and messengers of divinity. But wherefore do we hear of more than one? Wherefore, unless that both the one and the other of those mysterious persons, to whom only the apparently discordant terms of God and angel are equally applicable, were engaged in the former, as they were, doubtless, both engaged in the latter covenant of Jehovah with mankind.

And that more than one divine person was actually manifested in those awful transactions, an attentive examination of the book of Moses will be sufficient to make us sensible. The mysterious being who promulgated the law from the flaming height of Sinai, who is called in Scripture both Jehovah himself and Jehovah's messenger, the Creator of the world and the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; this awful person is, by all these circumstances, still more than by the accordant opinion of the Christian fathers and the elder Jews, identified with the Logos or eternal word of God. But, of the further progress of the tribes into Canaan, the legislator of Horeb was not himself the guide. "Behold," are his words, "I send an angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. Beware of him and obey his voice, provoke him not, for he will not pardon your transgressions, for my name is in him."

It will not, however, he denied that he, whose peculiar presence thenceforward hallowed the tabernacle; who spake with Moses from between the cherubim of the mercy-seat; who announced himself to Joshua as the captain of Jehovah's army; and whom the prophets invoked as the tutelary Deity of the former temple; this person in himself, it cannot be denied, must needs have been both God and Lord. Nor is it easy, on a due comparison of these several premises with each other, to do otherwise than acknowledge, in that almighty person who was sent by God the word as his vicar and delegate; who was to reveal to the chosen tribes the more perfect will of heaven; and against whose authority all rebellion was, apparently, irremissible; a conformity of office and character with him by whose inspiration the prophets and evangelists alike composed their volumes; who is the Comforter and Patron of the Christian church, as he was of old the Ruler and Defender of the church of Israel.

And this conclusion will receive additional force from the similarity of those actions and ordinary influences which believers in Christ ascribe to the Holy Ghost, with those which the Jews impute to the Schekinah or tutelary and inhabiting Spirit of their tabernacle and former temple. The name of Schekinah has been indeed confined by some modern theologians to the open appearances of God's glory, and more especially to a certain luminous form, which (contrary to all probability of reason and all authority of Scripture) they suppose to have occupied with its actual presence the golden mercy-seat of the ark, or to have hovered, as a visible object of adoration, between the wings of the emblematical cherubim.

The falsehood of this popular doctrine the present is not the time to show; but it is sufficient for my purpose to observe, that, though the Jews undoubtedly ascribe to the agency of the Schekinah whatever display of God's glory has been made to man, whether in the sanctuary or elsewhere; yet is it certain that their doctors speak of it, not as a phantom only, or bodily vehicle, whereby the eternal father thought fit to announce his presence to mankind; but as a rational and (for the most part) an invisible person, who bore witness before the Father in behalf of those who were unfeigned converts to the truth; who dwelt in the hearts of such as rejoiced in the ways of piety, and received their departing souls; who protected the faithful during travel; who presided over their congregations in prayer, and over the private studies of the Scriptural student; whom, lastly, in the ceremony of ordination, they identified with the Holy Ghost as descending with unseen influence on the appointed ministers of religion.

It may be thought, then, that it was indeed the Son of God who spake with Moses from Sinai, but that it was the Spirit of God, peculiarly so called, by whom the work was completed of Israel's deliverance. Nor can any better solution be desired of that apparent difficulty which arises from the comparison of the accounts afforded by Isaiah and St. Paul to the same identical transaction, the disobedience of Israel in the desert.

When the first of these Evangelists (for to both that name is applicable) describes his ancestors as having grieved the Holy Spirit, he means, we may suppose, that person in the Godhead who was their guide into their promised territory. But when the latter instances their sin in tempting Christ, it is plain from the context that by Christ he intends that Jehovah who brought them out of the land of Egypt, and of whom the manna, which they sinned in refusing, was a type and bodily image.

And so perfect is the parallel between the corresponding features of that vast design whereby the salvation of mankind is secured, that as, in either case, it was the second Person of the Trinity by whom the Church was brought out of bondage, so was it in both the third in that mysterious union who was to conduct them to their appointed Canaan.

The most important, however, and certainly the clearest discovery of the existence and functions of God's Holy Spirit under the Mosaic dispensation, is communicated by that Prophet who, of all the servants of the Almighty, had the most perspicuous notices of his nature and the general scheme of his government. And as the chapters of Daniel in which this account is found have been the subjects of very general misapprehension, and as they have been even perverted into a source of error the most childish and idolatrous, I may be excused if I enter somewhat at length into the circumstances which they detail.

On the banks of the Tigris, we read in the tenth chapter of his prophecy, was Daniel visited, after a long preparation of fasting and prayer, by a Person clothed with every attribute of celestial majesty and terror, in a white and glittering garb, and cinctured with a golden girdle; "his body like the beryl, his face as the appearance of lightning, his eyes as lamps of fire, his arms and his feet in colour like polished brass, and the voice of his words as the voice of a multitude."

This awful Spirit, whose words, no less than his appearance, betoken the highest pitch of majesty and power; who describes himself as the sustaining Providence of the Persian empire, and to whom the angels of God apply as to an oracle for a knowledge of futurity; has been variously regarded by the greater number of commentators, either as the Divine Logos or second Person in the Trinity, or as a created though very powerful angel.

The former of these opinions has, I apprehend, been founded on the supposed similarity of attire and dignity between the Person here described and our Lord Jesus Christ, as he appeared in glory, after his decease, to the beloved Writer of the Apocalypse.

But on a correspondence like this no such conclusion can be justly founded, inasmuch as the features are those general ones only of royal and celestial authority, adopted, as it may seem, from the usual attire of eastern and Jewish monarchs, which belong not only to the Son of Man, but the minister of God's will, whoever he was, who descended to unlock the sepulchre wherein that blessed Son lay buried; and which, as may be seen in the seventh chapter of the same prophecy, are ascribed not to these alone, but to the Ancient of Days or Eternal Father himself.

And that, notwithstanding such general similarity, he who stood on the waters of Hiddekel was not the second Person of the Trinity, is apparent from his speaking of Michael, the Prince of Judah, as another and distinct Intelligence.

For that Michael is one of the names ascribed to our Saviour in his pre-existent state, may be proved, not only by the clearest evidence of Rabbinical tradition, but also by the more forcible and unexceptionable proof which is obtained by comparing Scripture with itself.

Michael is represented in the books of the ancient Jews, as the Chief Priest and Expiator of heaven; as offering, on that celestial altar which John in the sixth and eighth chapters of his prophecy describes, the souls and the prayers of all faithful Israelites; as defending his people, before the tribunal of almighty Justice, from the malicious accusations of Satan. He is described as the pillar of cloud and fire which guided the Tribes through the wilderness, and guarded them in the sea from the pursuit of the Egyptians. He was, they tell us, the Spirit on whose peculiar intercession David relied; who alone was able to obtain the admission of the bloodstained but penitent monarch into the assembly of the blest in paradise; and who knows the wants and who pleads for all the necessities of the faithful in this nether world. But the Jews do more than all which I have hitherto mentioned.

They expressly distinguish him from every created angel or spirit, and assure us, that wherever Michael is said to have appeared, it must be understood of the Divine Majesty.

And that these opinions, however wildly expressed, are not, in their essential features, at variance with the Scriptures of either Covenant, a comparison of the first verse of Daniel's twelfth chapter with the seventh verse of the twelfth chapter of the Apocalypse, is in itself sufficient to prove. In the former, Michael is described as "the great Prince" who, in the latter days, was to stand up for Israel; in the latter, the expulsion, by his means, of the powers of evil from heaven is predicted in terms and under circumstances which can only suit the Messiah.

He is called by St. Jude the Chief or Prince of Angels, and the voice of that mighty Prince is identified by St. Paul with HIS voice, whom, if we believe St. John, all those who are in the grave shall one day hear.

He, then, who is distinguished from the Archangel Michael cannot possibly be identified with the second Person of the Triune Godhead. At the same time, the language of the Person described by Daniel is no less inconsistent with the character of a finite or created Intelligence.

"In the first year," he tells us, "of Darius the Mede, I, even I stood to strengthen him." Is this the language of a merely ministering spirit; or have angels authority over the destiny of mankind, to overturn or establish empires at their pleasure? "There is none," he subjoins, "that holdeth with me in these things save Michael your prince." But can a finite being compare with Michael in any thing; or will the very chiefest of heaven's officers assume a tone so nearly approaching to equality with him whom all the angels worship; who sits enthroned above all dominations and principalities and powers, whether they be in this world or in the world to come?

These, indeed, who have considered Daniel's instructor as no more than a created spirit, have been obliged, for the most part, in consistency with themselves, to degrade the Archangel Michael also to a level little superior; and to adopt, with various modifications, that wild and portentous system, which would commit the government of earth and heaven, like the empire of Darius son of Hystaspes, to a number of celestial but created deputies.

It is thus that learned and holy men have unintentionally sanctioned the grossest and wildest superstitions, and have built up in their imaginations a hierarchy of tutelary spirits; who watch, as they would teach us, with an active, but often with an erring zeal, over the insulated and jarring interests of individuals and dynasties and nations.

All this arose from their opinion who regarded the celestial visitant of Daniel as a created and angelic agent. For, if he who spake to the Prophet were an angel, it was concluded that the Prince of Persia, whom he had at first supported and with whom he was now to contend, must needs have been an angel also; and that Michael, who aided him in his quarrel, was another, and a yet more potent celestial satrap, (the Vizier, perhaps, of Paradise,) who either interfered with his good offices, or arrived on the field of battle with such an overpowering army of cherubim as might reduce the contumacious provincials to order and obedience.

If we desire to know the grounds of debate, which thus, according to the ancient Fathers, had kindled war in heaven, we may find them laid down with historical precision by Ephrem Syrus, in his commentary on the present chapter. "After the confusion of languages," are his words, "and the division of tribes which took place at Babel, each nation received its Angel-Governor; and Michael was the Guardian of the Hebrews. This people being captive in Assyria, Daniel prayed for their return after the appointed seventy years of bondage were accomplished. The Angel of Persia, however, opposed the measure, and maintained, on this occasion, a vigorous war against Michael and Gabriel. He desired to detain the Jews at Babylon, because he was glad to have under his jurisdiction a people who worshipped the true God, and because he hoped that, in process of time, the Jews would convert to their faith the nations both of Assyria and Persia."

How naturally such opinions would lead to the worshipping of angels, has been shown by one of the ablest and most learned advocates whom Providence has raised up for the defence of the Catholic faith; and who, both before and since his death, has been, of all others, most honourably distinguished by the rancorous abuse which the enemies of that faith have heaped upon his fame and memory.

But of such a system the bare enunciation is sufficient to prove the unsoundness. What could be, in such a hierarchy, the limits of each angel's sovereignty; or how were those limits to be adjusted in the perpetual changes of polity and language which have passed over the face of the world?—Are we to suppose, with Ephrem and Theodoret and Origen, that an angelic guardian was allotted to each particular language? How were these guardians to act when the parent tongue branched out into a multitude of distinct and corrupted dialects? Is the tutelar genius of the Goths at once the sovereign of the German, the Swedish, the American and the English nations? If a language becomes extinct, does the angel abdicate his throne? When one tribe subdues another, is the guardian of the conquered race himself in captivity with his clients? or are the wars which desolate our lower world the echoes only and more faint reflections of those quarrels which shake the empyrean? Is it possible that the pure inhabitants of that peaceable world, "wherein the wicked cease from troubling," should have strife and faction among themselves; that, like feudal chieftains, or the old Homeric deities, the ministers of heaven should oppose each other's plans, and the mandates of their common Master; or can he to whom all things bow down be swayed by the secret influence or senseless mutiny of those glorious but fragile beings, whom, as he has created them from nothing, the withholding of his breath can annihilate?

These are, however, conclusions, to which, on Socinian principles, the book of Daniel must inevitably conduct us. For, if we refuse to acknowledge a distinction of Persons in the Deity, we must needs regard as created Spirits both the Person who spake with Daniel, and that Michael who assisted him to subdue or conciliate the Prince of Persia. And as the language of Daniel's monitor is not the language of one who was the mere instrument of another's will, but of one whose proceedings were guided by his own discretion; that conclusion must follow, against which the modern Socinians with so great indignation contend, that created spirits are associated with the Almighty in the moral and physical government of the world. If, however, we suppose that glorious apparition who conversed with Daniel, and who was the fellow-labourer of the Word of God, to be himself no other than the Holy Ghost, the whole perplexed machinery of tutelar spirits fades away like the shadow of a dream. The princes of Pars and of Javan become, according to the obvious purport of the expression, the moral governors of Persia and Macedon; the resistance which, during one and twenty days, the first opposed to the will of Heaven, is the reluctance exhibited by the government of that country to dismiss the Jews to their home; the victory which Daniel's Informant, assisted by Michael, obtained over those evil passions, is meant of that gracious influence, which, joined to the Redeemer's intercession at his Father's throne, overpowered the selfish policy and softened the idolatrous hatred of those lords of Israel's captivity.

And of the protection, even in temporal matters, and unconnected, apparently, with the return of the Jews to their mountains, which the providence of God, during a certain space, afforded to the Persian empire, the same conversation affords a remarkable instance. "In the first year of Darius the Mede, I, even I," saith the Spirit, "stood to strengthen him." "I now return," are his words in another place, "to fight with the Prince of Persia; and when I am gone forth, the Prince of Grecia will come."

In this sentence, if we understand the Hebrew particle בְּ to signify against or in opposition to, his meaning will be, "I return to renew my gracious influence on the heart of the Persian governor, correcting his evil habits and prejudices, and restraining by my presence the natural excesses of an idolatrous and arbitrary monarch." But if בְּ be rendered with, as on the side of, and favouring his quarrel, it will import that the Spirit of God was about to assist for a certain time the empire of Persia, in its triumphant progress over Asia, Thrace and Egypt; and that, while his presence abode with the counsels and armies of the king, those counsels and armies should be alike irresistible and prosperous.

But, whichever of these interpretations is preferred, what follows can admit of no interpretation but one. "When I am gone forth, the Prince of Grecia shall come." As if he had said, "I now return to that residence which the intercession of Michael hath for the present allotted me; I return, to shed light, prosperity and empire on the throne of the successors of Cyrus. But, when the intentions of the Most High are answered, for which that government hath been raised from obscurity; when their hardness of heart hath a little longer resisted, and their tyrannics have a little longer grieved me; when I depart, (and depart I will,) the valour of their bowmen shall wither away, and the craft of their elders shall be ashamed. Let them look, in that day, for far sorer reproofs than mine; let them expect far other visitants than my peaceful and gracious discipline! When I depart, the sentence of God is gone forth against their land, and the sword of Macedon is already brandished at the door."

The sum of all will be contained in that great doctrine which is, perhaps, the most prominent of all the lessons conveyed in Daniel's Prophecies, "that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men;" and that the chain of political events, and the course of good or evil fortune, are to be numbered among the invisible operations of that tremendous Spirit, from whom all knowledge and power and understanding do proceed; who directed the artist powers of Bezaleel and the political wisdom of Solomon; and in whose hand not only Jephtha and Othniel, but Nebuchadnezzar and Pul and Cyrus were alike the chosen instruments of his providence.

Nor is it any sufficient objection to the present hypothesis, that the appearance of the Holy Ghost in the human form is at variance with the acknowledged fact of his manifestation of himself, during the Messiah's residence on earth, under the corporeal shape of a dove, and at the time of Pentecost under the likeness of flames of fire.

To those who regard all such displays as symbols only of the favour of him whose presence fills infinity, it is plain that all alike are phantoms adapted to human weakness and ignorance, and calculated to impress on the mind of the spectator, a stronger feeling of confidence or respect or piety; nor can any of them be singled out, without exceeding presumption, as more peculiarly appropriate than the rest to set forth that majesty, which it is in symbols only that our mortal sense can contemplate.

And if the Son, according to the usual opinion, have appeared successively to Moses and the Patriarchs under the various forms of a cloud, an angel, a consuming fire; we can, surely, feel no reason for surprise that the same Spirit, who has manifested himself to the reverence of mankind, as a dove, a disparted flame, and a rushing mighty wind, should have also, on certain occasions, assumed a semblance such as the Prophet Daniel here describes. If a more definite precedent, however, be required, I am greatly mistaken if the beginning of the eighth chapter of Ezekiel be not found, on diligent examination, to present an instance of an apparition of the Holy Ghost in a form almost precisely similar.

It may be yet farther observed, that, in the passage already quoted from Ephrem Syrus, that writer supposes, (and it is an idea in which the great majority of commentators agree with him,) that the person described in the tenth chapter of Daniel is the same with him who had, on former occasions, declared the date of the Messiah's coming. And this opinion is doubtless countenanced by many circumstances of similarity in the manner of each visitant's salutation, and in the deep astonishment and terror (greater than what is, in any part of Scripture, attributed to an apparition merely angelical) by which, on his approach, the mortal beholder was overcome.

On those former occasions, however, the celestial Instructor is called by the name of Gabriel. And, as this is a name which, though it only twice occurs in the Old Testament, is familiar to every reader of the New; it will not be unimportant or uninteresting to add some few remarks as to the general opinion which the ancient Jews entertained of this personage, and as to the manner in which he is first introduced to our notice in the book of Daniel.

Not only, then, to Michael, but to Gabriel, do the Jews ascribe the name of "Chief Prince," or Sovereign of Jerusalem and Sion; it was from their joint agency that the wonders of the Messiah's kingdom were expected to proceed; these two alone, of all the host of heaven, were supposeed to bear the likeness or image of God, and the "Saviours," whom Obadiah describes as "going out of the mountain Zion," are explained, in the Shemoth Rabba, to signify Michael and Gabriel. It is this latter who is to destroy, in the end of the world, the power of the leviathan or evil spirit. He it was who is expressly called Jehovah, when in the act of raining fire on Sodom; and who is called the Son of God, when he descended to protect the faithful worshippers of God in the Babylonian furnace.

To Michael and Gabriel alone, of all the angelic host, it is given, according to some of the more ancient Rabbins, to stand in the presence of the Most High, as his counsellors and confidential ministers; nay, of them alone is eternal duration predicated; while the remaining multitude of heaven are supposed to enjoy not only a temporary being, but an existence literally ephemeral.

Of these last it was fabled, that they every morning rose from the exhalations of a certain heavenly river, to sing their hymns and perform their services before the eternal throne. And, those brief hymns and little services concluded, they were absorbed, with the dawn of the following day, in the insensible beatitude of their parent stream; which yielded at the same time, a fresh swarm of pure and happy beings, to be occupied, in their turn, in the harmony of heaven, and bask a few short hours in the radiance of their Maker's favour.

With such absurdities, I need hardly observe that a Christian has no concern. But it may appear important even for a Christian to recollect, that some vestige of truth may be generally detected amid the rankest weeds of popular superstition. And such a vestige, perhaps, is that immeasurable distance which these ancient doctors conceived to exist between the ordinary inhabitants of paradise, and those two awful Persons, who only, among the princes of heaven, have received appropriate names in Scripture; names which the Jews profess to have derived from the date of this very prophesy, and of which the former, Michael, can hardly be under such circumstances considered as less than a claim to Deity, while the latter, Gabriel, is literally translated "the Strength or Active Power of God.

Who the first of these persons is we have already seen on a comparison of the Prophet Daniel with the equally prophetic Author of the Book of Revelations: who the second may be supposed to be, may, perhaps, still further appear from an examination of the circumstances which preceded his first appearance to Daniel.

In his eighth chapter, and after describing the visionary representation of the Macedonian symbol, and the future fortunes of the Persian empire, the Prophet proceeds to inform us, that he heard two invisible persons conversing, whom he calls by the name of Saints or Holy Ones. "I heard," are his words, "one Saint speaking; and another Saint said unto that certain Saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice?"

Now here it may be reasonably inquired, to what class of beings do those Saints belong, whose words are thus partially recorded? Men they will not be supposed to have been; for they were invisible, and competent to interpret the visions of futurity. To angels the name of Saint is no where given in the Book of Daniel; nor, that I can recollect, in the course of the entire Old Testament. But the same word, when joined with the term of Watcher, is applied, as Bishop Horsely has shown, in the fourth chapter of this same prophecy, to those who alone, of all existing things, are properly and essentially holy, the Persons of the Triune Godhead. Those Saints whose voices Daniel heard, may be, perhaps, considered, therefore, as divine.

But one of these Saints is distinguished from the other by the Hebrew epithet Palmoni; a word which our translators, following the authority of Jerome, and Theodoret, have rendered by "that certain Saint which spake." The force of the two words Peloni Almoni, of which they suppose it to be a contraction, is, "Some one I know not who," "Some unknown person," "That unknown Holy One." It is also susceptible (if we derive it from the word Palah) of the meaning of "secret" or "wonderful." I will not now examine which of these renderings is best or most probable. Essentially they both agree, since he whom Daniel describes as "a certain Saint," was, at least, unknown to and secret from the Prophet who thus describes him.

But, wherefore is one of two invisible personages distinguished from the other by the name of "the secret Holy One," "the Holy One whom I know not?" Was the other better known to him previously? That will scarcely, I apprehend, be supposed. Did he become better acquainted with him afterwards? This last is, surely, the most natural inference. But the person who, immediately afterwards, becomes visible to him "in the appearance of a man," is that Gabriel, whom a voice from heaven enjoins to explain the vision to Daniel; on whose approach the Prophet falls on his face in the posture of adoration, and is not reproved for doing so. But it has been already shown to be probable, that Gabriel is the same with that majestic apparition on the waters of Hiddekel, who spake of himself as the coadjutor and equal of "him who is like God." Gabriel himself is here represented as a Holy One, and acquiesces in an honour which we are not permitted to render to any but the Most High and Holy One who inhabiteth eternity. The inference is as obvious as it is awful.

Of Gabriel we, by name, learn something more in the gospel according to St. Luke; and there is, certainly, nothing in either of the passages wherein his name occurs, which can derogate from his character of Divinity. The name of angel is given, we know, to the Son; and the same everlasting Word or Son is said, like Gabriel, to stand in the presence and at the side of God the Father.

We may rank it, then, at least, among the probabilities of Scriptural conjecture, that, in the visions of Daniel and Ezekiel, in the prediction made to Zacharias as to the birth of John the Baptist, and in the annunciation of our Lord's miraculous conception in the virgin's womb, the spirit or power of God was manifested, in a visible form, though of what likeness we are not told, to the faith and reverence of the mortals thus distinguished.

To the Angel Gabriel both Jews and Mahommedans (by the latter sect he is expressly called the Holy Ghost) are apparently correct in assigning a rank superior to the ordinary inhabitants of heaven. It may, possibly, be thought, that the rank of this angel is not yet estimated high enough either by Jews, Mohammedans, or Christians; and that in him, whom we honour as an angel of God, we shall recognize a person, in himself eternal and divine.

Let, then, the above observations suffice as to what is known or conjectured concerning the part sustained by the Spirit of God in the general government of the world, and the several manifestations of his person and power during the times of the elder Covenant. On his subsequent showers of glory and of grace,—on Christ in his baptism, and on the apostles at the time of Pentecost,—it is unnecessary, as I conceive, to enlarge; and of those blessings which either are or are supposed to be peculiar to Christians, and the consequences of his last named advent, I shall speak in a future sermon.

There is yet, however, another occasion on which the words of Scripture give us reason to believe that the influence of the Holy Ghost was immediately and conspicuously exerted, during the night, I mean, of Christ's interment, and during his resurrection from the dead.

I am well aware of the reasonable doubt which may exist, whether the spirit whereby, according to St. Peter, Christ was quickened, be understood of the third person in the Trinity, or of our Lord's own immortal nature. Nor do I forget that the Son of Man has ascribed the act of his resurrection to himself and an immediate act of his own divinity. But we also learn from St. Paul that he was raised from the dead by the same glorious Person who regenerates us to newness of life, —and by whose agency, according to the Jews, our own dust and ashes shall hereafter be formed anew into the likeness of the Lord from heaven. Nor can we better reconcile these, seemingly, conflictive statements than by the belief that as all the persons of the Trinity were concerned in this awful resuscitation,—so he, more particularly, who is the soul of the material world and its preserving and pervading Providence, —by whose sole operation the body of Jesus was framed in the virgin's womb,—and by whom, as by the finger of God, the Messiah wrought his wonders, was active, on the present occasion, in undoing the work of death, and in preparing the deserted body of Christ for the return of its Divine Inhabitant.

But, having ventured to call your attention to topics so mysterious as those which have engrossed the present lecture, (among the most mysterious they doubtless are which can occupy the thoughts or inquiry of man or any created being,) let it be remembered that it has rather been my object to excite, than my expectation to gratify, the devout curiosity of my hearers. Be it remembered, that the more we search into the wonders of revelation, the more strongly we shall feel our own weakness and blindness; happy if the painful sense of conscious ignorance induce us to look forward with increased intensity of hope, to that moment when every doubt shall terminate!

Be it observed, above all, that these wilder or more fanciful speculations of theology, though, if correct, they may illustrate; if false or exaggerated, cannot, by their failure, affect the more solid columns of Christianity,—those doctrines of the atonement and Triune Deity, against which the gates of hell are destined never to prevail; which, of whatever materials be the superstructure which we seek to rear on their basis, are themselves impregnably founded on the rock of eternal wisdom.

And though, in such conjectures as have been this day offered to your notice, there be little which can lay claim to the praise of original research, and less, as I should hope, which can incur the blame of an unreasonable desire of novelty: yet, if any thing have been unintentionally spoken in rashness or in folly, may the Church of Christ forgive it; and may He, above all, by whom we are sanctified to salvation, forgive, for His sake and through His merits by whose blood our salvation is purchased!

LECTURE V.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

The several dispensations have been already explained, whereby the Spirit of God is represented, during the continuance of the former Covenant, and during our Saviour's earthly pilgrimage, as concurring in the great designs of almighty Wisdom and Mercy, and co-operating in the redemption of the world.

It yet remains that we inquire into the nature of those benefits, which the family of the Lord on earth are, since his departure, authorized to anticipate from the advent of the Spirit of God; in what manner that awful Person has performed the promise of the eternal Word, and by what dispensation of mercy and of what power he has evinced and continues to evince himself the peculiar Comforter of Christians.

I call the Spirit of God our peculiar Comforter, because (though, in all the works of God, and in all his mercies, however bestowed, there be doubtless, as we have already observed, a correspondence and general harmony,) yet, in the name of a Comforter, and in the act of his mission to any peculiar class of beings, is the idea conveyed of appropriate and exclusive privilege; of a something which distinguishes the favoured individuals from the general condition of mankind, and from that which had been their own condition before the occurrence of the event described.

By a promise made to one definite object all others are necessarily excluded: if a province be conferred on Marcus by name, it is apparent that Lentulus or Messala can expect no share in its government: if we are told that the Almighty on Mount Sinai made a covenant with the children of Israel, we understand immediately that Moab and Amalek had no concern in such particular transaction.

Accordingly, it is apparent that the comfort which the Spirit of God was, after the decease of Christ and on Christ's behalf, to confer on his orphan followers, must have been of a nature in which not only all the faithful, but the faithful alone were to be partakers; something which should distinguish the church from all other terrestrial communities, and should separate, with a broad and perceptible line of demarcation, the enlightened children of God most High from the darkness of an unconverted world. The gift, then, of the Holy Ghost in his capacity of Paraclete, is appropriate and peculiar to the followers of our blessed Lord.

But, further, the promised comfort must have been something of which the disciples themselves, to whom the assurance was originally given, were not in previous possession. Our Saviour does not speak of it as of something which they should not lose, but as of something which they were thereafter to receive. It may be said, indeed, that the very terms of "coming," and "visitation," and "mission," (though, as applied to a Person who is already omnipresent, they can only be considered as figurative and adapted to our earthly capacities,) in themselves imply and are invariably used to signify some distinct and new manifestation of the power or mercy of God. When it was promised, therefore, that the Holy Ghost should visit the disciples as a Comforter, they could do no less than anticipate some certain advantage which that advent should confer, some advantage which they had not before received, and had, otherwise, no reason to expect, either as men, or as Jews, or as the followers of Jesus of Nazareth.

And this becomes yet more evident when we consider, that this visitation of God the Holy Ghost was announced to the disciples as a compensation for the heavy misfortune which then impended over them, the departure of their beloved Lord. The coming of the Paraclete was to counterbalance this affliction, and to counterbalance it so effectually that, on this account alone, our Lord himself declared it to be "expedient for them that he should go away." But, that they should not lose, by the departure of Christ, the advantages which they enjoyed before his coming, or those which they had since received from him, though it might be a topic against the violence of despair, could by no means be called a compensation. For, that is a compensation only which we receive in consequence of our loss; but that which I either did or might enjoy without any loss whatever, can with no propriety of language be said to come to me in consequence of my misfortunes, nor (though the balance of good may, on the whole, preponderate in my favour) to repay me for what I have suffered. That many other old and valuable friends are left me, may soften indeed my grief for the loss of one whom I love; but it cannot be said, that my not being altogether forsaken can make it expedient for me to lose a friend.

It follows, that the compensation promised to Christians for the loss of their Master's visible presence, must be an advantage peculiar to Christians alone, and one which the followers of Christ did not possess before the descent of the rushing mighty wind at Pentecost. And, if I should seem to have bestowed too tedious an argument on a point, apparently, so plain, let it be remembered, that on these first principles many truths may be found to depend, which have been the subjects of more arduous contest, and which possesses in themselves a more obvious and practical interest.

To return, however, from this seeming digression. It was observed in the preceding Lecture, that through all the scheme of man's salvation, as revealed to us in the sacred Writings, so strongly is the character displayed of a general and harmonious analogy, that it was, a priori, reasonable to expect that in the operations of the Spirit, during the development and conduct of the new dispensation, we should find a connexion and similarity with his more conspicuous interpositions for the furtherance and completion of the old.

And such a correspondence is, even on a hasty view, discernible between the tokens of the divine favour and presence originally afforded in the tabernacle, and by those which qualified the earliest teachers of Christianity for the arduous service to which they were ordained; which enabled them to maintain their Master's quarrel against all the deeply rooted habits and inveterate ignorance of mankind, and supported them with a supernatural wisdom, and a vigour not their own, under the many and bitter trials which assailed their faith and patience.

Thus, if the Schekinah descended in cloud and fire to take possession of the shrine appropriated to his service in the ancient tabernacle, the Holy Ghost came down with similar circumstances of wonder and majesty, to signify in a visible manner his approbation and protection of those early teachers of and converts to the faith of Christ, whose bodies were thenceforth, in the expressive language of St. Paul, to be his nobler and living sanctuaries.

Did the face of Moses shine with reflected glory, when he returned from coversing with the God of Israel?—The same angelic splendour adorned the Protomartyr's countenance; when Stephen, in the presence of his murderers, bare witness to the resurrection and exultation of his Lord. As Moses was permitted to enter into the Holy of Holies, to receive, in that figurative heaven, the commands of God;—so was St. Paul, on a certain occasion, caught up into paradise itself, to that celestial temple and holy place not made by hands, of which the earthly edifice was but a shadow. The gift of prophecy, which was communicated, in Horeb, to the seventy elders of the Israelitish nation, was not only equalled but greatly surpassed by that fiery stream of power, which in the earliest days of the Messiah's kingdom was poured out on the sons and daughters of Jerusalem: and we may advantageously contrast with the tremendous and destructive evidences of God's presence which were given under the ancient Covenant, those miracles of blessing and of peace, whereby the Apostles of Christ could raise the dead, and cast out devils, and take up serpents in their hands, and open the eyes of the blind, and proclaim, in the proper tongues of every kindred and nation and people, the things which belonged unto their eternal peace.

So striking, indeed, are the instances recorded in the apostolic writings, in which the miraculous and visible patronage of God's Spirit was afforded to the orphan Church of Christ, that it cannot reasonably excite our wonder, that some eminent commentators should seek no further than these extraordinary and temporary aids for the accomplishment of our Saviour's promise; and should recognize, in the powers accorded to the primitive teachers of the Gospel, the whole of that comfort which it was the office of the Paraclete to bestow.

But notwithstanding the acknowledged value of the advantages thus conferred, it may be doubted, whether, great as they were, they could have in themselves compensated to the immediate followers of Christ for the recent loss of their Master. And it is certain that many are entitled, by the words of Christ, to a share in the peculiar comfort of the Holy Ghost, to whom these definite advantages have been at no time accorded.

The promise, as we have seen in the preceding Lecture, was not to the apostolic age alone, but to every succeeding generation of Christians from the death of the Messiah to the moment of his triumphant return. But though there be more, perhaps, than a single church in Christendom, which has not as yet explicitly abandoned her pretensions to supernatural endowment, yet by even those who still advance such claims, the gifts of healing and of exorcism are acknowledged to be enjoyed by a very small number of individuals only; and the general avowal of the several Protestant sects, and the tacit admission of the best and wisest individuals in the Greek and Roman communions, evince at least that, whatever exceptions may be pretended to the general rule, and however we may fail to fix the period at which the miraculous aids of our religion were withdrawn, such miraculous aids have not been for many ages vouchsafed to the preachers of any Christian community.

Nor is that a sufficient answer by which this objection is usually encountered;—the answer, namely, that "the difference of situation and circumstance between the Christians of the present day and the original planters of our faith, has justified the Almighty in withdrawing from the maturer growth of the tree of life those props and standards which were needful in her sapling condition: that we have, at present, no occasion for supernatural powers, and that therefore we enjoy them no longer."

For, 1st, The fact itself on which this argument reposes, that miracles are no longer required for the progress of the Christian faith, is one which, though it be a favourite topic with the great majority of apologists for the truth, is, nevertheless, not easily to be defended.

There are many Christians at the present day, and there have been many at every period since the cessation of supernatural gifts, who have spent with little fruit, but with a sincerity which it would ill become us to impeach, their labours and their lives in the instruction of Mohammedans and Pagans.

But have not men like these occasionally experienced a perplexing and a painful want of supernatural credentials, in situations in which such credentials are most especially needful and appropriate? Or to what other cause than the lack of such apostolic endowments can we ascribe the feeble advances of our faith in later times, compared with that most rapid and abundant growth of converts which in every corner of the world rewarded the labour of the primitive missionaries?

That miracles would now be useless, is a conclusion which we have no right to draw from the fact that they are seen no longer. The dispensations of our almighty Father are too full of mystery for us to determine, whether he design the conversion of the remaining Gentiles by the credit of those recorded miracles which brought their first-fruits to his altar; or whether he may defer a while, till the time of their ingathering be come, those fresh manifestations of his glory and power which are to enlighten their uttermost darkness.

For the rarity of miracles a better reason may, perhaps, be found, in the consideration that, if they were common, they would be miracles no longer. Those visible pledges of God's interference which are calulated in an especial manner to arouse the attention of mankind, would, if often repeated, excite no more attention than the dawn and sunset, or the receding and returning tide. They are restricted, therefore, by almighty Wisdom to those solemn occurrences which are to be ever memorable among men; and not only may it be said that such displays of power are wonderful because they are rare, but that they are therefore rare in order that they may be wonderful. And, instead of urging that miracles have ceased because they are no longer needed, it may be said, perhaps, with more conformity to truth, and, certainly, with as much humility, that God in these later days has left us to ourselves, that we may feel more perfectly our own weakness, and our want of his assistance.

But, 2dly, If we should concede that supernatural aids are now no longer needed, as being snperseded by the diffusion of knowledge and the protection of Christian Sovereigns; though this, beyond a doubt, would admirably justify the ways of Providence in ceasing to concede such powers to men, provided their continuance were a matter of free grace and favour; yet, if the grant of such powers to the Church be the whole or even any essential part of the promise made by Christ, the reasoning will apply no longer.

For that which is once promised is no longer in the power of any one to give or to withhold at pleasure. However free the bounty may at first have been, the promise is a covenant not to be dissolved without the full concurrence of the recipient party: and though his circumstances may have, since, so completely altered, as no longer to require our bounty; yet, if such a change were not foreseen and provided for, or tacitly, at least, implied in the original nature of our agreement, the promise may itself be chargeable with improvidence, but we cannot, with honour, dispense ourselves from its full and fair fulfilment.

Nor, further, can it be said with truth, that, in the present instance, the circumstances which were contemplated in the original promise of a Comforter have at any time ceased to operate. It was the blessing of an infallible Guide, the guardianship of a visible and incarnate Deity, the presence of the Son of God himself, for which the coming of the Paraclete was to compensate. And, till the return of Christ to earth, and so long as we no less than the apostles are mourners for his absence, and for that unequal state of worldly things which his last great advent is to remedy, we are entitled, equally with the apostles, to look up with pious confidence for the same comfort which, for the same reason, was promised to us as to them.

It is plain, therefore, that a temporary and partial benefit is by no means, in itself, an adequate fulfilment of a promise made to every generation of the faithful, and to each individual believer; and it is necessary, if we desire to evince the accomplishment of our Saviour's gracious assurance, to understand it of some more general and pervading benefit, in which not the apostolic age alone, but every succeeding Christian either has or might have partaken.

Accordingly, it has been supposed by the great majority of commentators, that, though the promise of our Saviour was immediately and literally fulfilled to the apostles in the gift of those miraculous powers which were necessary to their peculiar situation, yet did it, in its implied and secondary sense, extend to all believers, in the ordinary means of improvement which the same good Spirit has never ceased to bestow. And, when they are further asked, in what peculiar blessings we experience, in modern times, that present and abiding Paraclete whom our Saviour has promised to his Church? it has been usual to refer us to those sacred institutions which are the outward badges of our profession, as well as to that inward grace by which only the external sign is made available to our holiness here and our endless happiness hereafter.

The presence of the Comforter has thus been sought in the Sacraments of the Eucharist and of Baptism; in the succession of a ministry apostolically ordained and governed; and, above all, in those secret aids and blessed influences, which, from the greater frequency of their occurrence, and not from any supposed or real inferiority in their value, are distinguished from the gifts of supernatural power and knowledge as the ordinary graces of the Holy Ghost.

And, by thus supposing that our Saviour's promise has been fulfilled in different ways to different generations of his people, our Protestant divines have appeared to elude, with sufficient dexterity, the opposing and almost equal difficulties of admitting, on the one hand, the arrogant and superstitious claims of the Romish Hierarchy, and of confining, on the other, to certain persons and periods only, a comfort which was announced without limitation, as the future privilege of all believers in the Messiah.

Nor, if the compensation which the church was to receive had been described by our Lord under the general name of Grace or Comfort only, can it be denied, that this solution of the difficulty would have been recommended to our adoption by very strong apparent reasons.

Both grace and comfort, if they are not necessarily inherent in the washing of regeneration and the Eucharist bread and wine, may, at least, be attained by a proper use of these external means. Both grace and comfort are dispensed to the church in the preaching of God's word by his appointed messengers, and by the pardon which, on his behalf, they announce to the truly penitent. Both are in like manner perceived to flow from those secret aids to which the name itself of grace is peculiarly and emphatically given; those aids which, as we believe, both prevent and follow our every endeavour after holiness; which, as preliminaries to conversion, and as helps to perseverance, are absolutely necessary to unlock the gate of heaven to our entrance, or to support us in our upward journey.

Had, then, our Saviour's words amounted to no more than a general assurance of help and comfort to be, on his behalf, afforded by the Spirit of God, any spiritual grace whatever might be regarded as sufficient to discharge the debt of mercy to which that promise made him liable. Or, if the terms of the promise were sufficiently answered by those less brilliant aids, which only are continued to these latter ages of Christianity, it might be urged with reason, that we have no ground to complain, if, when we ourselves receive even a bare fulfilment of our Lord's assurance, we behold a more abundant mercy exercised by God in the case of former generations. While we ourselves have all which was agreed upon, our "eye" must not "be evil," if the goodness of our Master should, in other instances, "do what he will with his own."

Had the promise, then, been general, we might, with the learned Hammond, have readily acknowledged, that the comfort of the Paraclete is perpetual in the church, inasmuch as our external and internal exercises of devotion and piety owe their value to his unseen fellowship; nor should I hesitate to reckon in the list of his benefits, that continued protection amid the changes and chances of the world, whereby all things are made to work together for the benefit of those who love the Son of God, and who hope for his second appearance. Of this providential guardianship of the church, its duration through the various dangers of eighteen centuries is in itself a proof, if other and more definite instances were wanting, which might suffice most amply to confirm our faith and justify our gratitude. It is a guardianship, too, which, from the testimonies collected in my last discourse, we may, without, I trust, a criminal presumption, ascribe to the especial and definite agency of him, to whose honour these labours are devoted; who is the ruling principle, by whom the Almighty Father disposes of the fates and fortunes of mankind; in whose protection the devout and innocent of every age and country are partakers; whose larger bounty clothes the lilies of the field, and extends the broad shield of omnipotence above the sparrow's wing.

But though, in all these instances of mercy and of power, we have sufficient reason afforded us in Scripture to adore the presence and the bounty of God's Spirit; it is impossible to conceal from ourselves that, so far as this particular promise is concerned, these instances are all inapplicable. While the promise of a Comforter is made to all, its terms are too definite to allow of such inequality in its distribution; and they are terms which, neither the institution of sacramental observances, nor the succession of an apostolical ministry, nor the providential disposal of worldly affairs in favour of the church of Christ, can in themselves be said to fulfil.

The Paraclete, whose advent our Saviour foretold, (under which definite character only we are now considering the Holy Ghost), the Paraclete was "to teach the disciples all things, and bring all things to their memory, whatever Christ had spoken." As the vicar of our Lord, and the advocate of the Christian cause, he was to refute the calumnies to which the Messiah's name had been exposed, and to convict the world of sin in the great controversy between God and his creatures. As doctor and president of the church, he was "to guide" the faithful "into all truth," and he was to "show them things to come."

Now it is plain that, any otherwise than as significant and pious ceremonies, neither baptism nor the eucharist can be said to teach us any thing. And, though it be the office of bishops and presbyters to instruct their weaker brethren, and to guide them, so as far as their own lights extend, into the knowledge of religious truth, yet have not, in these latter ages of the world, either presbyters or bishops any peculiar source of knowledge, which is not accessible to whichever of their hearers shall bestow a similar time and labour in its acquirement. And some instance must be found, in which the Spirit of God instructs the clergy themselves, as he instructed their apostolic predecessors, before they can be allowed to identify, as the Apostles did of old, their canons with the canons of the Holy Ghost; or to maintain, that it is by their agency, that the protection and guidance of the Comforter continue to be afforded to the Christian church.

But there is another and a yet more convincing reason, why neither the sacramental ordinances, nor the appointment and succession of the Christian ministry, can have been intended in our Saviour's promise. They neither of them answer to the character of peculiar privileges; and neither of them can, in point of fact, be considered as emanating from the Holy Ghost in his peculiar character of Paraclete. 1. They are not peculiar nor distinctive marks of Christianity. The rites of baptism and the eucharist (I need hardly recall the circumstances to the memory of my present audience) were ceremonies already not unknown to the Jews, and (excepting in their application to the trinity and the Christian covenant) are rather to be considered as points, in which the followers of Jesus continue to resemble the house of Israel, than as points, wherein we are distinguished from them.

In like manner, the form of ordination, which our Lord employed, the powers conceded, and the duties imposed on the elders of the new covenant, were precisely the same as, from the time of Moses downwards, had belonged to the Scribes and Rabbins of the old; and it has been doubted, by men whose opinions are entitled to no common attention, whether, where Rabbinical imposition of hands had been previously conferred in the synagogue, any second ordination was required or practised, in order to admit a convert to the ministry to the apostolic church.

But whatever degree of weight we may assign to this last hypothesis, (and the foundation on which it stands is, doubtless, too weak to support any very solid superstructure), it is certain, 2dly, that both the sacramental ordinances, and the consecration of the Apostles to their pastoral office, were institutions of the Messiah himself before his final departure from the world, and his triumphant return to the Father. But this final departure, as is evident from the tenour of our Saviour's promise, was to precede the Holy Ghost's great advent in his peculiar character of Paraclete. And it is universally acknowledged, that the completion of this promise did not, in fact, take place till the day of Pentecost, nor till after the Apostles had repeatedly partaken in the spiritual benefits, whatever they are, which are necessarily inherent in the eucharistic banquet, and had, in the ordination of St. Matthias, as one of their number, proceeded to the most solemn exercise possible, of their Rabbinical or Episcopal function. It will be shown, indeed, hereafter, that these several institutions of Christ have all been made subservient to the diffusion or perpetuation of that distinguishing grace after which we inquire; that the peculiar blessing which the Paraclete has dispensed has given an additional value to these previous customs and graces; and that the office of the Christian ministry and the dispensation of the Christian sacraments have derived from this source an efficacy and blessedness to which the corresponding institutions of the Jewish synagogue had, in comparison, a very slender claim. But, from that which I have already urged, it follows that the source of this difference yet remains for us to seek after, and that the benefit, which the Spirit of God was to dispense to the church as its Paraclete, and as the Vicar of the Messiah, was something distinct from the powers communicated to the Apostles of guiding and governing the flock of Christ, or from our mystical fellowship with the same good Spirit in ordination or the sacraments.

To that circumstance of the hypothesis, indeed, which recognizes the Holy Ghost as Patron and Comforter of the Church, in his providential guidance and protection of its temporal interests, the above objections do not, with equal force, apply. This protection, which, while Christ was yet in the world, he himself afforded to his followers, has since, apparently, been afforded by that Spirit of God, who, in elder times, made the mountains plain before the counsels of Zerubbabel; and such protection so perfectly answers to the general character implied by the word Παράκλητος, that I should not, perhaps, have sought elsewhere for the accomplishment of our Saviour's promise, if it were not for the consideration, 1st, That the departure of Christ was not compensated for by the mere continuance of that protection from the third person in the Trinity, which the apostles had already, in yet more ample measure, received from the second in that awful union; 2dly, That the terms of the promise under consideration have no reference, direct or implied, to the temporal and providential guardianship of the Christian community. The providential government and protection of the church is not, then, that particular dispensation of mercy or power, whereby the assurance of our Lord is, in these latter days, accomplished.

Let us proceed, then, to consider, how far its characters correspond with those internal and ordinary influences of the Spirit, by whose fertilizing dews our hearts are softened, and by their mild and gentle beams ameliorated and subdued; which console us under the evils, and correct us amid the dangerous prosperity of the world; which direct our choice to happiness, and strengthen our resolution in the pursuit of that which we have chosen; which rouse us by their wholesome terrors from the swinish lethargy of sin, and rebuke in our awakened soul the no less fatal whispers of despair.

And we shall do well, in this inquiry, to employ no common share of attention and accuracy, in consequence both of the extreme importance of the practical results which it involves, and of the opposite and fatal errors to which an inaccurate conception of the benefits conferred by the Spirit of God, have conducted the enthusiast and the unbeliever.

For with unbelievers the modern Socinian will, in this respect, be, not unjustly reckoned; inasmuch as (disdaining the timid dissent of his more cautious and more learned predecessors of the Rakovian and Batavian schools) he has denied not only the personal existence of Him to whose peculiar agency we ascribe the gift of grace, but that gift itself, by whomsoever dispensed, from which our strength proceeds, and on which our hopes of triumph are founded.

Those illapses of blessedness, that hallowed intercourse with God which unites our spirit to the eternal mind, and which renews the brilliance of our borrowed flame by approaching it to that source of living light whence first its stream proceeded; that life of God in the human soul, which, in every age of Christianity, has cheered the labours of the saint, and revived the hopes of the penitent, are all alike discarded by the modern reformers of our faith, as the dreams of enthusiastic self-conceit, the hyperboles of Monks and Platonists. It may, therefore, be advisable, before we consider the connexion of those aids with the particular promise now under consideration, to show, that such aids are really afforded; and to extricate the definition, which is given of them by the church, from the confused and contradictory circumstances with which it has been encumbered by indiscreet religionists, and which, more, perhaps, than any other cause, have led the Deist and Unitarian altogether to deny that such aids are given to us.

The influence, therefore, of which we now are speaking, is not supposed by rational believers to convey any fresh ideas intuitively to the mind, nor to encroach, even in the smallest degree, on the bounds of miracle or prophecy.

Though distinct, in itself, from all external sources of knowledge and improvement, it is from a reference to the knowledge acquired by such means that its practical advantage is derived: it is a blessing whereby our learning, our pains, and our prayers, are sanctified to our instruction and salvation, not, in itself, a substitute for prayer or pains or learning.

But though such aids and such exertions are not hereby dispensed with, yet, without this gracious influence, such outward helps can, as we believe, avail us nothing. Without that holy energy, which it is in the bosom of God to grant or to withhold, we may vainly study the evidences of religion, and vainly aspire to show forth in our practice the lessons of holiness which our outward ears have imbibed. Where grace is wanting we have neither power nor effectual will to raise our affections beyond the narrow circle of mortality; nor, having once assented to the hopes and precepts of religion, can we retain those hopes and precepts in our minds as a pervading and triumphant principle. This power, then, of desiring, and (so far as guilty but repentant creatures can deserve it) of deserving future glory, we ascribe to the immediate agency of a celestial Spirit on the soul.

I say, his immediate agency; because, as the first and universal principle of nature, and as, on a fixed and general system, dispensing by his will all secondary causes, not only the Unitarian but the philosophic Theist will probably allow that our ideas, our motives, and our affections are regulated by the will and permission of the Almighty.

But, that effect which they ascribe to God through the instrumentality of second causes, and the objects of bodily perception, we are taught by Scripture to impute to a primary and purely intellectual intercourse, which differs only from those aids which were afforded to the ancient Prophets in the comparative frequency of its illapses, and the subject-matter of its communication. A grace it is, which, as distinguished from the inspiration of supernatural knowledge and power, may be defined, perhaps, without impropriety, as the inspiration of religious feeling and recollection.

That an intercourse of this kind may exist to an inconceivable extent between the Maker of the world and his creatures, will be admitted, I apprehend, by all reasonable Theists, to rank, at least, in the number of those moral possibilities, which may be received as facts, on the production of sufficient evidence.

The Theist will allow, that it is as possible that the Supreme Being should direct our minds by an immediate act of his will to the perception of certain important inferences from those objects which are offered to our senses, as that the objects themselves should be so modified by his disposal, as to produce the same concatenation of ideas as their natural and inevitable result. And if the Theist be not a materialist; if we have sufficiently considered the circumstances of our intellectual nature, and the probability that those powers which have no imaginable connexion with the body, belong to something distinct from it, he must admit, that we can form, at least, a notion as clear of the manner in which one intellectual being can make an impression on another, as of the manner in which body and mind can exert a mutual influence. He must acknowledge that it is at least as possible that God should, occasionally, communicate with the souls of his creatures, as that he should, sometimes, affect their material composition.

Nor will the materialism of our modern Unitarians prevent their perceiving that, in the same manner as the Almighty infused into the organic intellect of the ancient Prophets a supernatural acquaintance with truths unknown before; he may, whenever he sees fitting, and by whatever process, infuse into ourselves a clearer perception or a seasonable recollection of those truths which are revealed already. Against the possibility, therefore, of our hypothesis, there is nothing which can be reasonably objected, while all which has yet been urged against its probability or certainty may be reduced to the following assertions; that an interference of this nature is one of which we have no distinct experience; that it is unnecessary, inasmuch as the phenomena ascribed to it may be resolved from other causes, and that it is no where revealed in Scripture.

To the first of these objections an answer is hardly necessary, inasmuch as we are justified, on every principle of reason and revelation, in inferring the reality of an operation from its perceptible effect, even where the act and its agent are, by our present faculties, indistinguishable. But the existence of those effects which we ascribe to grace, the conception, namely, of holy thoughts, and the kindling of religious affections, is fortunately, in itself, no matter of controversy; and, of the only conceivable operations by which this effect can be produced, the one being as possible, at least, as the other, so the question which of the two is most probable, is one which remains to be decided from the evidence produced by their respective advocates.

We are told, however, in the second place, that the habits of Christain faith and virtue may be acquired like any other habits whatever; that it is by evidence and not by feeling that we have been originally converted to the faith; and that the same conviction of the importance and truth of Christianity which a due consideration of those evidences will engender, is sufficient to enforce its doctrines on our practice without any other or supernatural assistance. It is urged, that in worldly interests, we are enabled to postpone the less to the greater advantage without calling down the Holy Ghost from heaven to strengthen us in our resolution; and that there is no more necessity for his assistance to make the scale preponderate in favour of virtue against vice, than on the side of worldly ambition or avarice against the temptations of sloth and sensuality.

Whatever, it has been said, either from prejudice or conviction, is regarded as the chief earthly good of man, will be pursued, for the most part, with sufficient steadiness, notwithstanding all the seductive influence of other and interfering objects. And if we are but as well convinced that the promises and threatenings of Christianity are true as we are that renown and wealth will, in this world, yield us happiness, we shall find our natural perceptions of good and evil, and our natural recollection of principles before received, no less sufficient motives to perseverance in our pursuit of endless life, than we find them now sufficient to support and stimulate our labours after transitory happiness.

But, where supernatural influences are not required, we cannot reasonably expect to receive them; and it is therefore, we are told, improbable and unphilosophical to resort to a special interposition of the Almighty, where the same effect may be reasonably ascribed to natural and external causes.

I have stated this objection with all the force of which it is fairly susceptible, though it will be observed that much of its apparent plausibility in the writings of our religious opponents arises from the dexterous use of two particular epithets, the epithets of "supernatural" and "especial."

In a certain sense these terms are, doubtless, applicable to whatever is not effected by our own bodily or mental powers, or by that chain of external causes which belong to the visible and material world. It is plain, however, that in their popular and usual sense of rare and miraculous interference, they are no more applicable to that influence which we suppose the Almighty ordinarily and usually to exert on the souls of men, than to that which our adversaries are willing to confess he, in the visible world, and through the medium of material agents, exercises on our nerves and senses.

In the definition itself which is usually given of these spiritual interferences, we call them "the ordinary graces of the Holy Ghost;" and (if the Holy Ghost has been correctly stated to be the directing and sustaining Providence of the world) these ordinary graces may, for all which yet appears, extend as widely and act with no less conformity to the general rules of the Almighty's government, than the annual return of the seasons or the rising and setting sun.

Nor, if mind can act on body as well as body on mind, is it possible for us to say to what extent, in the ordinary affairs of life, and in matters which are only incidentally connected with religion, the government of the world itself may be carried on by a similar influence, and the Spirit of the Most High be, more or less, continually present, to direct our attention and determine our choice between the various motives which contend around us for our preference, and the various lines of action to which those motives point the way. The grace, then, of which we speak, may be, in truth, a constituent part of the most extensive and important of all our Maker's dispensations; of that inspecting and corrective care whence the moral world derives its power of controlling and conquering the material creation, and by which and through which all things work together for the welfare of those who love him.

And this may show the weakness of an objection advanced by the same person to whose works I have already frequently referred; that "the agency which is ascribed to God by the sacred writers extends to evil as well as to good;"—that "it hardens the heart of Pharaoh as well as opens that of Lydia, and therefore it is a general and not a particular influence;" and that, "consequently, the popular language of the sacred writers by no means authorizes the conclusion, that God ever interposes supernaturally to produce moral effects on the world."

If it be possible to distribute this elaborate argument according to the usual rules of logical precision, it would form, perhaps, the following syllogism.

Both good and evil are ascribed in Scripture to the influence of God.

But we cannot impute evil to his particular influence.

Therefore, the influence which produces good is not particular, but general.

Now in this argument there are the following radical errors. First, the Unitarian notions of Scripture must, surely, be very different from those which, with the orthodox, render that sacred volume the guide of our lives, and our comfort in the hour of dissolution, if they suppose that any action really and intrinsically evil is therein ascribed to the influence of the Almighty. Undoubtedly, the example which Mr. Belsham produces is by no means sufficient to give rise to an imputation so horrible. The sentence of judicial blindness and abandonment pronounced on the Egyptian tyrant, is not in itself more inconsistent with the goodness of our heavenly Governor, than any other dispensation by which an incorrigible offender is doomed to shame and suffering for the advantage and instruction of the world; or by which the same offender, after sentence has finally gone forth, is prevented from escaping his danger. By those who recollect the opinion of the ancient Jews as to the seat of the rational faculties, to "harden the heart" is readily understood to be nothing else than to confuse the understanding. But surely, when a criminal is reserved for exemplary publishment, it matters little, so far as the individual is concerned, whether the fetters be on his body or his mind; whether he be detained in the captivity of an earthly dungeon, or in the labyrinth of prejudice and foolish hope; whether repentance be rendered vain and escape impossible by the pressure of external circumstances; or whether the yet more awful spectacle be displayed, of rendering the sinner his own executioner, and of depriving (as God is said to do, not only by Jewish, but by heathen moralists) those miserable persons of their natural prudence, whom for their crimes he purposes to destroy. The hardening, then, of Pharaoh's heart may be ascribed (as Moses, doubtless, does ascribe it) to an immediate and particular interposition of Providence, without any even the smallest imputation on the goodness and wisdom of the Most High.

Secondly, I will not insist, (as, nevertheless, it were easy for me to do,) that the distinction supposed in the minor proposition between general and particular providence, when applied to a Being by whom not only the principles of his laws, but the detail of their consequences is known, is altogether futile and unphilosophical. For,

Thirdly, Though we should admit, (which has not as yet been proved,) that the moral evil which exists in the world takes its rise from God's appointment; and though we should also admit that its particular instances flow from some general law of his government, of which the consequences to individuals were, by the Lawgiver, overlooked or unknown; yet still it would by no means follow, that the same analogy will hold with all the particular instances of good which occur in the world's administration.

If a machine be employed to answer a general purpose, are we forbidden, with our own hands, to extricate any unfortunate insect which may have become entangled in it wheels? If not, then surely, though we were to seek the cause of Pharaoh's obstinacy in the general operation of external circumstances, yet might the humble faith of the Roman centurion in the Gospel, and the candid attention of Lydia as recorded in the Acts, be regarded as especial interferences of their eternal Guardian, to deliver them from the natural but fatal effects of early prejudice, or national and official pride.

But, Fourthly, I am loth to impute to our adversaries the practical epicurism of those who would teach that, the machine of events once set in motion, the agency of the Almighty is at an end. They will not, I trust, maintain, that the sabbath of Providence has lasted since man was framed, and that, without any sustaining or superintending care of that goodly system which he has contrived, our Father has left his creatures to float at random down the current of circumstances, and to draw out our blanks and prizes of vice or virtue, happiness or misery, as the wheel of events turns round. With such an error the Socinians are not, I trust, infected; since they admit, in words at least, that an influence or energy of the Almighty "is exerted in every event of life, according to certain rules which God has prescribed to himself."

But would they reduce this energy to a merely colourless fluid, which takes its tint of good or evil from the subjects on which it is successively or severally exerted? Or can they conceal from themselves, that such an influence as is here described is equivalent to no influence at all? Or what definition can these philosophical inquirers produce of that which they call a general providence, if it be not a succession of particular interferences; an influence by certain means and in certain cases exerted, whereby the course of events is varied in our favour, or in order to our punishment, from that natural succession which, without such interference, would have followed?

Were it otherwise, all prayer were vain, whether for temporal deliverance in this world, or salvation in the world to come; and, if vain, superstitious, then, and abominable. For prayer, in its very essence, implies that the object sought for is as yet uncertain; that it is something which we fear to lose, unless it were asked for earnestly from God; something which God may continue to withhold notwithstanding all our warmest devotions, but which without such devotions we cannot reasonably hope to obtain.

It were an impious flattery of our Maker to entreat at his hands those blessings which, whether we prayed for them or no, would be given or withheld indifferently; and, if it be true indeed that "time and chance happeneth to all the sons of men," our Master has but laid on us a fruitless labour in enjoining us to ask for daily bread, for peace, for deliverance from evil.

But if a special interferenee be in any case admissible, is it not, at least, as probable that such divine interposition takes place by mental as by external influence? Is it not as easy to believe that our thoughts are turned to those objects, which, properly employed, may conduce to our advantage, as to expect that the course of external events shall be on our account superseded, or that the properties of the material world are continually altered by our prayers? There have been those (we are taught by an authority which no Unitarian has, as yet, ventured to deny,) who "were saved from their distress when they cried unto the Lord in trouble;" and it is a question which may teach us, at least, humility in our speculative inquiries, whether they were thus delivered by the gift of internal light to avoid their danger, or by the abatement of the dangerous objects themselves.

And if those assertions be correct, which in so many passages of Scripture impute to celestial inspiration, not our virtues only, but our temporal endowments and prosperity; are we blamed for suspecting that the grace which softens our hearts to the impressions of goodness, and which preserves those lessons once inscribed there from the dangers of neglect or temptation, that this grace (so far from being an anomaly in our Maker's government) is, perhaps, the most conspicuous, and surely the most important instance in which that parental love is manifested, which, as it first created, still continues to sustain the universal frame of nature?

Should we concede, then, to the objection of our adversaries, that the habits of religion and virtue are acquired like all other laudable and useful habits, (for every habit of mental exertion, unless when ill directed, is useful, doubtless, and laudable,) it will by no means follow, that the agency of the Holy Ghost is not displayed in the particular instances of repentance and regeneration. The concession may teach us rather to adore his presence in a yet wider range of influence than that which is generally ascribed to him, and to beseech his blessing not only on our almsdeeds and our prayers, but on every other useful and innocent pursuit in which we are occupied. Thrice happy then when all our toils and objects are such as he may favour!

Unhappily, however, it will appear on farther inquiry, that the improvement of the heart is, indeed, attended with more and greater difficulties than any other pursuit or occupation; difficulties so peculiar as to demand at every step a stronger arm than human resolution can supply to support and rein our progress.

Those worshippers of nature who, with so much eloquence, maintain that our innate tendency is, on the whole, to truth and goodness, forget that every act of real virtue implies a degree of self-control, and that every vice is, in itself, an act of indulgence. But, is that condition natural which is accompanied by labour and pain? or can that be considered as any thing else than an innate propensity to evil, to which our bodily constitution inclines us? Do we paint our way to hell as any other than a smooth and downward passage? or, are we so constituted by nature as, like Milton's angels, to ascend with greater facility than we fall?

It is no solid objection to these fatal truths to observe, as has been observed by ancient as well as modern sophistry, that "the childhood of man is playful and comparatively harmless;" that "no man has, at once, attained the summit of wickedness;" that "there is, on the whole, less vice than virtue in the world;" that "we are what God created us."

The first of these is a privilege which we possess in common with the wildest and most ferocious animals, and that the progress of vice is, in maturer manhood, gradual, may be accounted for from very different causes than a natural preference of virtue.

It will be recollected, that from our earliest years, we have all been in a state of severe and unceasing discipline; that, even with those who have been most indulged in their youth and infancy, the habit of obedience to form and the restraint of natural inclination has been induced to a degree which in the case of no other animal but man is practised or practicable; that the control of his passions, to a greater or less extent, is taught, for their own ease and safety, to every child by his parents, and is enforced in every youth by the strong arm of public opinion and public authority. From these restraints emancipation cannot be instantaneous; and so long as any vestige of such chains continues, the recollection of past or the fear of future punishment must necessarily embitter the guilty draught, and strew with thorns the bed of sensual pleasure. The chained lion who has torn a passenger may tremble lest his keeper should return while he devours his surreptitious booty; but will any doubt that the taste of blood is sweet to him? Let them try the experiment, and restore him to his savage freedom!

Though it be true then, which I am not inclined to deny, that the first indulgence in forbidden things is accompanied with doubt and alarm; and though it were proved, which I would to God it were possible to prove satisfactorily, that the balance of good in the present stage of our existence predominates over evil; yet would neither the one nor the other of these admissions affect the general truth of our position, that we are by nature prone to evil. Both the one and the other are sufficiently accounted for by that state of social restraint, which, though it be universal, cannot be regarded as natural; and still more, perhaps, may both be referred to the ameliorating influence of that spirit, to whose blessing, if our faith be true, the Christian should attribute every victory which he gains over himself and his selfish passions.

That we are as God created us, (though so far from being an axiom in revealed or natural religion it has been denied, both in ancient and in modern times, by some of the wisest assertors of both,) that we are as God created us, I am not myself disposed to deny. Without attempting, on the present occasion, to penetrate that mysterious veil which hangs over the original state of man, or the nature and necessary consequences of that offence which was so severely visited on his posterity, it is plain, that how great soever were the privileges which Adam lost by his transgression, yet, whatever propensities to evil we individually bring with us into the world, we bring, at least, by his permission, by whose hands we are made and fashioned.

But will it follow from hence, that God has created man perfect, or that the nature which he has given us is any otherwise good than as it answers a definite purpose? Is it not possible, at least, that the Allwise may have made us weak in order that we might learn humility? That he may have created us prone to sin, and to all the wretched consequences which are the natural effect of such a propensity, in order that we might taste a purer happiness in those sensations of joy and gratitude which are excited by deliverance and mercy, than can ever be the lot of that hopeless and fearless content which belongs to those who have never felt the want of happiness or virtue? What if the universal good be more effectually consulted by the permission of partial evil? And may not the sin and wretchedness of the present world be a necessary feature in the vast scheme of that Providence, whose paternal care extends through infinite space and time? Of physical mischief we can discern the beneficial consequence; why may not moral ill conduce to results yet more glorious?

But, fathomless as are the depths of God's Providence in the permission of evil at all, its existence is, unfortunately, no matter of doubtful speculation. Whether our natural corruption be deduced from Adam's offence alone, or whether the propensity to sin existed in our first parents themselves, before it was called into action by the tempter, our sinful nature is a matter of daily experience; and though we cannot cease to wonder why such things are allowed to be, we cannot, if we are accurate observers, permit ourselves to doubt that such things really are.

And though we should ascribe to ignorance or prejudice the bitter complaints which the contemplation of human weakness has elicited from the heathen moralists; though we should refuse to acknowledge with the Grecian Poet, that "the majority are always wicked," or to complain with Ovid's Medea that "while we see and approve the better course, we are urged by a necessity of our nature to follow that which we ourselves detest and deprecate;" we may admit, nevertheless, that some degree of credit is due to Isaiah, to Jeremiah, to the Psalmist, and to St. Paul, when they severally lament the impiety and ferocity of their contemporaries, when they teach us that the feet of man are swift to shed blood, and his heart deceitful and desperately wicked; that the inhabitants of the world have turned aside together from following after God; that the carnal mind is enmity with him, and neither is nor can be subject to his law.

And, that our human resolution is, without celestial aid, sufficient to preserve us, notwithstanding these natural propensities, in the paths of virtue, can by no means be inferred from the circumstance that these propensities are daily conquered or suppressed in the pursuit of worldly advantages.

For, though the motives for self-controul which true religion offers are, doubtless, of more momentous interest than any which this world can supply, it may admit of rational and serious doubt, whether the proximity of the latter and the more distinct and vivid colouring which, in consequence of that proximity, they offer to the mental view, do not more, much more than counterbalance the awful but remoter prospects of death and judgment and an eternal Being.

It is the faintness of that sensation which hope presents, when compared with that which actually affects our bodily organs, which constitutes, in every pursuit of life, the difficulty of postponing present to contingent happiness; and this faintness will be found to increase in exact proportion as the object recedes into futurity. And as every one who lives is disposed to think that of all his prospects death and its consequences are most distant, it is probable that (however powerful in themselves to move our hope or fear may be those objects which such a prospect offers) their distance or fancied distance will often leave them less efficacy to compel our attention than those expectations of earthly praise or prosperity, which, though of value far inferior, appear at least to promise a more speedy return.

Nor can it be concealed that the conviction which we actually feel of those most awful truths which are the sanctions of religious principle, is, from the nature of things, of a fainter kind than that which we possess of earthly comfort or applause or misery. We have heard or read of hell or heaven, but we have felt the pangs of disease or hunger; we have seen the punishments inflicted by the law; we have witnessed, perhaps with envy, the parade of worldly wealth and power; and our cheek has burned, it may be, with that delightful glow which is communicated by the world's approbation.

The recollections, then, by which faith would, in the hour of temptation, direct our practice, being no more than fainter reflections of images which were originally embodied by fancy, (for on whatever evidence we believe, we can only fancy that which we have never seen,) must needs be less forcible than the memory of that which we have actually in our own persons experienced; and while we believe that the punishments of another world are something terrible, we know the keenness of the tortures which disappointment or disgrace can, in the present world, inflict on us.

Were it otherwise, indeed, the sanction of temporal penalties would have become, since the promulgation of the Gospel, altogether useless among men; and the knowledge of God's will and the apprehension of his justice would have suspended, long since, the axe, the fasces, and the chain, as trophies beside the Christian altar. Unfortunately, however, we cannot avoid observing daily that such restraints are necessary still with those who never doubted the return of Christ to judgment; and the best and the wisest of us all may recollect, perhaps, occasions when his knowledge and his faith and his godly fear would have failed with their united strength to preserve his feet from sliding, if it had not been for the fear of that disgrace or chastisement which, wicked as they are themselves, the commonwealth of mankind by God's appointment continue to inflict on wickedness.

"If, I say, I will speak thus," (said an experienced and inspired observer of the human heart, when describing the blasphemy which arose in his soul against the ways of providence,) "If, I say, I will speak thus, behold I should offend against the generation of thy children." The recollection of the scandal which he should cause to the godly restrained those murmurs which his faith in Providence was unable entirely to quell; nor do those good men display any knowledge of our common nature, who reject as carnal and unholy those secondary and human principles of action, whose aid in the time of his temptation even David would not disdain.

There is yet another reason why the objects of worldly prudence are more easily and, therefore, more steadily pursued by our natural powers than those which Christianity offers. They demand, in general, far fewer sacrifices at our hands. The self-control which avarice enjoins regards our luxury and profusion only. Ambition has only to overcome the fear of death and the feebler snares of idleness: hypocrisy, to avoid those particular gratifications which are scandalous in the eyes of mankind. Nor are any of these any further renounced than as they are inconsistent with the ruling passion; and, what is of still more importance, the self-denial is always understood to be only for a time, and he who now, from some overpowering motive, resists these secondary inclinations, looks forward to a moment when, that previous object being attained, he may enjoy himself without control. Even now they have their refreshments of vice, in which the master-fiend is not unwilling to indulge them. The miser may riot at another's cost; the conqueror, in the intervals of more serious action, while his shield hangs idle in the hall, and his battered galley is repairing on the shore, may strike, like Alcæus, his harp in the shades of revelry, and relax his toil-worn sinews in the lap of licentious indulgence. The hypocrite has a somewhat harder task to perform; but his self-control and his cloak are cast aside together, and he enjoys with a keener zest the moments of permitted sensuality, from the contrast of the cumbrous disguise which he has relinquished.

And by all alike the mighty empire of the heart is left without coertion. Their affections, their hopes, their wishes, their fancies may riot in the boundless scope of possible and impossible gratification, and defy, from that dark and polluted asylum, the menaces of their earthly deities. What wonder, then, that those who have, in other respects, so large a liberty, should, without any great reluctance, offer up at the shrine of their idols those few indulgences which such idols, in truth, require?

But the warfare which the Christian is enjoined to wage with himself is as endless and universal as the platonic strife of principles. It is not sufficient that we purchase by the surrender of a single vice a liberty for every other. It is not enough that we be occasionally abstinent, or that we refrain from overt actions, while the inward corruption remains unheeded and unknown. The free-will offering of ourselves, the subjugation of our entire affections and propensities; the confinement of those thoughts whose wanderings are open to the eyes of him who reads the soul; the government of those winged words over which the angels of vengeance watches; a devotion consistent and uniform; a faith which faileth not; a love which thinketh no evil; a courage which can support the contempt of man, and which can dare to forgive those injuries which to endure is agony; these are the daily struggles to which the Christian soldier is liable, and this the steep and thorny path which only leads to glory!

And, for these things, who is, of himself, sufficient? What knowledge, what faith, what hope or fear shall stimulate our feeble limbs to a task so far beyond their forces, if His power do not sustain us, from whose mercy-seat all power and wisdom flow, who gives us "grace," if we believe his Scriptures, "to help in time of need;" and will not withhold, we learn from the same Divine authority, "His Holy Ghost from those who ask him faithfully."

It may seem, then, that the same surviving chief of English Unitarianism (whom the single circumstances of his being thus conspicuous has compelled me thus frequently to notice) is not more fortunate in his metaphysics than he had previously shown himself in his reference to the ancient Fathers, when he styles the interference of the Almighty with our thoughts and actions "an unphilosophical doctrine." Whether it be, as he supposes, "unscriptural," the following observations may enable my audience to form a judgment.

That the assistance of God is, in some shape or other, accorded both to excite and sustain the natural feebleness of our exertions in the cause of holiness, is apparent from several passages in Scripture. Before Lydia could receive the Gospel, it was needful that God should "open her heart:" it was "the Lord," who "added daily to the Church of the apostles such as should be saved." But not only the commencement of our Christian calling, but its furtherance by our perseverance in the duties of our profession, is ascribed by St. Paul to Him, "who, having begun a good work in us, bringeth the same to an end:" and who, as the same apostle elsewhere expresses himself, "both worketh in us to will and to do of his good pleasure."

On the abuse of this doctrine, for as such I cannot but consider it, which Augustin appears to have introduced into the Church, and which, though both Romish and Protestant Doctors are divided on the question, is among the latter more frequently known by the name of Calvinism, I shall have occasion to speak hereafter. At present I need only observe, that such deductions, even if they necessarily flowed from the doctrine of spiritual influences, could not be safely urged against it by the modern Unitarian, since they apply with, at least, an equal force, against his own hypothesis as to the predisposition of events and causes, in whose inextricable chain we are necessarily, no less passive than the component parts of a cotton-mill.

And with whatever indignation the Fatalists may disclaim the system of absolute decrees, it is evident that the effect is the same, whether the character of each individual be, from all eternity, elected, or condemned to holiness or vice by the immediate agency of God's Spirit; or whether the same character be destined to receive its tincture from the circumstances through which it must inevitably pass, and of which the brighter or darker hues no less necessarily communicate themselves to the mind, than the ingredients of a dye determine the colour of the web which is immersed in it. The only difference seems to be, that the Unitarian ascribes to the action of a machine those dispensations in which the Calvinist contemplates the immediate hand of the Almighty; but both the first as well as the second (unless he be really disposed to install the Aristophanic "vortex" in the room of Jupiter) must, in consistency with his principles, ascribe to the absolute power of God, whatever God is supposed, whether mediately or immediately, to perform.

But, further, not only are our birth and growth in holiness imputed in Scripture to the preventing and furthering grace of God: this grace is, moreover, expressly identified with the grace or assistance of that same Holy Ghost, by whose agency the Prophets were taught futurity, and from whom and by whom the Apostles gained their knowledge of the will and Gospel of the Lord. "Thy Spirit is good," are the words of David when praying for power to amend his life; "lead me to the land of uprightness!" "Uphold me," are the words of the same illustrious penitent, "with thy free (or liberating) Spirit!" Not only are "counsel and knowledge" ascribed by Isaiah to the Spirit's operation, but "the fear," moreover, "of the Lord." Christ in like manner assures us, that his Father will not deny "the Holy Ghost to those who ask him" faithfully. The conscience of St. Paul "bare him witness in the Holy Ghost." "The Holy Ghost," as the Giver of virtue, is reckoned up by the same Apostle, in the same breath with "kindness and brotherly love." To the influence of the Spirit, not only "knowledge," but "faith" and "patience" are ascribed. It is through "the Spirit" that we are enabled to "mortify the works of the flesh;" and the same Spirit is said, by inspiring our souls with fervour and holy desires, to intercede for us with "unutterable groanings."

But, that it is a sanctifying and improving grace, and not the grace of miraculous knowledge or power, which is to be understood in these expressions, is apparent from their general tenor. Miraculous power and knowledge can neither set us free from sin, nor are able, of themselves, to make us holy. Those cannot be miraculous gifts which our Saviour, in a discourse not directed to his Apostles alone, but to the mighty multitude who attended his preaching on the mount, engages to accord to all who ask them. With the testimony of a good conscience the power of tongues or prophecy has no imaginable concern. The gifts of kindness, of patience, of brotherly love, were so far from being implied in the possession of those miraculous endowments which the early Christians enjoyed, that it was possible to possess these last in their highest perfection, and yet to perish for want of the grace of charity; while the tumultuous inspiration and factious wonders of the Corinthian Church may prove that (far from being necessarily productive of peace and holiness) such lofty distinctions were often by the perverseness of their possessor, themselves converted into a snare. Had Balaam been no prophet, he would have escaped, at least, one fatal temptation to disobey the Lord; and St. Paul required, we know, a keen though a merciful chastisement, lest his human pride should be exalted above measure, through the dazzling abundance of his revelations.

Since, then, the gifts of holiness and peace are entirely different from the gift of miraculous power, while yet both the one and the other of these are imputed in Scripture to the Holy Ghost; the one of two conclusions must, I apprehend, inevitably follow; either that both the one and the other are produced by a similar operation on the mind; or else that they are distinct operations of the same personal agent, the everlasting Spirit of God.

And, of these admissions, either is sufficient for the purpose of my present argument. Either is sufficient to prove that the influence of the Holy Ghost, however we define him, (on which point, however, my previous Lectures have, I trust, left little difficulty,) is productive of and necessary to produce, not only the extraordinary powers but the ordinary graces of the Christian Church and character. From his bounty we derive alike those rare endowments which fall to the lot of a very few, in order that the remainder may, by their means, be edified, and those not less blessed though, perhaps, less brilliant aids, which, though they do not qualify us to perform, on earth, the distinguished parts of Prophets or Evangelists, are a necessary preparation for those far nobler privileges in whose meridian splendour both prophecies shall cease, and tongues shall fail, and knowledge shall vanish away!

Whether these sacred influences be they of which the gift hath entitled the Holy Ghost to the character of the Christian Paraclete, must remain for future inquiry.

LECTURE VI.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

It was my endeavour, when I last addressed you, to remove those doubts and to refute those cavils which the disciples of modern Unitarianism have suggested against the usual faith which Christians hold in the ordinary and sanctifying influence of the Spirit of God.

But, however certain and however valuable those blessed aids may be, which support us, as we believe, through the perils and the snares of life, and, in the hour of death, as we hope, will not forsake us, it will by no means follow, that it is by these definite influences that the Holy Ghost still manifests himself to the Christian world, as the performer of our Saviour's promise. To entitle them to this distinction it is necessary, first, that they should correspond with the description of the Comforter's office as afforded us by Christ himself; and, secondly, that they should answer to the necessary characteristics of a compensation for the loss of Christ, and a privilege peculiar to his followers.

It is evident, however, that in the description of the Paraclete, as given by our Lord himself, there are many circumstances, which (without a degree of enthusiasm, whereof all existing sects of Christians, I believe, are guiltless) we cannot refer to the internal and ordinary influence of the Holy Ghost.

By its agency on the natural faculties of the soul, that influence, indeed, supplies us with recollections ever seasonable to support or to subdue our weak or rebellious nature; it hallows our thoughts by attracting them to hallowed objects; it strengthens our virtuous resolutions by renewing on our mind those impressions which gave them birth; it elevates our courage and humbles our pride by suggesting to our recollection, at once, our illustrious destiny and the weakness of our unassisted nature.

By itself it teaches nothing, but without its aid all human doctrine is but vain. It is this which gives life and strength to every religious truth which we hear; this which imprints on our soul and recalls to our attention those sacred principles to which our reason has already assented. Distinct from conscience, but the vital spark by which our natural conscience is sanctified, it both enables us to choose the paths of life, and to persist in those paths when chosen: and, though, like the free and viewless air, it is only by its effects that we discern it, it is the principle of our moral as the air of our natural health; the soul of our soul, and the Schekinah of our bodily temple.

But, by itself it teaches nothing. It prepares our hearts, indeed, for the word of life, and it engrafts the word in our hearts thus opened; but that living word and whatever else of knowledge we receive must be drawn from external sources. "Faith," we are told, "must come by hearing, and hearing by the word of God;" nor can we hear "without the voice of a preacher."

The inspiration (as we have already defined it) of religious perception and memory, God's ordinary grace induces the soul to behold the truth of those doctrines which external opportunities of knowledge offer to her understanding; it preserves and refreshes in her memory those principles of action, of which we have already perceived the force; it is the blessing of God and his pervading energy, which prospers to our salvation what we learn and what we have learned: but when we pass beyond these limits, we invade the regions of miracle and prophecy; and it is no less inaccurate to suppose, that in the ordinary course of things we receive a new idea from the grace of God, than it would be to maintain that our knowledge is derived from the lamp which lights our study.

Like that lamp, the grace of the Most High enables us to trace, in the oracles of salvation, the things which belong to our peace: like that lamp, it helps us to renew the decayed impression of knowledge long since obtained; and, without such heavenly aid, the unassisted soul would be as unequal to the pursuit or perception of her eternal interests, as the unassisted eye to read in darkness. But, whether by celestial or earthly delight, we can only learn from that which is before us; and the one can no more be said to communicate a new revelation to our souls, than the other to place a fresh volume on our table.

I do not say, that grace does not possess an active power, which not only enables us to attend and recollect, but frequently compels our attention and recollection. Nor am I rash enough to deny, that God may, by any operation or any medium whatever, communicate to our souls, when he thinks proper, any imaginable, or, to us at present, unimaginable knowledge. But this may be without offence maintained, (and I am the more anxious to state it clearly, because it is this particular point on which enthusiasm is most frequently mistaken,) that it is by the illustration, not the revelation of truth, that God's Spirit ordinarily assists us; and that the latter is one of those cases of divine interference, of which neither the present age of Christianity, nor, perhaps, any preceding age since the time of the Apostles, affords us an authentic example.

That measure, then, of internal aid, which the modern Church receives, can neither be said to "teach us all things," nor to "show us things to come." And with as little reason can the Holy Ghost be asserted to bear public "witness" of Christ, and to plead against the world as the patron and advocate of Christ's religion, by an influence which is, confessedly, thus gentle and unseen. With the exception, indeed, of that which the circumstances of the whole discourse seem evidently to appropriate to the Apostles; the recollection, namely, of "all the words" which our Lord "had spoken unto them;" no single characteristic can be found in the description of the ancient Paraclete, which corresponds with those illapses of ordinary grace which the modern believer hopes and prays for.

We may reasonably, then, conclude, that some other benefit than the internal aid of the Holy Ghost was intended by our Lord in his memorable conversation with the Apostles.

And this conclusion will receive no small additional strength from a reference to those general principles which were, I trust, sufficiently established, in the commencement of my preceding Lecture.

It was there laid down, from the nature of our Lord's declaration, and from the circumstances under which that gracious declaration was made, that the comfort which the Holy Ghost should dispense, on his behalf, to his followers, must have been an advantage confined to his followers alone; a blessing enjoyed neither by the Heathen nor the Jew; a blessing unknown to the Apostles themselves at the moment when their Master thus addressed them.

And this necessity, though it has never, that I know of, been clearly stated before, has, nevertheless, been virtually admitted by the greater part of those who content themselves with the usual exposition of Christ's assurance. They have esteemed it the peculiar happiness of the Christian Church, above the condition either of Jews or Heathens, that not only are we instructed in the perfect will of God, but that we are spiritually assisted in its performance; and, identifying the gift of the Spirit with the process of regeneration, they have confined its influence to those alone who are purified with the waters of baptism.

It has been a subject, indeed, of long and angry discussion, whether (admitting, as both sides have admitted, the inseparable union of the gift of the Spirit and regeneration) the former were accorded to all who received the outward sign of the latter; or, whether both were the peculiar treasure of a far less numerous body than the outwardly baptized, the invisible Church of Jesus. But, whether the promise was given to the professors of our faith in general, or solely to those who are turned in their hearts and conversations from darkness to light, in either acceptation it has been supposed to belong to Christians only; and the majority of mankind have been allowed no other assistant in the performance of their duty than the natural light of reason.

If, however, the ordinary gifts of the Spirit were peculiarly appropriate to Christians, the question would naturally arise, and it is a question which either Arminian or Calvanist would find it a task of no small difficulty to elude or satisfy,—"By what means are men enabled to become members of the body of Christ?"

If grace be conferred on the faithful only, then must a previous belief be necessary to the reception of grace; and the faithful, before they can have obtained such inward help from heaven, must first, by their natural strength, have believed.

And this, we know, was the opinion of the more moderate followers of Pelagius; of the early Socinians of the Rakovian school; and, as may be suspected from a remarkable passage in his first book against Pelagius, of him who in every other point was orthodox, the learned and excellent Jerome. It is an opinion, however, directly contrary, not only to the acknowledged tenets of that Church to which we have sworn allegiance; but, which is of an importance far more awful, to the most pointed expressions of Scripture, which teach us, that without the grace of God, no man can come to Christ; nor, consequently, receive his Gospel. But if these sacred truths be conceded by the defenders of the popular hypothesis, they will find themselves involved in the hopeless absurdity of regarding faith as the cause or occasion of grace, and grace the cause of faith; or, in other words, of making the same thing the cause and effect, the antecedent and consequent. Nor will their statement become less defective, if we admit the distinction usual with divines between preventing and assisting grace, of which the one precedes, the other follows the mental action of belief in the Gospel.

For, if the first of these be limited, as the natural meaning of the term should seem to limit it, to the implanting in our mind those good desires which cannot be brought to effect without the subsequent furtherance of the other, it is plain that preventing grace by itself could do no more than induce in our hearts a perception of the happiness enjoyed by the faithful, a desire that God would help our unbelief; but could not, without additional help from the same good Spirit, conduct us either to external confession or hearty internal conviction of the truth which is in Christ Jesus.

So that to the very act of faith itself, even to the lowest degree of faith, both species of grace are necessary; and the reasoning of those who maintain that the assistance of the Holy Ghost is, at once, the cause and the privilege of Christianity, must remain as inconsistent as ever.

It will be urged, indeed, by some, and their method of stating the question is free, apparently, from the objections to which the ordinary hypothesis is liable, that, though faith be of grace and not grace of faith, yet is faith in Christ, with all the blessed fruits which spring from it, inseparably connected with grace as its sure and necessary consequence; and that, therefore, Christians only receive the help of the Holy Ghost, because such help is given to none who are not, thereby, irresistibly called to Christianity.

But, if we avoid, by this statement, the inconsistency of the usual opinion, we avoid it only by incurring the yet more portentous contradictions which are involved in the system of Augustin, Bradwardine and Calvin.

For, as none have, without the aid of the Holy Ghost, received the religion of Jesus, so if, as they maintain, none have received the Holy Ghost, excepting those who are thereby inevitably conducted to embrace the Gospel, it will follow, not only that these last have believed in Christ in consequence of an irresistible act of the Almighty, but that all who have rejected him have chosen thus unhappily, not from perverseness, but because they could not possibly have chosen otherwise; not from wilful obstinacy, but from a blindness which it was no more in their power to remedy, than, by their unassisted strength, to scale heaven.

And, if it be further true, which is allowed on all hands, that the rejection of the Gospel by the unconverted Jews and Heathens was imputed to them by God as, in itself, a heinous sin, and will be punished with more grievous damnation; that conclusion must follow which every modern Calvanist at least, with amiable inconsistency, disclaims, not only that the Almighty punishes men for rejecting what they had no power to accept, but that he offers (I almost fear to speak it, but it is necessary that the natural tendency of every doctrine should be known) salvation to the reprobate on terms which they cannot accept, in order that, by this, their seeming refusal, he may obtain a pretext for punishing them more severely.* A statement this, which involves in itself, as applied to the Father of truth and mercy, a degree of blasphemous extravagance which can hardly be conceived without impiety; which imputes to God a conduct from which the warmest defenders of the hypothesis would, in their own persons, have shrunk with abhorrence, and which the angels who excel in power and might, would hardly have brought as a railing accusation against the enemy of God and man himself!

But if, to avoid or to soften this horrible corollary, we suppose with Owen, that those miserable persons to whom the gospel is a savour of death are punished, not because they were unable to believe and repent, but because they did not desire to do so, that they loved the darkness to which they were condemned, more than the light into which they had no possible hope of entering; it may be urged in reply, that to be content with an inevitable condition, is a part rather wise than wicked; and that if it was in their power to love the light, it was in their power to choose between the light and the darkness.

For it is allowed on all hands, that the obstacle which condemns the reprobate to impenitence is seated in their will alone; and that, if they heartily desire to devote themselves to the service of Christ, that merciful Redeemer will in no wise cast them away.

If Owen, therefore, teaches that the reprobate may choose between light and darkness, he must either mean that they have, without grace, power to make their option, (an assertion which is Pelagianism no less explicit than that which called forth the bitterest censures of Augustin,) or else, that grace is given them which they may optionally resist or improve to salvation:—an admission altogether inconsistent with a belief in absolute decrees, and sufficient in itself to prove, that the assistance of the Holy Ghost is not a peculiar privilege of the gospel.

For if none are punished for not performing impossibilities, and if some are punished for refusing to receive the gospel of Christ, it is plain, that such sufferers must at one time have had it in their power to avail themselves of that gracious offer. But this is a power which is only conferred by the influence of God's Spirit; and it follows that his influence is bestowed on some who neither are nor ever will be Christians.

Nor must we suppose that this influence is, as Clagett seems to intimate, attendant only on the immediate hearing of the gospel; and given to be resisted or improved by those individuals alone to whom the glad tidings of salvation have extended.

If we do not maintain, with Pelagius, that our unassisted nature can quicken itself to faith and everlasting life, we cannot allow, what St. Paul expressly teaches, that the Patriarchs and ancient Israelites are fallen asleep in hope, unless we at the same time allow, that those worthies of the elder world had obtained the same graces of the Holy Ghost, as those by the assistance whereof we hope to imitate their righteous and memorable examples.

Nor can any reader of those sacred poems which, though composed under the law, express, in almost every line, those feelings and virtues, which it is the end of the gospel to developе, entertain a doubt that the operations of grace, whereby the psalmist was awakened, and purified, and guided, and established in holiness, were the same with those to which we daily look up for help and hope and victory. Nor, though we should omit or neglect the testimonies of the later Rabbins, who ascribe, like ourselves, all goodness to the Spirit's dispensation, can we venture to disregard the authority of our Lord himself, who, under the yoke of the Law, and long before the Paraclete was foretold, assured the multitude of his hearers, that his Father would not deny the Holy Spirit to those who asked him.

It is true, indeed, as the admirable Bishop Bull inculcates, that these spiritual gifts, like the gifts of pardon and salvation, though they extended to those under the Law of Moses, were not derived from the Law itself, but were purchased by that foreseen expiation of sins on the rock of Calvary, whereof the blood and the merits gave efficacy to the sacrifice of Abel, and won a pardon for the deep offence of David. But the assertion, however true in itself, is irrelevant to the present inquiry, since I am not maintaining, that the power of repentance is given to man through any other than the merits of Jesus Christ; but I am urging, that through those merits the ancient Jews received it as well as the Christians, and that the promise of a Comforter, which had respect to a future and peculiar benefit, could not be fulfilled by the continuance of an ancient and general blessing.

Nor would this conclusion be materially affected, though we should also grant, as the same learned Prelate supposes, and as in itself is not improbable, though it be not revealed in Scripture with sufficient clearness to enable us to assent to it with unqualified conviction; that, not only the external motives to holiness, (which are irrelevant to the present inquiry,) but the internal and sanctifying Spirit, whereby such motives and knowledge are improved to individual salvation, has been given in more ample measure to the Christian than to the Jew. For a difference simply modal was surely not described by our Lord as an advent of the Spirit in a new and unknown character; and the gift of a new privilege is no less distinct from the improvement of one possessed already, than the plantation of a tree is different from its silent growth when planted.

But the ordinary graces of the Spirit were not confined to the house of Israel alone. The Heathens themselves, as may be proved, both from heathen and sacred testimony, were by no means utterly devoid of them. In support, however, of this assertion, and, since the case of these last is, doubtless, extremely different from the cases of the Jews and ancient Patriarchs, it will be necessary, and it is not impossible to demonstrate, first, that the circumstances in which they were placed were not different from those under which the Holy Ghost is actually promised; and, secondly, that they have evinced the reality of such assistance by the only proof of which the fact is ordinarily capable.

And here it will, in the first place, be readily conceded, that though we presume not to limit the undeclared and uncovenanted mercies of the Most High, yet, in the ordinary course of his dealings with mankind, and, so far as those dealings are made known to us in the sacred writings, there must be always premised a certain portion of external information, without which those internal suggestions of which we are speaking can have no previous principles to which to refer, no data on which to operate.

It is true, and it should never be forgotten, that as the Spirit of God is the governing providence of the world, the Disposer of all earthly occurrences; so the outward means of knowledge and of grace, no less than the spirit of internal improvement, are accorded to us by the same free bounty. But, where the first of these is denied, we cannot perceive by any light either of nature or revelation how the second is to act on the soul. For as grace (this ordinary grace at least) of itself teaches nothing; for, if it did, it would, as we have already seen, be no less than miraculous inspiration: it must ground, as is plain, its awakening and supporting faculty on a reference to previous knowledge. And, consequently, before we can assign to the heathen world the inspiration of attention and of memory, it will be necessary to show that such a knowledge was accorded them concerning the source and measure of their duty, as, when faithfully received and recollected seasonably, might enable them to render an acceptable service to their almighty Creator and Redeemer.

Now that degree of previous knowledge on which a justifying faith may be founded, is, in the case of Enoch, stated by St. Paul to be the knowledge of God's being and attributes. "He that cometh to God must first believe that he is, and that he is the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." Unless, then, it can be satisfactorily shown, that the heathen had a knowledge of God, and that they believed in his justice and his power to reward men according to their works, it is apparent that, the foundation not being laid, we may vainly look for a superstructure; and that, so far as the lights extend which are supplied by God in the sacred Volume, we must not venture to ascribe even their fairest outward actions to the ordinary assistance of God's grace. And if, on the other hand, it shall appear, that the heathen did really possess even this, the lowest rank of religious information, it is no less evident that we cannot, if we assent to the authority of the Epistle to the Hebrews, deny them the possibility at least of receiving the further aids of the Holy Ghost.

For when the Apostle tells us, that without this knowledge, or lowest degree of faith, no man can come to God, he evidently implies, at the same time, the reverse of this proposition, and teaches us, that where this knowledge and faith are possessed, a man may come to God, and like Enoch, please him. Whether Enoch himself were better taught, is a question which I need not now examine; and, however probable in itself, is that which is neither told us by St. Paul, nor was, perhaps, revealed to him. But St. Paul is reasoning from the fact of Enoch's acceptance with God, that he must have enjoyed a saving knowledge of him; and, consequently, the limits, at which he fixes the extent of such a knowledge, must needs have been, how barely soever, sufficient, in his opinion, to conduct its possessor to Paradise.

But we know that a man cannot come to God except God draw him; that he cannot please God, nor persevere in holiness, excepting he have the gift of God's good Spirit, and it must therefore follow, that the mere belief in a Deity, in his justice, his mercy, his power, is sufficient to entitle him to the visitation and comfort of grace, and to raise him, through grace, to a share in the mercies of Christ, and to the inheritance of the Christian heaven.

It remains then to be proved, that this knowledge was really possessed by those ancient heathen nations, of which, as we are best acquainted with their history and writings, we are enabled to speak with greatest certainty; and which, as they extended over the most populous and civilized countries of the world, may be regarded as no insufficient specimen of the general condition of mankind before the Messiah's coming, no less than of those to whom from remoteness of situation or from other causes not imputable to themselves, the light of the gospel has not hitherto arisen in glory. And, if there be any tribes so savage as not to have attained the degree of religious knowledge which the Greeks and Romans enjoyed, we may leave, without alarm, a proportion so trifling to the indulgence of him from whose care neither idiots nor madmen are rejected; and with whom, we may be sure, external impediments are as ample an excuse as natural incapacity, for the ignorance of good and evil.

That the ancient heathens acknowledged a divinity, the Creator and Governor of the world, it would be, before my present audience, a presumptuous waste of time to demonstrate at the length to which the subject would naturally carry me. By Plato the creation and directing care of the world are repeatedly and expressly ascribed to him. By Aristotle his unity, his excellence, his omnipotence, and eternal activity, are, with yet more precision of language, asserted and maintained. The same exalted notions of the divine nature are inculcated in the preface to the Locrian Code, and the various Pythagorean fragments preserved by Stobæus. Of Seneca, and of Thales, as quoted by Cicero, the opinions are sufficiently known, as well as the testimony of Menander reprobating the idolatry of his countrymen, and instructing them that God is "every where, and that he beholdeth all things." And, though the Epicurean taint be sometimes, unfortunately, visible in the philosophical writings of Cicero; yet, in the midst of all his contradictions and inconsistencies, though the faith of the moralist himself may frequently, perhaps, be questioned; yet is it apparent, that the public decency and established opinion of his time, (and they are the sentiments of the people at large, not those of a single sceptical statesman, which I am here concerned to vindicate), forbade him to deny, in express words at least, the existence of a Being such as is here represented.

And that the God whom the heathen thus acknowledged as supreme was, in truth, the same with him whom all nature ought to reverence, is apparent not only from the propriety of their notions respecting his nature and attributes, but from the infallible testimony of St. Paul.

That great Apostle of the Gentiles came not, if we believe his own express declaration, to reveal to them a new divinity, but that God, whose existence their poets and their sages had taught, and whom they had themselves, in former ages, however ignorantly, worshipped. He acknowledges that, among the darkest heathen, the Almighty had not left himself without a witness; and while, in the person of a jealous Hebrew, he lays to the charge of the Gentile world that they glorified not God as became his nature, he admits, at the same time, and he grounds the criminality of their conduct on this admission, that they were not without a knowledge of God.

And, grievously as we must deplore the apparently universal prevalence of idolatry and its consequent vices among them, yet must we, at the same time, remember, that a similar depravation of manners had, not unfrequently, threatened the extinction of religious truth among the ancient Israelites themselves.

Amid the apostasy of these last, however, the Almighty failed not to preserve a remnant: and a similar remnant, as is apparent by the works of their leading philosophers, had been also preserved among the heathen.

The heathen, therefore, imperfect as was the glimpse which they continued to enjoy of the true God, his nature, and his attributes, were at no time so entirely blind as to be deprived of that saving degree of knowledge which is the necessary groundwork for internal grace; and the apparent and shining virtues of many among their number are an argument that such grace was sometimes not denied them. From its fruit the tree is recognized; and not only by the authority of the gospel, but by the admission of the best and wisest among the pagans themselves, are we taught that our mortal nature cannot, without the inspiration of God, be quickened to acts of noble self-denial or to sentiments of genuine morality.

It is unnecessary, and it would be presumptuous, to recal your attention to those maxims and precedents of heroic excellence with which our childhood and our youth are chiefly conversant; those lessons from which, next to the sacred oracles themselves, we form our tempers and enlarge our understandings. But I may be allowed to observe, what is not so generally noticed, that, like ourselves, the sages and heroes of antiquity were accustomed to ascribe whatever of either good or great or wise was found among men, to the influence of a present and pervading Deity.

The comedian Epicharmus, in a remarkable fragment preserved by Clemens Alexandrinus, describes that inspiration of wisdom which proceeds from God, as the source of all truth and of all knowledge necessary to man. Menander taught his countrymen, that "God himself is the understanding of the virtuous. The Theages and Epinomis of Plato inculcate the necessity of the Divine assistance and blessing on our endeavours, in terms little different from those which a Christian would employ in speaking of grace. Even Cicero expressed his own opinion, or the opinion of his countrymen, when he observed, that no man could attain to excellence "without a certain divine inspiration;" and the expressions of Seneca on this subject may be read with improvement and delight, by the most rational and pious among Christians.

"God is present with us," are his words to Lucilius; "he is with thee, he is within thee. This I say, Lucilius; a holy Spirit dwelleth within us, of our good and evil works the observer and the guardian. As we treat him, so he treateth us; and no man is good except God be with him. Can any rise above external fortunes, unless by his aid? He it is from whom every good man receiveth both honourable and upright purposes."

And is it possible that sentiments thus pious and rational should be founded in superstition or delusion? Can carnal pride or earthly wisdom have prompted confessions almost evangelical? Or shall we esteem it a sinful feeling which induced these noble heathens to refer to the giver of goodness those sentiments and actions from which Christians might take example? Οὐκ ἔστιν οὐκ ἔστιν ἄτερ πνεύματος! It cannot have been flesh and blood which revealed to them their dependance on the Deity: in the wreck of our nature, this fragment of God's image has not utterly fallen from its shrine; and, as the beams of day enliven those with their warmth whose dimmer eyes cannot receive their perfect glory, so must that Spirit, whose name the Gentiles knew not, have girded them with secret blessedness.

It is urged, however, on the other hand, and the objection is as old as the time of St. Augustin, that the seeming virtues of the heathen were prompted by human motives only, and not from any desire of pleasing God, or from any practical application of that degree of knowledge, which they cannot be denied to have possessed respecting him. But it is one of the most generally acknowledged positions in Christian ethics, that the searcher of our hearts does not form his judgment of our conduct by the outward action only, but by the fountain, yet more, from which those actions flow. And it will follow, that a seeming good deed, if it be secretly prompted by self-interest, or passion, or pride, so far from being lovely in the eyes of an Omniscient Being, may, in proportion to the sordid nature of its motives, and not without a reference to the hypocrisy wherewith those motives are concealed, be an object of indignation and punishment. And this may explain the apparently harsh assertion of Augustin, that "the virtues of the heathen were only sins;" and may fully justify the more guarded censure conveyed in the thirteenth article of our church, on "works done before the grace of Christ, and the inspiration of his Spirit."

If, therefore, the apparent virtues of the heathen can be traced to impure or earthly sources, it is obviously worse than idle to adduce such counterfeits of heroism as proofs that they had the help of God's grace: and it behoves us to inquire by every light in our power, whether the principles of action by which these ancient worthies were swayed, were really the same with those which only can proceed from celestial inspiration; a desire, that is, to serve and please the Almighty, and a practical faith that he is the "rewarder of such as diligently seek him."

But, that we cannot, without a gross defect in that charity which "hopeth all things," deny that such a principle was to many, at least, of their actions, the main and master spring, is apparent from the assertions of their poets as well as their philosophers, who had no interest in ascribing to their countrymen and contemporaries a motive with which no heart could sympathize, nor could have themselves conceived or described a motive of which their own hearts were altogether insensible.

The decrepid husbandman, who could not himself hope to reap the harvest of his toil, was content, as we are assured by the Roman moralist, to "labour for the gods who never die."

To Plato, to Pindar, to the Grecian comic writers, the idea of a future retribution seems to have been ever awfully present. "There is a God," saith the captive in Plautus, by whom our words and actions are both heard and seen; it shall go well with him who deserveth well, and he who doeth evil shall receive the like again:" and the fear of those gods "by whom our good and evil deeds are remembered," was the argument which Virgil supposed best qualified to soften the hearts and conciliate the hospitality of a barbarous and suspicious people.

Nor is that true, which has been sometimes asserted in the ardour of speculative controversy, that these motives of action, or the future life on which, mainly, they depend, were involved by the heathen in the gloom of their sacred colleges; that they were the suspicions of their priests and sages only, or revealed, at times, and sparingly, to the perishing multitude, through the "ivory gate" of symbolical ceremonies, and under the sanction of mysterious secrecy.

The creed of poetry is always the creed of the vulgar. The lofty strains of Pindar resounded through the streets of Elis and Corinth, and amid the promiscuous and crowded solemnities of republican festival. Menander was the darling of the Athenian stage: and the hymn which placed Harmodius in the green and flowery island of the blessed, was chanted by the potter to his wheel, and enlivened the labours of the Piræan mariner.

And, as their professed incentives to virtue were thus perfectly consistent with the expectation of spiritual aid; so were there many of their habitual actions which would have been utterly preposterous, if they had not originated in a faith that God rewardeth those who diligently seek him.

If the continence of Scipio, if the generosity of Aristides, if the noble self-devotion of Socrates to what he regarded as the will of heaven, be deduced (as heaven forbid they should be deduced!) from the whispers of ambition or of policy; yet to what exciting cause, if not to a dependance on Providence, can we ascribe the prayers and sacrifices of antiquity? Institutions these, however obscured by superstitious pollution or misdirected to false and foul divinities, which intimate, nevertheless, in their very essence and necessary elements, a sense of guilt, a desire of expiation, a confidence in that mercy whose everlasting gates are open to receive the penitent. And, that some at least of the sacrifices offered by the heathen, were not offered to evil or imaginary beings; that there were not wanting those, in ancient times, who regarded the several greater divinities of Polytheism as only different titles of the One Supreme; that, with by far the greater portion of the multitude themselves, an awful distinction was made between the father of gods and men and the herd of subaltern immortals; that, lastly, the name itself of Jupiter or Jove is, probably, nothing more than a corrupt pronunciation of Jehovah; as Cudworth and others have long since elaborately shown, I need do no more than call to your recollection. Nor can it be doubted, that the common faith in a God and the universal institution of sacrifice are alike the relics of that primeval and patriarchial religion, whose altars have smoked wherever man has passed to raise them; and which was appointed as a pledge of expected salvation, not to the Jews alone, but to every descendant of Adam.

Nor can we reasonably doubt that symbols of expiation, originally appointed or approved by the Holy Ghost, were available and helpful even to those who obeyed the form without understanding its inward mystery; who sought atonement for sin through the blood of unoffending animals, though they were ignorant of the one great sacrifice of which their hecatombs were types and shadows.

The Jews themselves, to whose holocausts we cannot deny a reflected efficacy, were, notwithstanding, if we rely on the accordant authority of the whole New Testament, little better acquainted than the Gentile world with those destined sufferings of the Messiah, to which their symbols bore a prophetic reference. Nor, has any reason as yet been offered, why the ignorant Gentile might not, as well as the ignorant Israelite, derive imparted blessedness from a faithful though unskilful use of those appointed means of grace which were ordained because of offences, till that seed should come on whom the offences of the world were laid.

Between a type, indeed, and a sacrament, as the one is a shadow of good things to come, the other a representation or memorial of good things already received, the distinction is of the same kind as that which exists between a prophecy and a history, of which the latter is nothing if it be not intelligible and actually understood; but the former may be faithfully and profitably used by those by whom its secret meaning is either utterly unknown, or, at best, very imperfectly comprehended. Thus, if the narrative of Moses were, as some have fancied, allegorical, it would, doubtless, be to those who knew not its hidden meaning a vehicle of falsehood only; but the Apocalypse of St. John may be studied with instruction, (and a blessing is promised to those who meditate its prophecies), though they should understand erroneously, or not attempt to understand at all the several events which are therein mysteriously shadowed, contented with that general certainty which it every where inculcates, of the providential care extended over good men, and the final triumph of Christ's kingdom.

In a sacrament, accordingly, we acknowledge with gratitude that definite act of mercy whereby the Almighty has already freed the world from the dreadful consequences of sin; and it is therefore absolutely necessary to our worthy participation, that we should understand the evils from which we are preserved, and the manner in which we have been delivered. But in a typical sacrifice the penitent offender looked forward with humble hope to an undefined but implied atonement; and the means whereby this atonement was to be effected, as they were a mystery as yet in the bosom of God, so a knowledge of their nature was, clearly, not essential to those objects for which God had instituted the prophetic ceremony.

And, as the significant nature of the ceremony itself was, no less than the uniform tradition of their ancestors, sufficient evidence to the pious Gentile, that the Almighty had, for whatever reasons, appointed this mode of expiation for sin, so was it no less incumbent on the Gentile than the Jew to bring his oblations to the Most High: no less than the Jew, the Gentile might expect, through such atonement, forgiveness from their common Father and Judge; and the piety and penitence of the great family of mankind, no less than the piety and penitence of the chosen and peculiar nation, must have proceeded from the Spirit of God.

If, then, these ordinary aids of grace, this internal influence by which alone we are enabled to profit from external means of knowledge, have been accorded to many both of the Jews and Heathens, it is plain that, in this sense at least of the expression, the fellowship of the Holy Ghost is no distinctive badge or peculiar privilege of Christians, and it is still more evident that such a benefit could not have been consistently held forth by the Messiah as a compensation to his Apostles for his own departure from the world. For, as I have shown in a former Lecture, the continuance of one blessing is no compensation for the loss of another; and, doubtless, if to any of Jewish or Heathen race such salutary influence had been accorded, the grace of God, which sanctifieth to salvation, had not been denied to those who were called by Christ; who had through faith obeyed the call, and who, in the course of the conversation here recorded, had been styled by God himself, his friends.

I conclude, then, that the prophecy of Christ, which has furnished a text for these discourses, is not fulfilled by the dispensation (however such bounty may be purchased for us by his merits only) of the ordinary and sanctifying graces of the Holy Ghost. It is, indeed, most true, (and for a reason which will appear in the sequel), that this internal and gracious influence, as enjoyed by the Christian church, is more mightily blessed to the salvation of souls than it ever was in the days of old and while the veil was on the face of nature. And it is also true that the event which has produced this important difference in its ordinary efficacy is no other than that very dispensation of God the Holy Ghost which Christ has described, in his prophecy, as the advent of the Comforter. But I need not caution my present hearers aganst confounding the effect produced with the circumstance which has produced it,—and wherein this last named and peculiar blessing consists, is a question which will yet remain for discussion in a future lecture. The remainder of my present discourse must be chiefly employed in obviating two material objections, which may, not impossibly, occur to several among my auditors against the system which supposes God's sanctifying grace to have extended to the Jews and Heathens.

That system, I am aware, may be accused of detracting from the efficacy of sacramental ordinances, and even from the necessity of faith in the peculiar doctrines of Christianity. And as either one or the other of these imputations would be sufficient, if well founded, to overturn the most plausible hypothesis, I am most anxious to show, before we proceed any farther in our inquiry, that neither the one nor the other are consequences with which my opinion is justly chargeable; that this opinion is perfectly consistent with the importance of Christianity itself, and of the symbols whereby its mysterious benefits are represented; and that the value of both will be yet more firmly established, when disencumbered from those extraneous circumstances with which the indiscreet veneration of some learned men has adorned them.

It will, in the first place, be readily acknowledged by the advocate of universal grace, that with us, to whom the knowledge of the gospel is given, and who are called, by that merciful communication, to enrol ourselves in the army of Christ's faithful followers on earth, the sacraments which Christ has ordained are not only the solemn and indispensable forms of expressing our allegiance and fidelity, but the necessary and appointed means whereby we are to seek at God's hands for grace and hope and happiness. In baptism, which is the outward sign or image of that death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness, which we, through Christ, receive, we declare our faith in him, and our desire to be admitted, through his merits, to the privileges which his death has purchased for mankind. In the eucharist, of which the outward form is a symbol or representation of Christ's death, we in like manner express our perseverance in our profession of faith once made; we implore the pardon of the Most High for our subsequent transgressions, and his grace to assist us for the time to come. But, though the forms enjoined be expressive of those great events on which we found our hopes of heaven, yet is it to these events themselves, and not to their images and material representations, that we look for peace and pardon: nor is our use of the appointed form expressive of any thing else than our hearty desire and humble hope of grace and forgiveness.

The spirit and internal principle of sacrifice are the same with those of prayer; as the last of these is often styled a vocal offering, so may the former be without impropriety defined as a silent entreaty; and sacraments, which are an oblation of ourselves to God's service, and a token of our desire that he would grant us his love and favour, no otherwise differ from the expression of the same sentiments in prayer, than as the language of ceremony and symbol differs from the language of the tongue. But, as it is by convention only that either our actions or our words are significant, it was, a priori, as natural that our heavenly Benefactor should appoint the one as the other to be expressive, in his presence, of our wants and our affections. And as every benefactor has an undoubted right to determine what services he will require, and what acknowledgment he will receive; it follows, that we are to approach the mercy seat of God in whatever manner is most pleasing to him, and that we must thank him for past favours, and entreat his future protection in those words or by those ceremonies which he hath himself thought fit to institute.

To this we are bound under the implied and most righteous penalty of having our requests rejected, if, despising the ordinance of God, we offer them in any other than the commanded form; and to this we are moved by the implied assurance of Christ, that, asking in the manner which he himself has chosen, our prayer shall not return without its answer.

It is therefore that, the ceremony of baptism performed, we proclaim with so much holy confidence that our prayers are already heard, and the neophyte even now adopted. It is for this reason that, after the celebration of the eucharist, we thank the Almighty for assuring the devout participant in those holy mysteries, that he is a member incorporate into the mystical body of his Lord: and it is in this well-founded hope that we style the Christian sacraments, in our public formularies of instruction, the pledges of our Master's love.

Not that we conceive any necessary or mysterious connexion between the forms themselves and the grace of which they are the outward image; far less that any overt and voluntary action of our own can possibly be a proof or token of the good-will of another person towards us: but because the words of Christ enjoining us to seek such blessings by such ceremonies are in truth a most ample pledge that our service thus rendered is acceptable to God, and that we are consequently entitled to look forward in humble confidence to the blessing which we seek at his hands. The sacraments, accordingly, are styled the means whereby we receive grace; not as if they were vehicles through which the Spirit of grace thinks fit exclusively to convey his gifts to the hearts of men, but because they are the appointed medium of our devout and acceptable aspirations to his throne. They are not the means whereby God gives us grace, but they are the means whereby we ask and obtain grace from God: and it is evident that we cannot, if either the one or the other be wilfully neglected, expect from our Maker either pardon of our sins, or that spiritual assistance whereby only we are enabled to serve and please him.

Nor can any consideration more strongly evince the dangerous error or still more perilous obstinacy of those who, from mistaken principle refuse, or from fondness for the world neglect, observances in themselves so rational, and commanded by such awful authority.

From the correspondence thus explained between sacramental and devotional ordinances, it is evident that the practice of infant baptism may be defended on a different and, perhaps, a more satisfactory ground than the usual arguments derived from precedent and human authority. For whether the infant be a legitimate object of covenant or no, it is certain that he is a proper subject of prayer and intercession; and the devoting of a child to the service of his Maker, and the supplication that his heavenly King would dispose him in due time to ratify those engagements, when, above all, our own endeavours may by education mainly contribute to the end proposed, is a proceeding, surely, no less reasonable, than it is pious and affecting and charitable.

But it will also follow from the above definition of a sacrament, that the necessity either of baptism or the eucharist can only rest with those to whom their obligation is known, and their observance possible; and that we cannot, on any principle of reason or revelation, exclude any part of mankind from those benefits which the blood of Christ has bought for all, on the plea of inevitable or ignorant noncompliance with the positive institutions of Christianity. Were it otherwise, the parallel would altogether fail between the rites of circumcision and baptism, the passover and the eucharist, inasmuch as the Jew was pardoned, who, during his abode in the wilderness, or, afterwards, from bodily infirmity, omitted the former rite. Nor was the Holy Ghost at any time bestowed in more ample measure than on those prophets of Israel's captivity, who were, by their situation, effectually excluded from all participation in the appointed offerings for sin.

And, though our Saviour insists, in his conference with Nicodemus, on baptismal no less than spiritual regeneration as equally necessary to the character of a perfect Christian, yet does the whole tenour of his argument imply, that these were not the same but different things; which, though neither of them was, without the other, sufficient to make us members of his church, might exist, nevertheless, distinctly and with different individuals. And, in point of fact, and if we take as our example the particular case of Nicodemus, so far from internal grace being the effect of baptism only, this order appears to have been absolutely reversed, inasmuch as a considerable spiritual change had already taken place in the Jewish Rabbi, who acknowledged Christ to be a teacher come from God, although his remaining prejudices or timidity as yet forbade the public profession of this faith by baptism.

On the whole, if we admit that, to those whom God hath commanded thus to approach him, the sacramental ordinances are indispensable means of grace; it will from thence by no means follow, that no other inlet of scriptural hope remains for those to whom such opportunities are denied: nor if, on the other hand, we maintain, that his mercy may dispense to others, where he will, and freely, those powerful aids for which himself hath taught us to pray, can we therefore hope that our disobedience will meet with the same indulgence as their misfortune. The arm of God is not so short or feeble as that his Spirit should be confined to those who after a particular form desire it; but neither is the word of God so changeable as that he can be expected to communicate or to continue his sanctifying grace to the church on any other terms than those on which he first engaged to grant it.

The importance, then, of the initiative and commemorative ceremonies of our religion, as necessary means of asking and obtaining God's help and favour, will remain more firmly fixed than ever; though they will be deprived, perhaps, of that unreasonable dignity which assigns to them not only a relative value as expressions of our faith and hope, but a positive efficacy which no act of our own, except with this limitation, can claim. Nor is the awful danger which belongs to a perverse rejection of revealed religion, impaired or slighted by the defender of that hypothesis which admits the uninstructed heathen to a share in God's sanctifying grace: nor are the blessings undervalued which follow from a faithful profession of that doctrine which maketh wise to eternal glory.

Between inevitable ignorance and a wilful refusal of offered knowledge, the difference is great indeed. And, though the help of the Most High has sometimes girded those who have been constrained, in the darkness of heathenism, to seek after a God whom they knew not, what hope is left for him who hath done despite to the Spirit of grace, and hath openly rejected that Prince and Saviour by whom and for whose sake the power is given to repent, and repentance rendered available?

But error of all kinds, even conscientious or invincible error, can never be accounted any other than a very great and grievous misfortune. From such, though grace be not withheld, yet (as the strength and character of the motives and principles which that grace recalls to our mind must depend on our previous knowledge) it will follow, that the support of the Holy Ghost as promised to Christians must be of greater and more blessed efficacy than any which the heathen can look for.

Nor, though the state of these last be freed, on this hypothesis, from that hopeless abandonment to which some misjudging Christians have consigned them, is the Christian left without sufficient grounds of peculiar exultation and gratitude; nor shall we lose those motives which by every bond of love and pity would induce us to labour in the conversion of our heathen brethren.

While we contend that the heathen have received such a measure of knowledge and of grace, as, when properly improved, may elevate some of them, through the merits of Christ, to a seat even in the Christian paradise; while we delight to reckon among our future associates in glory the wise and virtuous of every age and every country, it will not, therefore, follow, that more of the benighted multitude might not have been wise and virtuous, had they enjoyed the same advantages with ourselves. It will not follow that those who sinned against the degree of light allowed them might not have repented in sackcloth and ashes, had they known those important truths of whose value we are so negligent, or that those, be they many or few, who have been snatched as brands from the burning, might not, with greater means of improvement, have attained to greater blessedness.

An equality of gifts or graces is nowhere to be found in the analogy of nature or religion: nor is it any imputation on the justice or mercy of God, that, where enough is given to all, he offers more to some than to others. But it is the duty of the favoured part to remedy this seeming partiality, and to remember, that the more advantages have fallen to their share, the more clearly are they marked out by the common parent as instruments of dispersion and distribution. The rich must feed the hungry, the seeing must conduct the blind; the Christian must join his efforts with the church towards the illumination of heathen darkness.

And, while we indulge our gratitude for that unspeakable gift of the Gospel whereby we are admitted to the inmost sanctuary of mercy, and rendered spectators of those secret springs of grace, from whose diffusive dews and larger channels the universal earth derives fertility; let us remember, that not as spectators only, should we approach the well-head of salvation; and that, unless we drink more deeply of its purer stream, the virtues of the heathen will hereafter be reckoned to our shame, when they shall come from the east and from the west to sit down in the kingdom of God, and when the men of Nineveh and the queen of the south shall rise up against us in judgment!

I have now examined the most important, indeed the only serious objection which occurs to me as likely to be urged against the doctrine of my present lecture; and have shown, I trust, satisfactorily, both from profane and sacred testimony, that both Jews and Pagans may have been partakers like ourselves in the graces of the Holy Ghost, and inheritors with us, through Jesus Christ, of everlasting life and glory.

But from the facts which I have established, we are authorized to deduce some important though incidental corollaries.

1st. While by expressly attributing to the grace of God every single instance of good, whether done or thought, or spoken, we cut up by the roots all human pride, and all tendency to Pelagian error, it is apparent that we exhibit in a yet clearer point of view the improbability of that opposite system, which supposes that sanctifying grace is, wherever bestowed, irresistibly exerted; and which, by referring our destiny to a previous infallible decree, would leave to the human will but an empty name of freedom. For since no single instance can be found in Scripture where the title of Elect is assigned to any other than Christians, and since it is assigned in the Epistles of St. Paul to communities of Christians generally and without exception; it must follow that it denotes some privilege in which all Christians and Christians only participate. But if there be certain heathens from whom sanctification to eternal life is not withheld, and if there be certain Christians (as is too lamentably and familiarly known) who, by their own ingratitude, have lost all claim to this inestimable privilege, it must follow that the election spoken of by St. Paul has reference to some other blessing than that with which the followers of Augustin are accustomed to identify it.

Nor can any doubt remain, that the only privileges to which this election applies are a knowledge in this world of God's more perfect will, and a share in the comforts of the gospel; a preference, no doubt, sufficiently great to call forth our unbounded gratitude, but which does not extend so far as to give us the exclusive possession of our heavenly Father's love and mercy.

But, the distinction once removed which confines to Christians only the sanctifying grace of God, no reason can be given why such grace should be restricted to any particular persons, either among the Heathens, Christians, or Jews; or why the merciful patience of God which leads us to repentance, should not, together with his ready help by which only repentance is possible, be extended to every capable subject. That equal grace is given to all, both religion and experience alike deny; but that any are altogether excluded from its influence, the observations which have been already made will, apparently, forbid us to maintain. I can duly appreciate, and I can sincerely honour that reverence for the power and purity of God's Spirit, which has induced so many wise and holy men to limit its presence to those only who are finally triumphant over sin: but do we indeed diminish the value of his gift or tarnish the brightness of his mercy, when we suppose it, like the sun of our mental system, to dart its pervading blessedness from the midst of heaven on all who do not wilfully shut their eyes against the day? Or shall we, who have the privilege of approaching nearer to its beams, be indifferent to our brightest prospect, because the ends of the earth are not immersed in total darkness; and because the witness of the Most High has not entirely forsaken those tribes on whom the purer day-spring has not dawned?

From this universality, however, of grace, a second corollary arises; that grace, namely, may, so far as our personal sanctification is concerned, be resisted and rendered vain. Were it otherwise, indeed, there could be no condemnation at all, since no man is punished but for neglect of grace. But, if grace may be at first withstood, no reason can be given why it should ever, in this life, become irresistible; or why we should not, till death, retain the fatal power of falling from our highest proficiency. It follows that the doctrine of assurance, as that doctrine, at least, is commonly expressed, is an opinion groundless and illusory; that though on our present state of acceptance with God our conscience is reasonably said to bear us witness, yet is it impossible, without the gift of prophecy or the crime of presumption, to anticipate our final perseverance in godliness; with that degree of confidence which many pious men profess to feel.

It may be suspected indeed, (and well it is for them that such a case is possible,) that those excellent persons have not, in reality, that unbounded assurance of final salvation to which they, however sincerely, lay claim; and that they confound those feelings which arise from a high degree of probability, with that stronger effect which is produced in the soul by the contemplation of what is absolutely certain.

The circumstances are of very rare occurrence, in which this certainty is possible to man; and the highest degree of faith will, perhaps, fall vastly short of it. But, though the sense of probability is in its nature a conditional expectation, we may, doubtless, by inferring the future from the past, exhilarate or depress the soul to a degree of joy or misery very hardly to be distinguished in definition from that certainty which belongs, it may be thought, to present objects only.

In practice, however, and in their effects on the subsequent conduct, such feelings are easily distinguishable. What we indeed regard as certain we are never found to strive against or to forward: but that confidence of which we only persuade ourselves is by far too weak to hold out against the excitements of hope or terror. The merest fatalist, if life be dear to him, will take care, notwithstanding his professed opinions, to guard his head in battle: the sturdiest predestinarian, when temptations arise, is truly and piously disquieted.

And, though the recollection of frequent victories over sin may, doubtless, yield a well-grounded hope that we shall not be hereafter defeated; though the probability that we shall be supported to-morrow as we were yesterday and the day before, may kindle in the good man a holy joy and gratitude, which, for the moment, casts out fear; yet that this troublesome but necessary guest must, nevertheless, ere long return, is apparent from the circumstance, that the good man does not fail to continue those precautions which the apprehension of danger alone can dictate.

There is an awful difference between the absence of doubt and the sensation of perfect confidence. That we shall sleep to-night as safely as we slept the night before, there is none of us, perhaps, who questions; and, if we think on the subject at all, we rejoice in our sense of that merciful protection, without which the watchman waketh but in vain. Yet do we none of us neglect to secure our doors against assault, which, if assault were impossible, would, surely, be a futile trouble. The mariner in sight of his desired haven is as glad as if his voyage were already concluded: and the saint beside his funeral pile may exult with reason that a crown is laid up for him for evermore. But neither the one nor the other is so sure of his safety, as to confound what is only extremely probable with what is absolutely decreed by heaven. The seaman, till the anchor is cast, forsakes not the care of his helm; the martyr, whose pardon was laid before him on the conditions of his apostasy, exhorted his persecutors, as they loved his soul, to remove from him that temptation. With both, the intensity of hope is allayed with an attendant anxiety, lest by any fault of theirs they should perish in the very moment when all their toils were about to terminate.

To a wicked man the doctrine of predestination is too often the cause of a dangerous and deadly downfall, because he is glad to use it as an excuse for neglecting those interests which he does not really regard. To a good man, if his reason be sound, it can, probably, do little harm; and may, sometimes, beyond a doubt, administer comfort under temptation, and inspire him with a gratitude which is not less warm or pure because the hope on which it rests is founded on an erroneous opinion.

But, neither the good man nor the sinner can be really asserted to believe in predestination, inasmuch as without hope enjoyment would be impossible, and without danger caution superfluous. The great detector of sophistry, our natural apprehension, exclaims aloud against every attempt at self-deceit; and, if we value our lives or our souls, we dare not commit either the one or the other to the hazard of those principles which we stimulate our fancy to conceive, and torture our understanding to maintain.

LECTURE VII.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

That the name of Comforter here given to the Holy Ghost was given in anticipation of some peculiar and permanent favour to be conferred by him on the orphan church of Christ, it has been already my endeavour to prove. And I have shown, in like manner, that these essential characteristics of permanence and peculiarity will evince that benefit, whatever it may be, to be something distinct both from the gifts of miracle and prophecy, which were accorded to a single generation only of Christians; and from those more common aids and larger influences, whence not the Christian virtues only, but every act and word and thought have issued, which hath thrown a transitory gleam of light and beauty over that gloomy prospect which is offered to the mental view by the natural state of mankind.

For, as the comfort of God's Spirit was promised to Christians only, and as it was promised to the universal Church of Christ in every age of its duration, it is plain that such specific benefit could not consist in a bounty, however great, in which Christians partake with some of those to whom the name of Christ is unknown; and that we can with yet less ground of probability identify it with a privilege which was confined to the Apostles and their immediate successors.

We have still, then, to inquire after an instance of celestial bounty more accurately corresponding with the terms of Christ's prediction. And such an instance it is not impossible to find, to which external aids and internal graces are attendant only and incidental appendages; a bounty in the hopes and promises of which, the Christian alone, and Christians of every age and nation are partakers and proprietors, and of which the privileges, as they were purchased by the sinless obedience and meritorious sufferings of the second Person in the Deity, so were they conferred on us in plenary enjoyment, by the advent and inspiration of the Third in that mysterious essence.

That the Son of God is the object, yet more than the teacher of the Christian faith; that he did not "bear testimony of himself," and that he left to the subsequent doctrine and illumination of the Paraclete to record and explain those awful dispensations whereby he triumphed over death and hell, is evident from that ignorance which, till the advent of the Holy Ghost, the chosen followers of our Lord displayed as to the nature of their Master's kingdom. An ignorance it was indeed, so total, and to us so extraordinary, that the greater number of commentators have been rashly induced to ascribe it to a degree of national prejudice or natural incapacity in those whom Christ selected to instruct the world, which, as it would be beyond all bounds of probability, so is it altogether needless to enhance the wonder of the fact, that the world has been, by their means, converted. Enough there is of miracle to confound the wisdom of the wise, and to establish the celestial origin of our religion, in the event which all parties allow, that the fabric of Paganism was overturned by a few Galilean peasants, without the further supposition, that these instruments of God's will were less favoured in intellect or acuteness than others of their rank and nation. Nor must we forget that, by how much the more we underrate the extent of their intelligence, by so much do we decrease the weight, which, even in facts most obvious to their eyes and ears, we can reasonably assign to their testimony.

In truth, however, I can discover no single passage in Scripture from which we may infer that they had either stronger prejudices against the truth, or less of natural capacity, or greater ignorance of the sacred writings of the ancient covenant, than even the wisest members of the Sanhedrim. At all events, the phenomenon to which I have alluded may be more reverently and as satisfactorily accounted for by the recollection of that fact which is implied in so many passages of the Gospel; that the time, namely, was not come at which the veil of mystery should be withdrawn from the designs of God, and that the work of our redemption was to be complete in all its parts, before it was exposed to the public eye and to the curiosity and devotion of the universe.

It is thus that the atonement for sin by the meritorious sacrifice of the Messiah, which is expressed, in the Epistles of St. Paul and St. John, with a precision and a copiousness answerable to its vast importance, is conveyed, in the language of our Saviour while on earth, by scattered hints and through the darkness of prophecy and parable. It is thus, too, that though the supercession of the Mosaic law be, undoubtedly, deducible from the moment in which a new and better covenant was established by our Lord's fulfilment of that which was to pass away, yet the authoritative explanation of this mystery, (which, while Christ was yet on earth, his disciples were unprepared to receive) can only be found in the teaching of God's Spirit through the Apostles.

The Holy Ghost, then, as I have already had occasion to observe, was the Hierophant of the Christian mysteries; the Dispenser of that universal pardon which the Son had purchased with his blood; the Herald to mankind, by the means of his Prophets and Apostles, of that better covenant of grace which should supersede, in after ages, the fleshly ordinances of Sinai.

But that such a discovery was, to the followers of our Lord, sufficient both of comfort and compensation for his departure from the world, is apparent from the importance of the communication itself, no less than of the practical results and illustrious hopes to which their eyes were thenceforward opened. They no more looked forward with mistaken and painful anxiety to the restitution of a national greatness which their countrymen were unfit alike to maintain or to enjoy. No more did they contemplate their Master as the sovereign of a great, indeed, but not an unbounded empire. They beheld him seated on the throne of Omnipotence itself, confining in his invincible grasp the keys of death and of hell; and worshipped by all the countless multitude of those whom his blood had ransomed from the grave. Themselves they found released from a yoke which neither "they nor their fathers had been able to endure;" translated from the elementary bondage of ceremonies and sacrifices to the glorious liberty of God; no longer servants but sons.

The Gentile was not now excluded from the more perfect knowledge and nearer favour of the common Parent of mankind: the Jew was no more the member of a small and unpopular community, divided from the great family of earth by exclusive, and, in their effect at least, invidious privileges. The tabernacle of adoption, like the canopy of heaven, overshadowed all the children of Jehovah; and the nations of the East and the West were gathered in peace together under the wings of the Christian Dove.

Can any wonder that, by their admission to these glorious prospects, the very temper of the Apostles' souls was changed? that they, thenceforth, no more shrunk back in terror from the fulfilment of their arduous ministry, no more lamented their departed Lord; no more shut their doors in selfish timidity from the notice or displeasure of their countrymen? that they from that moment rejoiced under affliction, and glorified God that "they were counted worthy to suffer shame in the cause of Christ?"

As a comfort, then, and compensation to the afflicted followers of Jesus, the discovery of that new and better covenant, which was revealed by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, was amply sufficient to entitle that blessed Person to the name of Paraclete. Nor do the effects which this dispensation produced on the world at large, less strikingly answer to those other features whereby the Paraclete was to be distinguished as a Patron to the Christian cause, and a Defender of the Son of Man against the slanders of his hostile countrymen. The Spirit of God, in his character of Paraclete, was to testify, it will be remembered, of the innocence and inspiration of the Messiah: he was to convict the world of the guilt which they had incurred in rejecting him; he was to vindicate at once the character of Jesus from the charges of imposture or enthusiasm, and the name of God from the suspicion of injustice and cruelty. His appointed function it was to reconcile the righteousness of the Deity with those awful dispensations which had lately doomed the innocent to death, and to make the dignity of the Messiah consistent with the sufferings of a houseless wanderer in the kingdom of his ancestors, a crucified victim to the jealousy of the state, beneath the walls of his own Jerusalem.

Objections these, which, great as the miracles of Jesus doubtless were, those miracles could not entirely solve; much less could the exercise of power by which his followers were, after his exaltation to the throne of glory, enabled to bear witness to his truth. Such powers were, indeed, a very sufficient evidence that he was a Prophet sent by Jehovah. But this was not enough to answer the purposes of the Apostles and of the truth; and it was required, moreover, to prove him to be that particular Prophet and Saviour on whom the hope of Israel depended; and not of Israel only, but of all the nations in the universal earth.

And to such a claim two objections might be raised, which no miraculous powers on the part either of Christ or his Apostles could obviate, inasmuch as they arose from facts which could not be denied, and which, if unexplained, were absolutely inconsistent with the character of the Messiah promised by God. And these circumstances were the lowliness of his rank in life, and the manner in which he suffered death.

The first of these was inconsistent, as every Jew might urge, with the character of a great deliverer; since, whatever might have been his innocence and extraordinary powers; however dear he might have been to God, and however approved in his sight; nay, though he were allowed to have risen from the grave like Lazarus, and, like Enoch and Elias, to have ascended to heaven; yet, neither during his public life, nor after his alleged resurrection, had he, in fact, any more than Enoch or Elias or Lazarus, accomplished any visible deliverance, whether for the world at large, or for the chosen people of God.

But, if he had wrought no deliverance, then was he no deliverer, and, if no Saviour, no Messiah. "How," say the Rabbins in that work to which they have prefixed the ostentatious title of Nizacchon or "the Victorious," "How can Jesus be called the Admirable Counsellor, whose designs even Judas rendered vain? How is he strong, who was subdued by Death? How the eternal Father, who perished in the midst of his days? How the Prince of Peace, whose life was spent in trouble?"

It was necessary, then, to prove that, by the agency of our Lord, some great salvation had in reality been affected; and this was proved by the promulgation of that covenant, wherein, for the sake of the Son of man, and through the merits of his obedience and sacrifice, the burden and curse of the Law were removed, and forgiveness of sins accorded. His title was thus established to the appropriate name of JESUS, because "he saved his people from their sins;" and the most formidable of those objections was removed, which could not be obviated either by his blameless life, or by the acknowledged greatness of his miracles.

The objection which arose from the manner of his death was, doubtless, less considerable; yet was it to Jewish prejudices a very material scandal; inasmuch as, though they might be brought to acknowledge, on the authority of Daniel, that the Messiah was to "be cut off," and, from the testimony of Isaiah, that he was to be "sent to prison and to judgment;" yet that he should perish by a species of death which, we find it urged again with malignant triumph by the author of the Nizacchon, the Almighty had declared accursed, was a difficulty only to be solved by the knowledge of that mysterious and awful dispensation whereby the innocent was made a curse for the guilty.

It was thus that the revelation of the covenant of grace, which was made through the Apostles to mankind, was both needful and efficacious to lead them into truth, and to bring to their knowledge or remembrance those awful lessons which had been communicated under the veil of mystery or parable during the Messiah's abode among men.

Nor can a stronger objection be required against that which is called the simplicity of the Unitarian system of theology, than that, by denying the Divinity of our Lord, as well as those other awful truths which supply the only competent answer to the cavils of the unconverted Jew, it takes away all adequate motives for that tremendous apparatus of power and prophecy, by which the birth and life and death of Jesus were distinguished.

As a teacher of morality he told us little which was really new. As a preacher of the resurrection he inculcated no more than the great majority of his countrymen believed already: and it is difficult to say in what manner those understand him to have abolished the Law of Moses, who refuse to acknowledge, in his death, a sacrifice and propitiation for sin.

So far indeed from that simplicity, if real, being admissible as a proof of the truth of a religious system, it may be thought that the credit of any pretended discovery of God's will or nature would, if it did not contain discoveries transcending human reason, be, on that very account, impaired and rendered precarious. No ghost need rise, no angel come from heaven, to disclose to us those truths which we already knew, or those of which a competent knowledge might be acquired by the natural process of induction or experiment. And though that be an absurd refinement of the schoolmen who advance a seeming impossibility as, in itself, a ground of faith; and though there be something still more preposterously unreasonable in the complaint of the author of Religio Medici, that the Christian Religion had not enough of mystery; yet is it certain, that the garb and language of Revelation evince her to be a stranger among men; and that she demands and receives the more attention at our hands, by bringing us such tidings as belong to nothing earthly.

To return, however, from this short digression. The advent of the Paraclete was, moreover, to instruct the followers of Christ in the future fortunes of Christianity. "He was to show them things to come."

Now, it is unquestionable that, with the exception of his own predicted sufferings, and that of the overthrow of the city and polity of the Jews, no single conspicuous instance can be found in which, according to the popular acceptation of the term, our Lord assumed the prophetic character. Nor, of future events, and of that general course of Providence which shall precede and promote the final triumph of truth, is any knowledge possessed by the world, which has not been communicated by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost to his chosen servants the Apostles. The rise of Anti-Christ, which has now become a matter of history; his fall to which we still look forward in faithful hope: the terrific events which are to occupy the latest scene of nature's drama; and the manner in which nature herself is to be at length dissolved; as they are circumstances of which our knowledge has been derived from the Paraclete only, so are they essential features in that system of belief and happiness and duties which it was his office to impart to Christians. Essential they are to our belief, which, unless prepared beforehand by prophecy for the bitter trials of the church, might faint and fail beneath the burden of our Master's cross; essential to our happiness, since, without such an assurance of the final triumph of truth, our condition would be of all men most miserable; essential to our duties, inasmuch as they raise our hopes and apprehensions above the limits of a perishable world.

It may be said then, with truth, that by the single discovery of the Christian system of atonement and peace and pardon; by the revelation of the will, and the mercy, and the power, and the future counsels of God in Jesus Christ, the promise of a Comforter, insomuch as the Apostles were concerned, was exactly and most mercifully accomplished. But the promise, it has been already shown, was not to the Apostles only, but to the Universal Church of Christ in every age of her duration. And as, since the time of the Apostles, no fresh revelation of God's will has been made to the church; as no new prophet has arisen to instruct, no open vision to console her, it may be objected with much plausibility that the perpetual abiding of the Comforter with the Christian world has been in no wise accomplished by the gift of supernatural light to one out of many generations.—It is true that we have still, in the volume of the Sacred Scriptures, the results of that inspiration which the earliest teachers of our faith enjoyed.—But this, it may be said, is rather a consequence of the Paraclete's former visit, than a proof of his continuance among us, it is rather the legacy of a departed than the counsel of a present guardian; and the Pilot who should undertake to steer our vessel through the whole continuance of her voyage, would ill discharge that promise if he deserted our helm in the middle passage, though he should leave at the same time, for our guidance, his chart and compass behind him.

But that this objection, however specious, is not unanswerable, will appear if we consider,—first,—that the promise of our Lord, and the office of Paraclete which that promise defines, though they are doubtless explicit as to the points of universal and continual superintendance and protection—do by no means lead us to anticipate an unceasing display of vision, or a perpetual and perceptible illapse of celestial knowledge. It was foretold, indeed, that the Paraclete should abide with us always,—but it was not expressed that the Holy Ghost should, in his capacity of Paraclete, be continually guiding us into new truths,—continually introducing us to a fresh Apocalypse. The nature of his office implies that he should be at hand to enlighten, to defend, and to console, where such comfort or illumination were needed;—but the teacher may pause between the lessons which he gives to his pupil,—the advocate when his plea is advanced may wait till he is called on for explanation,—the Comforter when he has dried our tears may sit silent and watchful for a while, till another relapse of grief demands fresh arguments to subdue it. But, as it will not be denied that, in the instance of the Apostles, the knowledge of God's will, which was supernaturally communicated to them, was a sufficient and accurate accomplishment of our Saviour's promise,—so may it be proved, that, to the Apostles themselves this inspiration was not a perpetual and unceasing gift,—and that the hypothesis which maintains it to have been so, would conduct us to inferences no less at variance with the narratives of the Apostles themselves, than with the analogy which might be expected between their endowments and those of the elder Prophets, and with that natural and universal feeling which forbids us to expect at God's hands an unnecessary miracle, or that he should exempt his creatures, while on earth, from that weakness and peccability which is the common misfortune of their kind, any further than is required by the dispensation committed to their charge, and the accomplishment of his will through them.

Accordingly, it may be observed that the Prophets of the elder Covenant were only then acquainted with future transactions, when they were under the immediate influence of the spirit by whom they were favoured;—that his illapses took place at distinct and sometimes at distant periods; and that, in the intervals of such awful visitations, they were in no respect distinguished from the weakness and ignorance of their brethren. Nor is there any ground in Scripture for supposing, with Michaelis, that John or Peter were, in this respect distinguished from Jeremiah or Isaiah or Elijah; or that the ordinary power which our Lord assigned them of officially deciding cases of conscience, or of making laws and administering justice in the community over which they were placed, required in them any more than in other ecclesiastical governors, an inherent and permanent infallibility. Had this been the case, St. Peter would have been no less an object of imitation when he dissembled with the Gentile converts in Antioch, than when he admitted Cornelius into the bosom of the Christian Church; and St. Paul and St. Barnabas must have been equally correct in their opposite judgments on the conduct of Mark the Evangelist. But, in truth, there is sufficient evidence in the New Testament itself, that the discoveries of God's will which the Apostles received were limited and occasional, and the powers with which they were entrusted were, for the most part, temporary only. The time is marked when Peter was enlightened by a vision as to the removal of the ancient barrier between the Gentile and the Jew; and till Peter had himself communicated this knowledge to the remaining disciples, they were strangers, at least in this particular, to the counsel of their Heavenly Director. St. Paul's first mission to the Gentiles, his call into Macedonia, and his knowledge of things in Paradise, were all the subjects of distinct revelations, nor could he predict the escape of his companions from the devouring ocean, till he had first received his information from the "Angel of that God, whose he was and whom he served."—Nor should we omit to notice that the same St. Paul, on more than one occasion, distinguishes his private judgment from his divine instructions; and that the author of the Apocalypse specifies a particular Lord's-Day, during which he was "in the Spirit."—It is [illegible] that a person continually and in every word and action inspired, could, correctly speaking, have [illegible] at all;—and that in him who was always under the supernatural influence of the Holy Ghost, it would have been as absurd to specify any particular moment at which that influence overshadowed him, as it would have been to say that he was [illegible]

It is proved, then, that the Divine assistance which the apostles enjoyed was a [illegible] there were periods during which the [illegible] Holy Ghost was [illegible] ods, however short, during which a cessation of the gifts of the Paraclete is acknowledged, without detriment to the Church or falsification of the Saviour's promise:—this concession may be extended to any period which eternal wisdom might think fit. Whether it be an hour, a day, a year, a thousand years, no difference can be made in the truth of Him to whom a thousand years and one day are both alike,—nor in the interest of the Church over which his unsleeping care presides, and which, when she needs his further teaching, may rest secure in faith to find it. The promise of the Almighty to abide in his Jewish shrine, was as express as that in which the Christian Church receives the assurance of a similar inhabitation.—Yet some intervals there were in which there was a cessation of supernatural endowments among the race of Israel, as total as that which we now deplore.—When Samuel was established as a seer, the word of the Lord had long been precious;—between the appearance of the different Prophets whose works are collected in our canon, a considerable space of time must often have occurred. And in four hundred years, from Malachi to John the Baptist,—we shall find no better pretences to inspiration than the dreams of the Maccabees, and the Bath-Col of Rabbinical Fable. But if God still "dwelt in his temple," though he gave no preceptible tokens of his presence there,—if the Jews were not forsaken, though they saw "no prophet more,"—shall we doubt that our Schekinah is with us still, though his voice be not heard in our assembly, or that he may yet break silence should a case arise, in which the interest of the faith require a new revelation.—But is God indeed silent, when the sound of his words is brought to us every Sabbath-day in the authentic records of our salvation? Or do we hesitate to receive the comfort and counsels of Scripture as a daily and hourly blessing of the Holy Ghost, because we do not receive it from his immediate dictation? Let us then recollect, in the second place, that, though the promise be express that the Comforter should communicate supernatural knowledge to the Church,—the manner of this communication is nowhere limited to a supernatural process only,—and that if we continue to receive his dicta in all essential points unaltered,—it can make no difference whether we receive them at the first or thirtieth hand.

There are two ways, indeed, and only two, by which, so far as our experience enables us to judge,—a revelation from Heaven, or any other supernatural knowledge can be conveyed to the human understanding. The first is by an impulse immediately communicated by God to the perceptions of the individual who is destined to be thus enlightened; the second, by the intervention of some other and more favoured person, who is empowered and commanded to employ, for the instruction of his brethren, that knowledge, which he has himself received from God. But, of a revelation which should be at once universal and immediate, no instance can be found in the history of our Maker's dealings with mankind, on the great majority of whom he has always imposed the condition of being taught by others of their species.

Even in the case which approaches most nearly to that of an universal and immediate revelation, the case, I mean, in which the Almighty promulgated with his own voice the decalogue to the assembled nation of Israel, his auditors, it is plain, were only a single generation out of the many who were equally the objects of the instruction thus afforded, and of whom all the succeeding streams were bound to receive the truth on the authority and from the testimony of their fathers.

And, in the particular instance of the Christian Revelation, as the fact itself on which our faith is founded, the resurrection, namely, of the Lord, was communicated not to all the people but to witnesses chosen of God; so were the doctrines which depended on that fact revealed, in the first place, to certain selected teachers, on the credit of whose testimony the Universal Church was thenceforward to be guided and governed.

It was, [illegible] the [illegible] of the [illegible] in the earliest [illegible] of Christianity, the Holy Ghost [illegible] orphan flock which was left to his care; and it appears from many very remarkable passages of the New Testament, that the ordinary believers of the apostolic period were no more endued with miraculous powers, and no more inspired with [illegible] age. Were all apostles, were all Prophets, did all speak [illegible] Let Paul himself [illegible] ? No more; it is apparent from the writings of [illegible] with what a holy jealousy he vindicated of delivering to the Church those rules of faith and practice, which only were to be received on the authority of the Holy Ghost: and that neither man nor angel could pretend to the possession of a revelation independent of that which the apostles proclaimed, without incurring the heaviest weight of anathema.

If, indeed, the Spirit of God had communicated an immediate and supernatural assistance to all who once embraced the Christian Faith, it is apparent that the controversial writings which the apostles left behind (and all their writings may be regarded as more or less controversial) would never have existed at all; that doubts would never have arisen, where every individual was alike divinely inspired; and that no appeal would have lain to the superior authority of the Twelve, if the Churches of Rome or Corinth or Galatia had inhaled, no less deeply than the apostles, the unspeakable gift of God.

When inspiration, accordingly, was promised by Christ, and afforded by the Holy Ghost, in the earliest age of Christianity, to the collective and Catholic Church; it was not afforded, and doubtless therefore not promised to the body, otherwise than through the medium of some distinguished members. And though John and Paul and Peter were, in the first instance, guided and comforted by the Holy Ghost himself, it was by Peter or Paul or John that such instruction or consolation was dispensed to Apollos or Onesimus or Philemon.

Nor can a dispensation of this kind be, with any degree of justice, accused of inequality; nor are the inspired individuals more essentially favoured than those to whom their mission is addressed, for whose sake and in order to whose instruction they are thus distinguished from the remainder of mankind; and who, from them, receive a no less perfect measure of knowledge than they have themselves derived from the visions or inspiration of God. By inspiration, it will be recollected, in the scriptural sense of the word, neither universal knowledge is implied, nor, even in religious questions, universal infallibility. Of future events in general the Prophet had no more knowledge than the meanest of his audience; of the nature or will of the Almighty, (abstracted from those particular facts which it was his especial commission to disclose,) the apostle might himself inquire in vain. The veil was never except in part withdrawn from mortal eyes; and, when the vision was described, and the Gospel announced to the world, the world was as wise as its teachers. Those teachers were not the objects, but the transmitting medium of God's favours: the prophetic office was not so much a privilege as a burden imposed: the whole counsel of God, so far as it was freely communicated to them, they were freely to impart to their uninstructed brethren: they were the heralds to the world of those gracious offers which unbounded mercy made to all, and of which they themselves were partakers, if (which by no means necessarily followed from the fact of their official privileges) they really partook in the benefits of the Gospel, not as apostles or prophets or ministers of Heaven, but as men, as sinners and as penitents.

The comfort, then, of the Holy Ghost, both might be and was afforded to the early ages of the church through the means of a comparatively trifling number of inspired individuals. And, if a succession of such individuals had been raised by God's providence in the several and successive generations which have since elapsed in our Sion; if there had been a prophetic school in the Christian church, such as is by most divines supposed to have existed in the church of Israel; or were that claim admitted to official infallibility which our fellow-Christians of the Romish persuasion have not yet ceased to advance in favour of their universal bishop; we doubtless should not hesitate to allow that by such a succession, the promise of our Saviour and the permanent residence of the Holy Ghost with the church were satisfactorily accomplished and exemplified; though we neither beheld (as some of the modern Jews pretend was the privilege of their Fathers) the glory of the Almighty visibly present in our sanctuary; nor could reckon up with St. Paul, as incidents of frequent occurrence, that long and splendid list of miraculous powers and graces for which the Corinthians so earnestly contended.

Of miraculous gifts, indeed, peculiarly so called; of tongues, of healing, of exorcism, of discerning spirits; though they were unquestionably among the most conspicuous and frequent triumphs of the early church of God, the present words of Christ say nothing. The grace which the Comforter was to bring among men, corresponds with inspiration and inspiration only: it was a knowledge of God's will and of God's future intentions in relation to his church, which our Lord engages to send to us; and, where this is afforded, we have no reason to complain that gifts are withdrawn, of which, whether the cessation be foretold or no, the permanence is nowhere promised.

It appears, then, that the advent of the Paraclete and his abode among men would be, during any period of Christian history, sufficiently evinced by the existence of one or more inspired individuals, whose authority should govern, whose lights should guide, whose promises should console their less distinguished brethren; and by whom and in whom, as the agents and organs of his will, the Holy Ghost should be recognized as, in the absence of Christ, the governor and guardian of the church universal. But, if this be conceded, it will signify but very little, or (to speak more boldly, perhaps, but not less accurately) it will be a circumstance altogether insignificant, whether the instruction afforded be oral or epistolary; whether the government be carried on by the authority of a present lawgiver, or through the medium of rescripts bearing his seal, and, no less than his personal mandates, compulsory on the obedience of the faithful. In every government, whether human or divine, the amanuensis of a sovereign is an agent of his will no less ordinary and effectual than his herald; and St. Paul both might and did lay claim to an equal deference, when, in the name and on the behalf of that Spirit by whom he was actuated, he censured by his letters the incestuous Corinthian, as if he had, when present, and by word of mouth, pronounced the same ecclesiastical sentence.

It follows that the Holy Ghost as accurately fulfilled the engagement of Christ as the Patron and Governor of Christians, by the writings of the inspired person, when absent, as by his actual presence and preaching. And, if St. Paul, having once, by divine authority, set in order the Asiatic and Grecian churches, had departed for Spain or Britain or some other country at so great a distance as to render all subsequent communication impossible; yet still, so long as the instructions left behind sufficed for the wants and interests of the community, that community would not have ceased to be guided and governed by the Holy Ghost through the writings of his chosen servant.

But that authority which we allow to the writings of an absent Apostle, we cannot without offending against every analogy of reason and custom, deny to those which a deceased Apostle has left behind him. For the authority of such writings, I need hardly observe, is of an official, and not of a personal nature. It does not consist in their having emanated from Peter or James or John abstractedly considered, (in which case the authority of any one of them might, undoubtedly, terminate with his life), but their authority is founded in that faith which receives these persons as accredited agents of the Almighty. We reverence their communications as the latest edicts of the Paraclete; and we believe all further communications to have ceased for a time; not because these eminent servants of God have long since gone to their reward, for it were as easy for the Holy Spirit to raise up other prophets in their room, as it was originally to qualify them for that high office; nor because we apprehend that the good Spirit is become indifferent to the welfare of the church, for this would be in utter contradiction to the gracious assurance of our Saviour: but because sufficient light has been already afforded for the government of our hopes and tempers; and because no subsequent question has occurred for which the Scriptures already given had not already and sufficiently provided.

But, are we free from the authority of an earthly Lord because his orders are not daily repeated? or hath the Lord Omnipotent ceased to reign among men, because he doth not, with the frivolous inconsistency of an eastern despot, continually reverse his own decrees; or delight, as if afraid of being forgotten, to terrify his subjects with incessant displays of his might and majesty? Surely his name is among us and his law is gone forth among men: he sendeth his commandment on earth, and his word runneth very swiftly: by the sword which goeth forth from his mouth shall his enemies be consumed before him; till all nations and people do him worthy reverence, and till the knowledge of Jehovah shall spread over the world as the waters cover the sea!

Nor does the case which has been urged of the pilot and his chart bear any real analogy to the hypothesis which I am now supporting. It was, we may observe, through the medium of this chart itself, or the instructions which this chart contains, (by the doctrine, that is, of the Holy Ghost, as expressed in the teaching or writings of the Apostles), that, even in the golden age of Christianity, the great body of the faithful were directed and consoled, and it is preposterous to tax the pilot with a desertion of our interests in the middle voyage, while we enjoy whatever advantages he conferred on first embarking.—The promise, let it be remembered, was not that he should steer the vessel but that he should give us knowledge to steer it for ourselves; and this knowledge is now and has been always afforded in those Scriptures which he daily offers to our attention. Those who apprehend that the Comforter is fled from the church forget apparently by whose care the Sacred Volume has been preserved to our time, entire and, in all essential points, uncorrupted;—by whose providential guidance all circumstances have been made to work together to give certainty and notoriety to his oracles,—and by whom we ourselves have been conducted to the fountain of life,—and the mirror of God's will held up to our imitation and gratitude. And, while the providence of the Holy Ghost secures to every member of Christ's church, the power of understanding mysteries which the prophets and kings of elder times have vainly desired to see, and which, till thus revealed, surpassed the intellect of angels, it is idle or worse than idle to deny that God is with us, because he works through secondary causes. Though in this dark and dangerous voyage, the lamp of our beacon be only visible, and not the gracious hand which lighted first and now sustains it,—yet may the eye of faith behold our guide standing on the battlements of heaven, directing the beams of comfort where they may best illustrate our course, and watching with a parent's love our progress over the stormy waters.—Shame on that blindness of soul which can look on the lights of the material firmament without blessing him who placed them and supports them there;—which can enjoy the Scriptures of the New Testament without thankfully acknowledging who he is that, by them, makes us wise unto salvation?—

Nor can we be taxed with inconsistency if, having before denied that the general care of Providence over the Church was that blessing which the Comforter was to bestow,—we now insist that he has perpetuated that blessing by this very Providence directed to a particular end. The scent of the rose and the tone of the lyre are wafted to us by the same circumambient air, but it is the distinctive circumstance and not the common vehicle which we mean to signify by the words "fragrance" or "melody." And, by whatever concurrence of events the Spirit of God has placed the volume of his will in our hands, it is by the operation itself and not the "modus operandi," that he fulfils his office of Paraclete.

In a larger sense, indeed, and, as pervaded by the influence of the Revelation of God's mercy and the Messiah's triumphant suffering, those rites of our religion which were already instituted before the day of Pentecost, and those common dispensations of the Spirit's mercy and power which we share with other ages and nations; have all of them received through this his advent, the splendour of reflected truth, and have gladdened the heart of the Christian with more than their original blessedness. The Rabbinical teacher of righteousness has become an Evangelist of Peace and Pardon. The Jewish rites of initiation and thanksgiving have expanded into symbols of celestial power and tropies of the Redeemer's victory. The course of political events has been sanctified by prophecy into an evidence of God's truth and wisdom. The light of grace which could only discover to the Gentile or the Jew the more awful attributes of their Maker's purity and justice,—now flings its steady lustre on redemption bought for us, and merits imputed to us, and everlasting happiness promised to us,—and the same Spirit who was to the saints of older time a guardian and sanctifier, is, to the happy follower of Christ, a Comforter.

But all these dispensations of the wisdom and might and grace of the Most High, derive their power of teaching and consoling us from a reference to Scripture only. By themselves they lead us into no truth;—by themselves they tell us nothing;—their meaning and value can only be fully understood from a previous examination of God's word,—and it is by this book alone which his Spirit first dictated and now puts into our hand, that the same good Spirit either guides us into truth, or shows us things to come,—or pleads the cause of Christ against the malice of the enemy and blasphemer. It is, then, as Dispenser of Supernatural truth, and as Teacher of the Doctrine of Redemption that the Holy Ghost sustains and has sustained his character as the Comforter which should come. And we conclude as Warburton concluded, (though he arrived at the same truth by a process somewhat different, and though he incumbered its definition with circumstances which I have shown to be irrelevant,) we conclude that this instruction is now conveyed to the world, in the Scriptures of the New Testament.

To this, however, two objections will be made: the first against the authority of those writings which are accepted by us as divine; the second against their sufficiency to provide for those spiritual necessities, to which the Church of Christ and the individuals of which it is composed, are collectively and severally liable. The first of these objections proceeds from those various misbelievers who deny the authority or inspiration of the several treatises which our canon of Scripture comprises; the second from such as maintain, that the Scriptures, though divine, are of themselves a rule of wax which the prejudices and passions of mankind may warp to any system which pleases them; and, who seek, accordingly, in the jurisdiction of the Church at large, or of some single ecclesiastical officer, a permanent and perceptible throne, wherein the Spirit of the Lord may dwell as the interpreter and administrator of those laws of which he is himself the Author.

The first of these objectors deny the law to which we appeal to be itself of sacred authority; the second demand some aid beyond the original promulgation of the law, in order, as they tell us, to render the law effectual. But the inspiration of the Scriptures and their sufficiency to answer the promise of our Saviour, are necessarily implied in an hypothesis which makes that sacred volume the instrument whereby the Holy Ghost continues to instruct and console the Church; and I am therefore concerned to maintain both the one and the other of these assertions, against the open enemies or injudicious friends of Christianity.

And, in the first, there are three propositions contained which will require to be severally defended. First, the personal inspiration of the reputed authors of our sacred volume: secondly, that the works which bear their names are with good reason received as their composition: thirdly, that the authors were actually inspired at the time of composing the treatises in question, and that the rules of faith and practice which they contain are, consequently, entitled to be received as the living dictates of Almighty Wisdom.

On all these subjects I am well aware, indeed, that, as from the multitude of my precursors but little of novelty is to be expected, so the approaching termination of the present Lectures affords a very insufficient scope for doing justice even to any single branch of the inquiry. But, if it be allowed me to conduct those doubts, which I want room to satisfy, into channels where satisfaction may be best obtained, if some principles of inquiry may be, at least, established, which may be improved by future diligence; neither my pains nor your attention will be altogether ill bestowed. It is something to point the way to truth, though it be a path which we must travel separately.

The first of those assertions, which our former proposition contains, has been often and satisfactorily proved from the miraculous powers with which the Apostles are said to have been endued, and to the reality of which not Christian writers only, but the earliest and most formidable antagonists of Christianity appear to have borne an ample testimony. Thus Celsus does not deny the fact that the founders of Christianity had a power of working miracles; he only argues against the inference which, from this acknowledged fact, the Christian sought to establish. The same admission is made by Julian the Apostate, as quoted by St. Cyrill. And the "Toldos Jeschu," of all the Jewish libels on our faith the most virulent and outrageous, which (though in its present form it doubtless belongs to a far later period) contains some traditions not unknown to Celsus himself, is full of the miracles both of Jesus and the Apostle Peter.

Nor can the credence which was given to these early miracles by the converts and even the enemies of our religion be justly ascribed to any peculiar readiness in the contemporaries of our earliest teachers, to acquiesce without examination in the fame of whatever was wonderful; and, from previous superstition, to admit the more readily a claim to supernatural power, from ignorance of those natural secrets which have become obvious even to the vulgar. To detect the falsehood (if any deception really lay hid) in the acts which the early Christians through Christ's name pretended to perform, was not a task which demanded the skill of an experimental philosopher, inasmuch as the removing of an obstinate malady is a fact of which the reality may be ascertained by the poorest villager. And of the prevailing parties into which the world was then divided, there were two at least who had every possible interest and inclination to unmask if possible the claims of a new religion, the heathen priests and the Epicurean philosophers. The first of these were disturbed in that monopoly of wonders which they had for so many ages peaceably enjoyed: the second, opposed, as they were from principle, to every thing which marked a superintending Providence, had already, in no small degree, succeeded in making the altars of Jupiter ridiculous; and were little inclined to suffer a new divinity to interrupt their dance of atoms. A time of general irreligion (and such was, undoubtedly, the prevailing characteristic of that period of which I now am speaking) is, of all others, least favourable to a belief in miraculous powers, inasmuch as where attention is refused, all possibility of faith is taken away.

Nor can a stronger proof be required of the prodigious sensation which the wonderful works of the early Christians produced in all the civilized countries of the world, than the total and practical change, a change extending beyond the bounds of the Church, to the shrines and courts and schools of heathenism itself, from that general indifference to all religion which distinguished the world from the days of Augustus to those of Nero; to that spirit of fanaticism which raised up in Apollonius and Iamblichus and Vespasian himself, the imitators at most humble distance of those works which (they could not deny) were, in the case of the Apostles, genuine. Had not Moses first turned the waters of Egypt into blood, we should never have heard of Jannes and Jambres essaying to do the like by their enchantments.

Above all, however, there is an internal evidence of the strongest kind in those works which are ascribed to the Apostles, which shows that their supernatural gifts were circumstances of general notoriety; and that they were of a nature which, had they been so inclined, it would have been utterly impossible to counterfeit. For not only did they assert the power in their own persons of healing the sick, of speaking with unknown tongues, of foretelling things to come; they asserted also, (and, in all the Epistles of St. Paul, we find incidental references to this fact,) that others, through them and by the imposition of their hands, became partakers of the same Spirit with themselves, and performed the same or greater miracles. And many of those Epistles contain specific and detailed directions for the use and improvement of such extraordinary powers, addressed to those who, in common with the writer, possessed and employed them.

Now, supposing it to be possible, that a religious empiric might so far impose on the credulity of his admirers as to instil into their minds the notion that he was himself a prophet and a worker of miracles; yet is it utterly preposterous to suppose, that such a deceiver would attempt at all, much more that he should attempt successfully, to make his followers believe that they themselves were inspired with miraculous faculties. To persuade me into an erroneous opinion, that Paul has the gift of tongues, is not beyond the compass of possibility; but it is neither in the power of Paul nor of an angel from heaven to induce me to believe, in contradiction to my own sensations and experience, that I myself have such a faculty. But the greater part of Paul's addresses to the Corinthians proceed on the supposition that those whom he addresses, had, since their conversion to Christianity, both possessed and exercised this faculty or faculties equally wonderful. So that either St. Paul, if he were an impostor, must have done that which would have immediately detected his imposition; or the miracles of the ancient Christian Church are established as perfectly authentic.

Is it supposed that the Corinthian converts were accomplices with the Apostles in their deceptions on the ignorant majority of mankind? To what purpose then does St. Paul thus gravely address them in a letter intended for their private instruction, as if those powers were real which both he and they sufficiently knew to be counterfeit? Do not confederates, when together in private, make haste to lay aside the mask? or do the kings and prophets of tragedy address each other in ordinary life with the same lofty language which they employ on the public theatre?

For, the Epistles of St. Paul are none of them, we may observe, immediately intended to enlarge the fame of Christianity among those who were as yet without its pale, or to attract from the Synagogue or the Academy an increasing harvest of converts. They are not, like the apologies of a later age, designed to obviate the objections and remove the prejudices which the Heathen entertained against Christianity; but they are addressed exclusively to those by whom that religion had been already adopted. Their differences are to be appeased; their errors to be corrected; their firmness in the faith to be encouraged and preserved; and their exertions directed in the proper path to victory. The Epistles to the Corinthians, in particular, (though they contain truths which are interesting to all, and counsels by which all may profit,) do not seem to apply in the first instance to the whole body of the Achæn Church, but are a series of private instructions for the conduct of the Bishops and Presbyters in that opulent and factious province.

And so little do we find of empirical ostentation in the tone with which the Apostle speaks of these extraordinary faculties, that the object of his address is expressly to lower the high opinion which such persons entertained of the gift of tongues and prophecy; to remind them that these powers, however extraordinary and brilliant, were of an utility only temporary; and that it was better and more blessed to excel in the common virtues of mutual temper and forbearance, than to attract by their miracles the gaze of mankind, and to win over others to salvation, while their own hearts continued unimproved.

If, then, the writings of the New Testament be really the production of those whose names they bear, the fact is certain, that their authors were men approved by God as instructors of mankind, and designated by him, through signs and wonders, to be prophets of his Son and organs of his inspiration.

And that these writings are really genuine, is a fact which rests on the united authority of internal evidence at once the most minute and pervading; of tradition primitive and universal; of the acknowledged reluctance which Christians have, in every period of their history, exhibited to affix, without long examination and accumulated weight of testimony, to works laying claim to divine authority, the seal of approbation and reverence. It is in this manner that the rejection by the Church of those numerous pretended Acts and Gospels, and Epistles, reckoned up by Beausobre, and the very difficulty with which some of the works contained in our present canon were admitted to that honourable station, may prove not only the indisputable authority of those in whose reception all ages and parties agree, but will also show that none, even of those which were longest doubted, were received without probable testimony.

Nor is this all: the Scriptures are yet more satisfactorily distinguished from the productions of more recent imposture by the weight of argument, the simplicity of narration, the dignity of devotion, the peculiar grace of candour and authority, which every where may be seen to shine through the rudeness of their Hellenistic dialect; and which, as they would have baffled the imitation of the most artful impostor, so none of those impostors whose works have descended to our time have, in reality, attempted to copy.

We have yet some spurious works which were offered, in their day, to the reverence of the world, as productions of Apostles and Evangelists; and we have fragments of many more, which the lapse of time and the merited contempt of the Church have long since consigned to oblivion. But of how different materials are these composed from those which distinguish the books of our present canon! Unnecessary and childish miracles; discourses tedious and ill-constructed; and a temper altogether alien from that which is displayed in the genuine New Testament; sufficiently mark out the infinite difference between the authentic oracles and human counterfeits of inspiration; and evince their hopeless daring, who, with mortal flames, would strive to emulate the force and brightness of Heaven's own inimitable lightning.

When we compare, indeed, the acknowledged compositions of the uninspired though primitive Fathers of the Church, themselves distinguished ornaments of Christianity, the pupils of the Apostles, and possessed, in all but supernatural aid, of equal or even superior advantages to the Apostles themselves; when we compare their writings with those ascribed to their illustrious teachers, is it possible to conceal from ourselves the utter incompetency of Clemens or Hermas or Polycarp to have counterfeited the narrations of St. Luke, St. Matthew, or St. John; or the masterly train of reasoning which runs through the polemical writings of St. Paul? What monstrous fables would have filled our Gospel history, had Papias been its compiler! What endless refinements of allegorical and cabbalistic learning would have disfigured the Epistles, if the Fathers of the second century had palmed their own compositions on the world as the works of St. Peter and St. John!

I will go yet farther: when we find the Apostolic Scriptures so greatly superior to all other Christian writings of any sect or period whatever, can we forbear inquiring, from what peculiar circumstance should this pre-eminence arise, unless from that inspiration in which only the Barbarian teachers of our faith can be supposed to have excelled their Grecian converts?

On the nature and extent, however, of this inspiration, a great but very natural difference of opinion has, in every age of the Church, prevailed: and not only have the open enemies of our faith attempted to reduce the Apostolic writings to the level of merely human productions; but men, whom it would be uncharitable and unjust to accuse of disaffection to the general cause of Christianity, have sought, nevertheless, to further the views of their particular party by diminishing, as far as possible, the authority of such parts of Scripture as have appeared least favourable to their claims; or, in their controversies with the infidel, have so greatly narrowed their definitions of the Divine assistance accorded to the earliest preachers of the Gospel, as to deprive our hope of the corner-stone of its foundation, and to leave hardly more of efficacy to the written oracles of everlasting truth, than to the dictates of earthly prudence, and the recollection of mortal and fallible witnesses.

It is not, on the other hand, to be concealed, that this low opinion of inspiration is the consequence, in some degree, of that natural revulsion which an opposite and overstrained hypothesis is apt to occasion in acute and inquiring minds; and that, if modern Christians be in the habit of receding too much, the claims and language of some earlier doctors were considerably too high and unbending. To state and to mediate between the several schemes which have, on this important subject, excited and divided the attention of mankind, must be the work of a future Sermon.

LECTURE VIII.

I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you.—John xvi. 7.

Having established, from the fact of those miraculous gifts wherewith the power of God endued the earliest teachers of Christianity, the consequent fact of their prophetic mission, it might seem, at first sight, to follow as a necessary corollary, that to all their assertions, whether oral or committed to writing, no less a deference was due than to the sacred oracles of God; that the entire New Testament, as their undoubted and genuine composition, must be received as the embodied dictates of eternal truth and wisdom; and that, by this single present to the Christian world, the Holy Ghost has sufficiently redeemed his gracious pledge of becoming through every succeeding age our Guide, our Guardian, and our Comforter.

For, though two of the Gospels, and the narration of the Acts of the Apostles, are composed, indeed, by men who were not themselves of that number, and to whom we have no sufficient grounds for ascribing the gift of personal inspiration, yet were Mark and Luke the companions and amanuenses of the two most considerable elders, and the histories which bear their name were written, if we believe the almost universal voice of antiquity, under Apostolic dictation and revisal. They even bore, among the writers, of the primitive Church, the names respectively of those two illustrious teachers whose sentiments they were supposed to convey; and were known no less as the Gospels of St. Peter and St. Paul than as the works of their familiar attendants.

Had the case, indeed, been different, we have every reason to suppose, from the acknowledged conduct of the Christian world in other and similar instances, that these works would never have been received as standard histories by the great majority of believers, nor have been placed on the same level of reverence and authority with the corresponding productions of persons confessedly inspired. There were, we know, many other distinguished teachers, who were, as well as Mark and Luke, the contemporaries and companions of the twelve; and some of whom, no less than these Evangelists, have left behind them written relics of their zeal in the service of Jesus. Such was Clement, the "fellow-labourer" of St. Paul; such was Hermas, whom the same great Apostle salutes by name; such Ignatius, who has been himself, however truly, accounted as, no less than the Apostles, an eye-witness of our Lord's resurrection.

Yet where can we find in the annals of primitive religion that the acknowledged writings of these men, or men like these, were appealed to by the Church as the charters of her profession, or any otherwise made use of by the assembled faithful than as human sources of instruction?

Again, there are certain treatises in our present canon, and many others which have at different times pretended to a place in it, whose right to that eminent station has been severely contested, both by ancient and modern criticism. But the authority of such works has been contested, on the single ground that they were not in truth composed by the Apostles, to whose writing or dictation they were ascribed. That they are, many of them, of antiquity equal to the Apostolic writings themselves, that they are the productions of men who lived with the Apostles, and were the preachers of a common faith with them, as their strongest opposers have admitted, so has not this admission been accounted by their most eager defenders as sufficient to establish their canonical authority. The dispute has been restricted by common consent to their authenticity, and their authenticity only; nor are they quoted as Scripture by any of the Christian Fathers, who did not, as it should seem, believe them to have been the work either of an Apostle, or his amanuensis. And so perfectly has the authority of this last been in every age identified with that of the Saint to whom he ministered, that, among the various sects whose errors and controversies have deformed the face of religion, while some are not wanting who have professed to build their faith on the testimony of Luke alone; yet have none been found who, receiving the Gospels of John and Matthew, have ascribed to their authority a higher rank than that of the two other Evangelists. A deference this, which there could be no reason for paying to Mark and Luke, rather than to their companions and contemporaries, to Apollos and Hermas and Clemens, if it were not that the former had been in every age regarded as the channels of Apostolic inspiration, the official transcribers of facts or doctrines delivered by infallible authority.

But though the writers or dictators of the entire New Testament are respected by the great majority of Christians as messengers of the will of Heaven, yet, in the application of this common principle to the authority of the works which bear their names, so great a difference of opinion has prevailed, as may lead us to suspect that those who use the term of inspiration, have not been always agreed as to the idea which they meant to convey by it.

In the language of the ancient Fathers, and in the ordinary opinion which, from feeling rather than conviction, has continued since their time to pass current with the Christian world, the gift of inspiration is to a considerable extent identified with omniscience and infallibility. It has not been supposed to consist in a succession of distinct revelations, communicated at various times to the person whom the Almighty selected as his messenger; but it has been considered as a continual and pervading obsession of the Deity, inspiring every thought and prompting every action, in conformity with truth and wisdom, and establishing the favoured individual as a living oracle of God most High, whose lips were the fountain of universal knowledge, and whose earthly sentence was faithfully registered in heaven. And, if such were the fact, no doubt could be entertained that, in their writings no less than their words, and in every fact, every doctrine, every argument which their genuine writings contain, we are bound to reverence and obey the declarations of the Almighty, no less than if we had received them graven on stone by his hand, or heard them proclaimed in accents of thunder from the smoking summit of Mount Sinai.

Between the tongue and the pen, as organs of expression, no difference can be conceived, which should render the last less proper than the former to convey celestial knowledge to mankind. If the inspired oration of a prophet be faithfully committed to writing, whatever authority the sounds at first possessed, the image of those sounds must, on every principle of reason and precedent, retain. If the Prophet himself delivers with accuracy those ideas which the Almighty suggests to his soul, it can make no difference whether he declare them by the conventional sign of spoken or of written language.

But this perpetual and pervading inspiration of the Apostles is unfortunately the very subject in dispute; and I have shewn, in my Seventh Lecture, that the divine assistance, which we believe the Apostles to have enjoyed, may be more plausibly regarded as a limited and occasional assistance only, a conductor into all truth abstractedly considered, but into every truth which was necessary to be known to the Founders of the new religion of grace and pardon; to the missionaries of a certain definite creed, which at various times, and with various degrees of clearness, was communicated to them by vision or inspiration. But if it be granted, and I own I do not see on what principle either of reason or revelation it can be denied, that the guidance of the Spirit, as vouchsafed to the Apostles, was, indeed, thus occasional and limited, it must be an inquiry of the utmost delicacy and importance to ascertain the occasions on which, and the bounds within which it was accorded. And so far as the Scriptures of the New Testament are concerned, it will be demanded, first, what reason we have to ascribe any part of them to the dictation of the Holy Ghost; and, secondly, how much of them is to be received as proceeding from a source so sacred, and what is our criterion for distinguishing between the fallible opinion and the authoritative command, between the imperfect recollection of an earthly witness, and the all-sufficient testimony of that glorious Being, to whom the past, the present, and the future are eternally and equally known?

If all was not inspired which an Apostle wrote or uttered, how many and of what nature were the orations or treatises composed under celestial influence? How can we be sure that those works of theirs which have been handed down to our times were indeed among the favoured number? Nay more, what reason have we for supposing that any of their written compositions were inspired at all? What internal marks of heavenly aid do they present? Where do they themselves lay claim to a privilege so extraordinary? or where is the promise of our Lord, which would lead us to expect that such aid would be accorded? The Son of God, indeed, assures them that, on certain solemn occasions of peculiar alarm and peril, when they were called before kings and rulers for his sake, and for the sake of the Gospel, their unpremeditated eloquence should be prompted and sustained by the internal aid of the Spirit. But we find, it may be urged, no similar necessity or promise in the case of such labours as were carried on in the tranquil solitude of the study or the oratory, or which were addressed to private friends. But, are they their public and official communications which only are to be received as divine? At what point does the distinction between public and private begin? Are the letters to Timothy, to Titus, and Philemon official? The writings of St. Luke, which are also addressed to an individual, can they or can they not be said to answer this description? Such are some of the leading difficulties which, on the question whether the Scriptures of the New Testament were inspired, have been a subject of triumph to the infidel, and to the weak believer, of perplexity and alarm. That both the triumph and the alarm have been alike premature, may appear, perhaps, from the following observations.

First, it was, a priori, highly probable, that the supernatural assistance of the Almighty, which informed, on certain occasions, the oral and extemporaneous effusions of the Apostles, should direct, on others, their pens no less than their tongues to the instruction and benefit of mankind. It was to be expected that some of their writings, as well as some of their speeches, should proceed from the inspiration of God. And this may be shown from the necessity of the case; from the analogy of the Mosaic dispensation; from the promises of Christ in the Gospel; and from the assertions of the Apostles themselves.

That the comforts and lessons of Christianity were intended as a common benefit to every nation and every age of mankind, it is altogether unnecessary to prove. It is a dispensation in which all are concerned, and which was destined, therefore, to be made known to all. The truths which it reveals are tidings of great joy, which the Apostles were to communicate to all people, and of which the knowledge was to proceed both conquering and to conquer, till the universal earth should be covered with the glory of the Lord, and till the annointed Son should descend again in power to reap the harvest of his sufferings. But, that to the extension and perpetuity of religious truth the existence of written documents is a circumstance of the first necessity, will be allowed by all who have, in common life, appreciated the uncertainties of popular fame, and the corruptible nature of oral tradition. Unless indeed, (what no religion, either false or true, has as yet pretended to,) the truth were in every successive age divulged and guarded by a never-ending line of inspired instructors; unless such instructors, too, were in every age sufficiently numerous to be accessible by every believer; it is apparent that the knowledge which mankind might retain must be more and more imperfect and impure in proportion as it receded from the parent fountain; and that, without some storehouse of original principles, which might confirm the weak, recal the wandering, and expose and repress the wilful innovator, the religious opinions of the world would be little less fluctuating and unstable than the fashions of our attire and the varying idioms of our language.

But that such a rule of practice and belief could be afforded by the compositions of human and unassisted wisdom will be asserted, I apprehend, by none. A rule must, in itself, be absolute and definitive, for it would, otherwise, be no rule at all. But human authority can never be definitive, since whatever right Augustin may possess to propose his sentiments as most agreeable to truth and virtue, the same right, undoubtedly, has Jerome or Epiphanius to question the propriety of his decision. If the apostles thought fit, on their own authority, to recommend to their own followers the practice of celibacy, it was not beyond the authority of any one among those followers to declare himself of a contrary opinion. Or, supposing the recommendation to have been a command, yet, provided that command was given in their capacity of ecclesiastical rulers only, their successors in the government of the church would have, at least, an abstract right to reverse that decree when it seemed to them expedient. Wherefore, indeed, do we appeal in controversy to the apostolic writings, rather than to the more learned volumes of Origen, of Clemens, of Augustin, of Chrysostom, if we do not appeal to them as the dictates of God himself? It is in vain to say, nor will it, I apprehend, be urged in answer, that because Peter or James or John are in certain cases inspired, whatever falls from their mouth is therefore to be received as sacred, whether they are at that time inspired or no. Such an answer would be obnoxious to all the difficulties attendant on the old hypothesis of a permanent inspiration, with the additional and yet more portentous absurdity of ascribing that weight to human authority which the other only imputed to Divine. Who is Paul? Who is Barnabas? Who are James or John or Peter, that we should put our trust in them, if our trust be not reposed in them as the accredited messengers of the Allwise and Alltrue? But, is it the messenger himself whom we honour and obey; or is it not rather that royal message which he bears to all the nations of the world, the subjects and children of Him who sitteth on the throne, the redeemed of the Lamb that was slain? If, then, the speech or the epistle on which we are commanded to build our faith, be not the authentic message of God, the only claim is gone which the messenger possessed on our belief, our obedience, and our attention; and the sentiments of John, of Peter, and of Paul will possess no more authority than the private opinion of an herald or ambassador, abstracted from that law or treaty which only speaks his master's will. And these observations may suffice to show the weak and inconsistent conduct of those who restrict the inspired commission of the apostles to the delivery of certain important truths, which they style the essentials of Christianity. With them it is indeed a frequent boast, that by renouncing the plenary inspiration of Scripture, they deprive, in many instances, the common enemies of the Faith, of that vantage ground from which they have been long accustomed to assail it. And it is, certainly, convenient, in their controversies with other and more orthodox Christians, to reply to such texts as are urged against their peculiar opinions, that the apostles have in these instances spoken without authority; or that, however they themselves may have been enabled to "think with the wise," it was no part of their commission to do otherwise than "talk with the vulgar."

But it is the misfortune of the Scythian mode of warfare, that it is only suited to a territory, which, like Scythia, is little worth preserving; and that the practice once begun, of abandoning to the pursuer whatever parts of Scripture it does not exactly suit us to defend, no means of defence will at length remain for those tenets themselves which we now regard as of vital importance. If it be advanced and admitted, that for any point of faith the assertions of Scripture are not sufficient authority; if St. Paul, for instance, were mistaken or insincere in his expressions as to the existence of evil spirits, or the immaterial nature of the soul of man; what reason have Christians for their confidence, that a future state of retribution may not be a faulty inference from insufficient grounds, or a compliance with Jewish error? How are we to be sure that, on the Unity of God himself, the apostles themselves may not have mistaken their Master, or that the Son of God has not, in this instance, conformed (as, they blush not to tell us, he, in the case of the Demoniacs, conformed his manner of expression) to the established usages of speech, and the popular superstition of his countrymen?

Nor is the case much bettered by supposing with Simon and Warburton, that, though of the New Testament, only a few conspicuous truths are immediately prompted by the Holy Ghost, yet in all the rest the human recollection and reason of the apostles were so restricted by a superintending Providence, that nothing can be found in their volumes by which a material error can be introduced into faith or practice. For that is, indeed, a wretched sanction of a law, to plead that no harm can arise from following its letter; nor does any man obey the Scriptures as a rule of faith and conduct, because there is no danger in such obedience, but because we incur the greatest of all dangers by a contrary course of behaviour, a danger no less than that of disobeying Him whose detailed and definite injunctions are made known by these his testimonies. We cannot, if we would, disguise it from ourselves; if the general inspiration of the Scriptures be not conceded, the Scriptures are not the word of God; and, if not the word of God, then have they no rational hold on our faith, our practice, our hopes, or our fears. They are the law of the Most High, or denouncing, as they do, the vengeance of God against all wilful transgressors of their precepts, that holy name is used by them without authority, and their contents are imposture and blasphemy.

If, then, a written law be necessary to the extension and perpetuity of religion; and if the qualities of a religious law can be only possessed by a rule of God's dictation, it is beforehand to be strongly presumed, that a law which corresponds both to one and the other of these particulars has not been withheld from the followers of Jesus of Nazareth. And this probability is yet farther increased by a consideration of the analogy of God's previous conduct with the Israelites under the Mosaic dispensation. It is no essential part of my present purpose (though it is a task which, on a proper occasion, I should certainly not decline) to demonstrate the general inspiration of the Scriptures of the elder Covenant: but it is sufficient for my argument to adduce the acknowledged fact, that certain written laws were given by divine inspiration to the Hebrew Church; that Moses was commanded by Jehovah to write down his words in a book; and that the Prophets announce their volumes to the world as the express and infallible dicta of the Most High. But, if a written code of faith and morals be as necessary to the followers of Christ as to those who were taught by Moses, it is probable that the advantage, which was graciously accorded to the introductory and less perfect dispensation, would be, a fortiori, conceded to those on whom the adoption and the ends of the world are come.

In vain, indeed, was it promised by the Messiah to his chosen Twelve, that the Comforter which was to come, should guide them into all religious truth, if the truths thus revealed were to perish with themselves, or their cotemporaries and immediate audience. In vain did the Spirit implant in the minds of his messengers a perfect remembrance of every word which their departed Lord had spoken, if those blessed words were again to be entrusted to the dubious recollection, or still more dubious integrity, of their human and unassisted successors. I do not mean, that the leading facts on which our Christian faith is grounded might not continue in full force of evidence, and deserve by their native dignity our fullest reverence and wonder, though the writings in which they are recorded were degraded from the rank which they now maintain to the level of human compositions. In point of fact this is even now the case, inasmuch as no one in his senses would begin to prove the life, and death, and miracles, and resurrection of our Lord from the previous assumption, that the histories which we possess of those occurrences were inspired and infallible compositions: but, as unfolding to us the secret springs of Providence, by which those facts were caused, and the results to which those facts conducted; as affording an authoritative rule of life, and, on certain conditions, a no less infallible assurance of immortality; if the Scriptures are reduced to the level of a human composition, their force and efficacy are gone.

We might still believe that Christ was born, and wrought miracles, and died, and rose again: but those awful scenes of power and suffering and victory would present, in such a case, no further and no better practical results to the soul, than the tale of Agamemnon or of Œdipus. It would not more necessarily follow from the resurrection of one man, that all mankind should be raised from the dead, than it would follow from the manner of his death, that all mankind should, like him, be crucified, or that they should rise, if they rose, on the third day after their dissolution. It was for God alone to declare, (and, if the Scriptures be not inspired, I know not where he has declared it,) it was for God to declare, in what respect and for what reason our Lord was the representative of the universal human race. And, if this declaration has been nowhere made, we are dust and ashes still.

And, this probability that some written law would be given to men, which arises from the necessity of such an assistance, is materially increased by the circumstance of that inspiration which, we know from Scripture, was, at times accorded to the unpremeditated discourses of the apostles. There were, we know, occasions, when it was not the preachers of the gospel who spake, but the Holy Ghost who dwelt within them; and, if those orations whereby they themselves alone were delivered from violence; if that preaching by which the immediate hearers only were benefitted, were instinct with such a sacred power, it might be expected, on still stronger grounds, that the same good guidance would not abandon them in the composition of those writings which were to edify a people yet unborn, and to convey the glad tidings of salvation to the extremest corners of the earth, and to the latest march of time. If the κεῦφοι καὶ πτηνοὶ λόγοι were not suffered to go forth without a peculiar and supernatural Providence, is it probable that those documents which are the κτήματα ἐς ἀεὶ of believers, the κειμήλια of our faith, our hope, our daily practice, our apology and our crown among men, should not be stamped with the same broad seal of Almighty truth, the same credentials of infallibility?

It was naturally, therefore, to be expected, that some certain writings of the Apostles would be sent forth under the direction of God's Spirit; and, if this be once conceded, it will not be easy on any ground of reason or likelihood to deny this sacred character to those treatises which are come down to us under their names. They are marked by every character of official and authoritative documents; they are addressed by inspired men in their prophetic capacities, either to the general Church of Christ, or to the particular branches into which that Church was divided, or to individuals who fitly represented considerable bodies of Christians. And whether immediately addressed to individuals or no, they are alike on subjects of public importance; subjects where, of all others, the aid of the Holy Ghost was most needful and most to be expected; the exposition, namely, of the doctrines of the Christian faith, or the regulation of the Christian republic. Nor, however slightly it has been of late years usual to appreciate the value of tradition, can it be denied, that the universal prejudice (if it deserved no better name) which, in the very earliest ages of the church, received as Divine those writings which they then esteemed authentic, must lead us to suppose that these solemn instructions were communicated by the Apostles themselves, and received by those for whose benefit they were intended, with some very perceptible and striking difference from such of their communications, if any such there were, as were dictated by their human reason or their private friendship only: and that, (as St. Paul is acknowledged to have done, in one remarkable passage of his Epistle to the Corinthians,) they observed in every instance a broad and constant line of demarcation between the dictates of the Most High, and the opinion or request of a simple fellow-creature.

And that the Apostles themselves laid claim to a divine authority for the principles and precepts laid down in the several works which are read in the assemblies of the faithful, is apparent from many expressions in those works themselves. In one of them St. Paul addresses the Corinthians, as "an ambassador for Christ," "as though God did beseech them by him." "If any man," he observes, "think himself to be a Prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge those things which I write unto you, that they are the commandments of the Lord." Nor should we omit that the Epistles of Paul are mentioned by St. Peter on the same footing, and in the same manner, with the avowedly inspired writings of the Old Testament, and that the author of the Apocalypse professes to have written, by the express dictation of the Spirit, to the churches of Asia Minor. That objection, then, is no less futile than common, which was first advanced by Spinoza against the doctrine for which I contend, that the Apostles themselves make no claim to inspiration in favour of their writings. And, indeed, as it is a distinction utterly immaterial, whether a man say, "This is the Lord's message," or, "I the messenger of the Lord speak this to you;" the ordinary superscription of "Apostle of Christ," which precedes the greater number of the treatises contained in the New Testament, is an assertion no less absolute of official and inspired authority, than if they were explicitly entitled "The Word of the Lord which came to his servant Paul," or introduced themselves to our attention and reverence by the old prophetic formula of "Thus saith Jehovah."

With still less reason has Spinoza urged, in answer to such claims as these, that St. Paul himself has, on a certain occasion, expressed himself as doubtful whether he spake by inspiration or no; and that, in another and yet more remarkable passage, he cautions his hearers against receiving that particular sentence as any other than his private opinion. The first of these passages has been very clearly explained to be no otherwise than an ironical reproof of those who affected to doubt his apostolic powers. With the solution which Horbery has given of the second, I acknowledge that, ingenious as it is, I am not altogether satisfied. But, in truth, on the principle that exceptio probat regulam, this passage, as it is usually understood, is among the strongest proofs of the general inspiration of Scripture; inasmuch as no one would state in his discourses or letters that for such or such particular expressions he was himself to answer, unless he intended to imply, that in the remainder of his address he spoke from another and a higher authority. Nor is the same objector much more fortunate, when he urges against the inspired authority of the Christian Scriptures, that the Apostles, by their frequent appeals to human reason, surrender tacitly the character of God's heralds and instruments, for that of human doctors and disputants. "It is the part," he tells us, "of the Almighty, as it is the part of any absolute sovereign, to command, not to argue: since not only where the will of a sovereign is expressed is argument on the expediency of that will superfluous; but since the very use of argument or persuasion to induce men to obey implies, in itself, a deficiency of power to compel obedience."

But all these circumstances, so inconsistent, as we are told, with the notion of a celestial command, are found in the writings of our New Testament; and it is therefore concluded, that whatever value they may possess as faithful histories of supernatural facts, or judicious expositions of natural and moral duties, they can have none as authoritative declarations of the will of Him whose will alone is sufficient ground of obligation and obedience.

I have given this objection thus at length, because it is, I believe, the foundation, in many instances, of that reluctance which has been so prevalent, to ascribe to our Scriptures the honour which they may justly claim; and because, from its plausibility, it calls for a more satisfactory answer than the learned Simon, in whose Critical History I first saw it, has, in my opinion, supplied. His answer may be reduced to the following assertions: "That prophecy is not to be confounded with enthusiasm; that the Spirit of God which supplied the Apostles with supernatural knowledge did not extinguish or overpower their natural reason or their previous human acquirements; and that it was permitted them to employ both the one and the other of these lights for the purpose of persuading the people."

Now this is nothing else than to admit that, though the subject matter of the argument be divine, and though the facts which is intended to illustrate be communicated absolutely and infallibly, the arguments and illustrations arise from the Apostles themselves, and are, properly speaking, no part of God's revelation. But this, while it is an admission of the utmost delicacy and danger, is by no means a sufficient answer to the objection advanced by the unbeliever; since, if it became, as he supposes, the Almighty, on all occasions where he taught his creatures at all, to teach them dogmatically and peremptorily; it became him no less to direct the tongue or pen of his inspired Apostles in the manner most suitable to his dignity. And, above all, it would have been, on their part, a frantic presumption, to endeavour to supply, by their own glosses or observations, any supposed deficiency in the message of him by whom they were employed. It is more to the purpose to show, (and the means of doing so are fortunately in the Christian's power), that it is unworthy neither of an earthly nor an almighty sovereign to convince and persuade his subjects to obedience; and that there are precedents, to which Spinoza at least could not have objected, where Jehovah has not in his own person disdained to apply to the natural reason and former experience of his people Israel.

If the question were of power alone, it might, indeed, become the majesty of kings to enforce a blind and mechanical obedience to every dictate of their will or wisdom; and it might be sufficient for the King of kings to produce by a single fiat whatever effect he now produces by the intervention of the human will, and by discovering to his creatures such motives for action, as, by their free and affectionate service, may produce the result desired. But the earthly monarch, who proposed the first of these as the object of his highest ambition, instead of the leader of men, would be the driver of cattle only: the Deity who should rule his creatures by the single operation of necessity, would be degraded into the regulator of a machine. But, if it be more worthy of a righteous king to make his people subjects than slaves; if a good God be more excellently glorified by the grateful duty of his offspring, than by the mere accomplishment of certain purposes by the weight of overruling authority; if goodness and wisdom are, both with men and God, more illustrious attributes than strength or eminent station; it can excite no wonder that both should, on certain occasions, convince where they might compel, and persuade where it was in their power to command. If it were unworthy of God to set forth in a true light to mankind the reasonableness of that service which he requires at their hands, or that confidence which it is his pleasure that they should place in him; if he could not, without too much condescension, enforce and explain the motives whereby he seeks to influence us; the same objection would lie with equal justice against the proposition of any motives whatever; and the promise of definite rewards, and the threat of definite punishments, would be superfluous alike in him who might, without warning or explanation, pour forth the full measure of his wrath on those who presumed to doubt or disobey. But if it be not unworthy of an allwise Being to govern mankind by those passions and those rational powers which he has implanted in them, no reason can be given why the same great Teacher should not illustrate and explain, as seems best to himself, from the principles of human reason and experience, those discoveries which he proposes to us whether of his nature or his will.

Accordingly, in the whole tenour of the Old Testament, we find that the Almighty has pursued this course with his people. It is thus that (before he condemns, by the mouth of Samuel, the disobedience of the first king of Israel) he enlarges on the benefit which he had in the first instance conferred, and the ingratitude with which Saul had repaid them. It is thus that, in the fifth chapter of Isaiah, Jehovah calls on the men of Judah themselves, to judge "what more could have been done than he had done for his vineyard?" Thus, too, he explicitly invites, in the first chapter of the same prophet, his people to "reason" with their God, when he urges on their common sense the inutility of that vain parade of sacrifice and outward honour whereby the wicked hoped to conciliate him. Will it be contended, that the prophets in these instances speak from themselves and on their own responsibility? Then are they in the strictest sense of the word impostors; for every one of these passages, no less than innumerable others which might be cited to the same effect, are introduced by them as the message, nay, as the words of Jehovah. But would Spinoza have openly ventured to refuse a divine authority to those laws which God in person pronounced to his assembled nation, under every imaginable circumstance of supernatural majesty and terror? If not, then, certainly we need seek no further precedent wherein the Ruler of the world has vouchsafed to argue with men, since even then he scorned not to deduce his claim on their obedience from the mercies which they had received from him, and to assign as a reason why they should keep his laws, that he was their God, who had brought them out of the house of bondage. The Almighty, doubtless, may draw his children "with the cords of a man," he may humble his language to our conceptions, and exact from us a service reasonable as well as implicit, without degrading his dignity in those dispensations whereby his love is chiefly magnified. For all which we have received at his hands be to him all praise and glory; but for this above all, that, by enduing us with power to know him in part as he is, he has called forth and concentrated the best and most pleasurable affections of our nature, and enabled us to build an image to him in our hearts, to whose awful beauty we may direct our prayers, and whose perfect excellence we may, at humble distance emulate!

But, though the practice of reasoning with his creatures be far, very far indeed, from degrading to the Almighty Teacher; yet is there much plausibility in one observation of Spinoza, against which Simon heavily inveighs; "that there is, in the very act of reasoning, a submission to the sentence of others; and that arguments, by whomsoever advanced, do, inasmuch as they are arguments, challenge refutation." The same may be said, indeed, of every mode by which the Allwise has manifested to mankind his existence, his nature, or his will, since, even in the case of a visible glory, the question might arise, whether the vehicle employed were worthy of him whom it represented; and since, when God condescends for our instruction to become an historian or a lawgiver, he subjects himself, whether he makes use of argument or no, to those rules of criticism by which we decide on human compositions. And if in any of those particulars for which human works are condemned, the work which claims to proceed from him be found defective, though it would be preposterous impiety to attribute error of any kind to God, it would be a conclusion warranted by every principle of reason and reverence, that a composition unworthy of our most exalted ideas of God did not, in truth, proceed from him. Accordingly, if we produce the Scriptures to the world as a code of laws or narrative of events of divine and infallible authority, we may be reasonably expected to prove against all assailants, either that the volume which we revere is both in manner and matter faultless and unimpeachable, or that the faults of its human promulgators are not inconsistent with that aid and authority of the Holy Ghost, which the terms of infallibility and inspiration in their natural sense imply.

But the objections of the infidel are directed at once against the style and the matter of those works whose merits we are now discussing, since in both, as we are told, is the volume of the New Testament assailable. "Its language is, at best, the language of a Jewish Greek: its arguments and assertions, by the confession of one of its own prophets, occasionally hard to be understood; of its contents there are some which its authors might have well supplied from their natural recollection or their natural reason only; and some so trifling, that its seems little less than blasphemy to ascribe them to any higher source than common prudence or civility. Nor is this all. There are circumstances, trifling circumstances indeed, and which, if they occurred in a work of human skill, would be altogether unworthy of reprehension, where the authority of Scripture is at variance with itself, or with uninspired but credible testimony."

Of these imputations, it would be easy to show, and it has, in fact, been often shown satisfactorily, that by far the greater part of the passages on which they depend will by no means bear up the consequences which infidelity has sought to raise on them. As some however will still be found, which the best and wisest of men have deemed it easier to evade than explain, it is necessary and it is sufficient to demonstrate, that the allegations, where they are accurate, do not apply to their intended purpose, and that we have still ample grounds for ascribing to every part of the New Testament, a sufficient though not an equal share of Divine inspiration and authority.

I say, a sufficient but not equal share, because as the works of which our sacred volume is composed are of many different kinds, and have been produced under circumstances extremely dissimilar, it would be unreasonable to expect the same sort or measure of celestial aid to be accorded to all indiscriminately; and it is on every principle of argument sufficient, if we can show that none of them have been without that degree of help which would identify their authority with the divine instructions.

And, here, it will be allowed on all hands, that inspiration and infallibility must, in their strictest sense, be predicated of those expressions which, as they follow in order, have been immediately dictated by God. Such are those ordinances and messages in the Book of Moses, and in the ancient prophecies, where the Almighty himself exactly specifies the sentences to be written down; so that, though the translation of such passages into another language be liable, beyond a doubt, to human error and infirmity, in the original at least, not only the purport but the style and arrangement are truly and exclusively Divine. And, so far as such passages extend, those lofty claims to literal inspiration for which the Jews are ridiculed by Warburton, and the proverbs and parables whereby they were accustomed to illustrate and enforce the sanctity, not of the words alone but of the letters and particles of letters, "every jot and tittle of their law," were justifiable, unobjectionable, and laudable, inasmuch as that form of words, which God himself made use of, must needs have been, of all others, the best, and best suited to his purpose.

And, though there are very few passages, (two or three at most there are,) in the course of the New Testament, which are given as the very words of the Almighty Father, or as proceeding from either of the other Persons of the Trinity, in their divine and eternal nature; yet can there be no doubt that the words of the Son while on earth are, no less than these, the accents of infinite wisdom and goodness, and that they merit as much of reverence from his followers as those which, before his incarnation, he addressed to the tribes in Horeb, or which, after his exaltation, he spake to St. Paul or St. John. Were error, then, detected here, the most reverent conclusion which we could draw would be, that the Apostles had mistaken their Master; a conclusion at once decisive against the inspiration of the work which they have given us. But, concerning the sentiment and wisdom of our Lord's discourses, we have not, even with infidels, any controversy. And, as these divine expressions were, when uttered, in a different language from that in which they are transmitted to our time, the question of their style and grammatical accuracy must naturally fall under another branch of our inquiry, since, however, the followers of Christ profess to have been divinely assisted in the recollection of their Master's words, they, in no instance that I am aware of, lay claim to any celestial aid in their translation.

Nor will this admission in the slightest degree contravene the inspired authority of the New Testament, since, secondly, a written document may properly be called inspired, when the sentiments and ideas which its words convey are suggested by the Holy Ghost; though the words in which those sentiments are clothed be entirely left to the human and unassisted genius of the writer. And this is that species of assistance which was especially promised by Christ to the original teachers of his Gospel, whom the Comforter was to guide, we are told, into all religious truth, but of whom it is no where said, that the Spirit should put his power in their lips, or that he should enable them to express to others their own internal perceptions with supernatural force of sacred eloquence. Nor is that opinion either improbable in itself, or inconsistent with the pretensions of the sacred writers, which apprehends that the Holy Ghost might thus illuminate the inward man with knowledge which the favoured individual was not necessarily qualified to disclose to mankind, with all that energy or clearness of diction which, if the same good Spirit had so pleased, it was, doubtless, in his power to have conferred. If a prophetic vision were exhibited to Amos, the herdsman of Tekoa, it by no means followed that he should be able to describe what he had seen in the same pomp of diction and glow of colouring as the high-born poet Isaiah. Had Newton been, in other respects, uneducated, his discoveries in astronomy would neither have improved his elocution nor his style. And if we suppose, what we cannot help supposing, that the ideas communicated by Almighty power would affect the mind precisely in the same manner with those which are generated by memory or reflexion, it is apparent that the process by which ideas are presented or combined is altogether distinct from that by which they are clothed in those conventional signs, which convey to other men the result of our internal meditation. How often do we conceive with force and clearness, what we are unable at the moment to express with elegance or fluency? And what closer connexion does there exist between the original conception and the choice of words, than between the choice of words and the hand-writing? It was possible, then, to be inspired with a knowledge of celestial truth, without any corresponding improvement in natural or artificial eloquence. That wisdom which committed, in the first instance, to earthen vessels, the treasures of eternal life, might be expected, by a parity of reason, to leave the vessels earthen still; and the fisherman of Galilee, when elevated into a prophet, might retain, nevertheless, all the original simplicity of his character, and all the imperfections of his education.

Accordingly, though the Apostles were full of the Holy Ghost, that internal illumination did not prevent the Sanhedrim from reading in their manners and dialect their original ignorance and obscurity; and the revelation entrusted to St. Paul would no more make him a Demosthenes, than the revelation of which Moses was the minister, corrected his imperfect utterance.

The defects, then, of Scriptural language, were they really no less numerous and striking than infidels pretend, would be no solid objection to the hypothesis, that "all Scripture was given by the inspiration of God." It may be thought, indeed, that, as the Hellenistic dialect which is imputed to the New Testament was the usual language of the race for whose instruction it was, in the first instance, intended; so it could never be expected that the Almighty should miraculously interfere to perplex the Jews of Macedon and Asia with refinements of which they could not feel the force, and with peculiarities which, however consecrated in our opinion by the talent and elegance of Athens, were to them unusual, and, if I may use the expression, barbarous. Nor are Christians compelled to maintain, on the one hand, the purity of every passage in the written Word, nor to confess, on the other, that the Holy Ghost has dictated solecisms. With a becoming zeal for the honour of the sacred text; with a due admiration of the real beauties of Scripture; but confessing with Augustin, that the matter, not the words, of Revelation is entitled to the epithet of Divine; they may watch, with much composure, the harmless malice of their enemies exhausted on those peculiarities of language and of style, which, as specimens of Greek, may, perhaps, offend, but, as evidence of the Hebrew extraction of their authors, are, in themselves, a sufficient proof, that the volume of our Scripture is really the production of those Apostles who only, of the Hebrew race, had authority with Gentile believers.

The observations which I have made on the grammatical incorrectness of Scriptural language will apply with equal force to its real or supposed obscurity. It is no part of my present purpose to enter into the disputed question, whether the words of St. Peter refer to the mysterious nature of those circumstances which his brother Apostle had imperfectly explained to the faithful, or to the darkness of his style in speaking of them. It is sufficient for my argument to have shown, that admitting to its full extent the cavil of the infidel objector, its consequences could not affect the Divine authority of Scripture, inasmuch as a composition may merit the name of inspired, though the ideas only, and not the forms of expressing them, be suggested by the Spirit of God. And it is apparent, that as, on the one hand, we cannot, from the necessity of the case, and the constant deference which the Apostles claim to their written sentiments, deny this share at least of Divine assistance to the doctrinal and controversial treatises of the New Testament; so will even this be completely sufficient for those ends for which only inspiration has ever been accorded, "for doctrine," that is, "for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness."

But, thirdly, a composition is also inspired, when circumstances to which we have ourselves been formerly witnesses are preserved or renewed in our recollection, by the influence of the Almighty, in more vivid colours and with an accuracy more perfect than was possible to our unassisted faculties. For, as that which we have forgotten may be, undoubtedly, no less properly a subject of inspiration than that which we have never known; so is the wonder no less, and the Divine interposition as immediate, which prevents us from forgetting that which we could not, without such an aid, have remembered. And, in the case of our Saviour's discourses while on earth, there is an absolute promise that the apostles should be assisted with this supernatural and infallible power of recollection or memory, inasmuch as the Comforter was not only to guide them into truth, but "to bring all things to their remembrance, whatsoever their Lord had said unto them." And, though a miracle be, doubtless, never wrought unnecessarily, yet would nothing less than a miracle be, apparently, required, to enable men of no extraordinary parts, and strangers, as were the apostles, to those arts and habits whereby only we acquire the power of accurately reporting conversations, to retain, after twenty or forty years interval, with that degree of accuracy which the nature of the case demanded, those words of our Saviour on which so many leading features of the Christian faith depend. Nor will any doubt remain of this necessity to those who shall reflect how few persons are to be found, I will not say among peasants only, but among those who are most in the habits of attention and correctness, who, even a single month after they had once heard it, would be able to repeat or write down a discourse like that which Jesus held on the mountain, or that yet more difficult one from which the words of my text are taken.

Where facts are concerned, there is not, indeed, the same necessity for Divine assistance as in the case of words; since not only are facts more easily committed to memory and more stubbornly retained than words or arguments can be; but since the errors which might be expected in their detail are of far less importance than those which may arise from a mistaken turn of expression or from the omission, in a sentence, of any connecting or explanatory member.—For one person in the lower or middling ranks of society who is competent to repeat the exact expressions of another, five thousand may be found who are adequate witnesses to what they see him do or suffer; and, if the supernatural influence of the Holy Ghost were necessary to enable the apostles to remember and relate the discourses of their Lord with the accuracy which such blessed instruction merited, it might seem, on the other hand, that they could hardly, without a miracle, forget any material circumstance of those most wonderful facts "which their eyes had seen and their hands had handled." It may be thought, therefore, with some apparent reason, that when we have proved the miraculous nature of the assistance given to the apostles in the doctrinal parts of the New Testament,—we have already proved all which is necessary to the faith or practice of Christians, and that, while the words of Christ are reported to us by supernatural and infallible authority, we may safely commit the certainty of his actions to that same human evidence on which we at first believed them.

Michaelis accordingly maintains, and I myself was once of the same opinion, that though the promise of our Lord is express as to the Holy Ghost assisting the apostles to recollect his words, yet we have not the same grounds in Scripture for supposing that, in relating every particular occurrence of his life, they were to possess the same infallible accuracy. But though the promise, it must be allowed is not so explicit, and though the necessity, it will be granted readily, is neither so urgent nor so uniform, of divine assistance in relating historical events as it has been shown to be in the case of oral communications; yet it is certain that the Spirit's guidance into all truth must imply a perfect accuracy in every circumstance, at least, where religious truth is concerned: and that, as there is no recorded action of our Lord which can be regarded as unimportant to the belief or imitation of his followers,—so are there some facts relating to him recorded in the New Testament, which, without celestial illumination it was impossible its authors should have known; others, of which it is not, perhaps, too much to say, that no human testimony would be of itself, sufficient to establish them; and others, yet more, where a human error in the narrative would have conducted to consequences exceedingly dangerous to our faith or practice. And as, in all these instances, the necessity of the case would induce us to expect that they would not be deprived of divine assistance,—so there is a case exactly in point, from the analogy of which we may infer that such assistance has been actually, in these instances, accorded to them. When Paul was to be instructed, as an apostle, in the circumstance of our Saviour's life and doctrine, it might have appeared to men to be sufficient had God referred him for information to his elder brethren in the Church and to those who themselves had eaten and drank in the presence of his Son. But though, as it should seem, an adequate knowledge might have been thus acquired of Christ's behaviour during the last supper,—yet we find that these particulars were not entrusted to the memory of even an apostle, but were made the subject to St. Paul of an immediate revelation from the Lord. An equal help, we may reasonably conclude, would be given wherever it was equally important; and in relating the deeds no less than the words of Christ, the recollection of the sacred writers would be, absolutely, therefore, infallible.

And it may be, at the same time observed, that such assistance as is here described, since it does not amount to the internal suggestion of a new idea to the soul, but simply to the preservation or revival of an idea originally suggested by the natural and external process, is, therefore, perfectly consistent with that character to which the Evangelists lay claim, of witnesses speaking from their own distinct experience and recollection, and by their separate testimonies, confirming the veracity of each other. For, the promise of our Lord is not that the Holy Ghost should prompt to the Apostles what testimony they ought to bear, (in which case I am ready to allow that the Holy Ghost himself, and not his human organ, would be the person who bore witness;) but that the Holy Ghost should enable them to give better and more accurate evidence of what they had heard than they could otherwise have been considered or expected to be. But if, of two witnesses, the one had, by an artificial system of memory, or by notes taken at the time, acquired the power of speaking after a lapse of years, more positively to certain facts or expressions than his companion could do, we should, certainly, not consider his testimony as on that account less valuable, nor, as I conceive, less genuine and authentic. The manner in which the knowledge was first obtained is the single point on which the question of originality depends; and, let the help be what it may by which that knowledge has been preserved or refreshed, that help can do no more than add probability or certainty to the natural recollection of the witness.

And there is yet another way in which the assistance of the Holy Ghost may be useful and necessary, even where all our knowledge had been acquired and retained by our outward experience and natural abilities; and that is by suggesting, out of several circumstances or expressions of which all are equally remembered, the selection of those particulars which are best adapted to the instruction and advantage of ourselves, or of those for whom we are writing. Nor can we think it improbable that in this manner also, the narratives of the apostles are inspired, since, in the circumstances which they have recorded of the life and conversation of Christ, so little is to be found whereby mere curiosity is gratified; and since, notwithstanding the brevity of the Gospels, the picture which they afford of the character of Jesus is at once so complete and instructive. It is possible, therefore, for inspiration to be useful and even necessary, though the circumstances which we relate are such as we have in our own persons witnessed; and there is no room for saying that, when we suppose the grant of God's assistance to the narratives of Matthew and John, we suppose a needless miracle.

It is, at the same time, certain that, wherever the aid of the Holy Ghost is bestowed, whether to suggest, or preserve, or discriminate, the results of such aid will be of an authority alike divine, and the doctrine or example which they convey alike imperatively binding on the obedience and the faith of Christians. Though the propositions which are thus selected and approved should have been, in the first instance, advanced by human craft or wisdom, yet will the choice of the Holy Ghost establish them as the adopted word of God; nor will that be less infallible to which he has set the seal of his assent, than that which immediately proceeded from him. If a celestial messenger had recommended to our faith and obedience some certain pasages in Plato or in Porphyry, would it be doubted that, whatever were the general character of those authors or their productions, the words thus cited would be, thenceforth, the laws of the Most High? At the same time, though such particular passages would be thereby invested with divine authority, it is plain that the question would remain untouched, whether the writings from which they were taken were inspired or no, and whether they were, in truth, the production of those authors whose names they bore. And we thus may understand how the human learning and human diligence of an apostle might, no less than the use of previous documents, be perfectly consistent with the internal dictation of God's Spirit, and that whatever truth was found in an apocryphal or heathen writer might be suggested by their celestial guide to James or Jude or Paul, without subscribing to the general contents or prophetic dignity, whether of the books of Enoch or Aratus or Epimenides.

That any part of Scripture can be found where inspiration was an useless or superfluous blessing, is a doctrine, then, not easy to be maintained. Undoubtedly, it will be difficult to show that those passages in the Epistles which have been chiefly instanced as too trivial to call down a celestial interference, were really unimportant to the persons whom they, in the first instance, concerned, or in the instruction which the Church might, in after ages, draw from them. The salutations which St. Paul, in his official writings, addresses to particular believers, may have produced a moral effect of the strongest and most beneficial character, as so many testimonies of that approbation with which the Holy Ghost himself beheld their inward feelings and their outward conduct. The books and garment which were left at Troas have furnished more than one important lesson to the Christian world; and where the apostle reproves, in his epistle to Timothy, the excessive abstinence of his disciple, a testimony is borne which a Prophet might fitly bear against those ascetic doctrines which were, thus early, invading Christianity, and which imposed, at length, on the faithful a yoke of unprofitable restrictions, as grievous and as manifold as the burden of that law which they had cast down.

Should this be thought, however, to savour of scholastic refinement, I can perceive no inconsistency with that character to which the Scriptures lay claim as an inspired and infallible rule of faith and practice, if, in circumstances where the unassisted powers of the writer's intellect were amply sufficient to answer the purposes of Providence, we should admit that the Prophet was left to his private judgment. When the counsel was given, or the discovery made, which it was the object of the Holy Ghost to enforce or communicate, it can excite no surprise, that, though the heavenly voice was silent, the Apostle might still conclude his letter with the usual forms of salutation to his friends, or with the mention of his private necessities. Where the Evangelist was already in perfect possession of the fact, or where a trifling inaccuracy could have no practical effect on the faith or life of his brethren, the tenor of the history might proceed, it may be thought, as before, though the historian had in that instance to depend on himself alone. All that can be in such case required is, that celestial aid should be supplied, wherever human authority was insufficient; and that a broad and competent line of demarcation should be established between such divine and earthly ingredients as might mingle in the same treatise or history. And while we are assured of the first of these necessary circumstances by the promise, that the Spirit of God should guide us into all needful truth: so the reason of the case, and our knowledge of those definite objects which Scripture has in view, might seem amply sufficient for the second.

If, then, it be objected, lastly, against the divine authority of the New Testament, that, in the narratives which the Evangelists have severally furnished, there are certain difficulties which the followers of Christ have not yet been able to reconcile, we may demand, in explanation of this charge,—whether the circumstances objected to can properly be said to belong to the actions or doctrines of our Saviour, or whether they are not, on the other hand, of a nature strictly secular,—and very slightly and incidentally, if at all, connected with the Life and Gospel of Jesus Christ?

On the first of these suppositions the Christian is, indeed, very deeply concerned to vindicate the integrity of that work which is his charter to immortal life. In the second case, it will be enough to reply that, if the infallibility of the Apostles extended to every single circumstance in which their mission was interested; it was neither to be expected nor desired, nor does their Heavenly Teacher ever give us to understand that the same supernatural accuracy should be possessed by them in their incidental mention of men and topics unconnected with that errand for the due performance of which alone they either needed or hoped for inspiration. It was the history and doctrines of the Son of God which they profess to give to the world:—and it is something too much to impeach the divine authority of their narrative on subjects worthy of celestial interposition, because, on points of no importance they were, possibly, left to themselves.

It is certain, however, that the seeming inaccuracies of the Evangelists and whatever variations have been most insisted on by infidels in the accounts which those Evangelists have severally furnished, belong exclusively to such details as, whether true of false, are neither subjects capable of a religious faith,—nor by any possibility affecting our practice; variations which can do no more, at most, than leave their reader under some degree of hesitation as to the hour of the crucifixion, the title on the cross, or the year in which our Saviour drove forth the money-changers from his temple. I do not mean that the difficulties which I have instanced may not be, and have not been satisfactorily solved, and that without impeaching in the smallest degree the accuracy of the sacred historian; nor will I dissemble that confidence which a Christian may be well allowed to feel, that such discrepancies as yet remain to try our faith and our humility will, hereafter, in God's good time receive their perfect solution. It is a proverb of the Jews, that when Elias shall come, every knot of their sacred book shall be loosed; and we may safely trust that a greater than Elias will vindicate at his second coming the truth of his written word, and that of the genuine Gospel, as of the genuine Pentateuch, no jot or tittle shall pass away. Meantime, however, I am most anxious to prove, that mistakes in points where inspiration did not properly apply can by no means derogate from the inspired character of a work in those respects where inspiration was either needed or promised. I am desirous to impress on your minds that circumstances, which, whether true or false, have no possible bearing on the doctrine or character of Christ, may belong, indeed, to his history, but are no essential parts of his Gospel; and that we may admit the New Testament as an unerring and imperative rule in every point of belief or of practice, though we should be for ever ignorant of the year in which Cyrenius governed Syria, or whether the apostate Judas met his fearful end by strangulation or by rupture. Above all it has been mine aim to show that by the Comforter whom Christ foretold, and by those blessed aids which he has for Christ's sake dispensed to mankind, the faithful of every age and nation are, no less than the Apostles themselves, infallibly conducted to that truth which is in Jesus: and that "for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness," the Scriptures of the last, no less than of the former covenant, is "given by the inspiration of God.

Nor do we expect, nor do we desire those further aids to knowledge and to holiness which the Romanists would seek for in the authority whether of their collective Church, or of a single ecclesiastical officer. To us it seems presumptuous and unreasonable, when a rule has been given by God himself, to go on demanding at his hands another and yet another criterion; to peer about, in the full blaze of sunshine, for the beams of a supplementary star; or to subject the inspiration of the immediate Apostles of our Lord to the authoritative decision of their, surely, less enlightened successors. But, neither in the ancient synagogue, nor in that primitive Church which the Messiah formed on its model, is any claim to be found, when their language is rightly apprehended, to a privilege so extraordinary as that of themselves interpreting the charter whence they derived their authority. In things indifferent, and in controversies between the brethren, the sentence of the Church was unquestionably binding on the conscience of all its members. But where God and man were parties, they could express their opinion only; and the most awful denunciation which they had it in they power to utter, is a confession of their own incompetency. The anathema, of which so formidable ideas are entertained, is in its very terms no other than an appeal to the final judgment of that Lord who shall hereafter come in glory; that Lord before whom, as before his proper Master, every individual must stand or fall; and whose laws must be applied by every individual for himself to his own case, and at his own exceeding peril.

If, then, the Scriptures be, as these pretend, obscure, they are obscure to those who perish. No remedy was provided under the elder covenant for those to whose instruction neither Moses nor the prophets sufficed; nor does St. Peter in the New (though in a case where he admits the difficulty of God's word) direct the ignorant and unstable to apply for further light to himself or his Roman successors. Nor, indeed, is it intelligible, even on the established principles of popery, in what manner the rescripts of their pontiff, and the decrees of their council, could produce, any more than the ancient books of Scripture, the effects which they fondly ascribe to them. Unless the inspired interpreter were omnipresent as well as infallible, his edicts must, no less than every other composition, whether human or divine, be liable to perversion or cavil. If the secular arm be withdrawn, it may be suspected that the sentence of a council will not very greatly avail with those by whom the words of Peter or Paul are evaded or despised; nor will any solid satisfaction be afforded by the cumbrous mazes of the canonists and schoolmen, to those weak brethren who have already lost their way in the narrow compass of one little volume.

But, in the essentials of salvation, and to those who sincerely desire to be taught of God, are the Scriptures really obscure? Let those bear witness, whom, by these means alone, the Spirit of God has guided into all necessary truth! Let those bear witness who have fled from the perturbed streams of human controversy to this source of living water, whereof "if a man drink he shall never thirst again." Let the mighty army of the faithful bear witness, who, believing no less than they find, and desiring to believe no more, have worshipped in simplicity of heart, from the earliest ages of the Messiah's kingdom, the Father, the Son, and the comfortable Spirit of God! I do not, God forbid that I should in this place, and before so many of those who must hereafter unite their amplest stores both of classical and sacred learning in his cause from whom we have received all things!—I do not deny the efficacy, the propriety, the absolute necessity of offering our choicest gifts of every kind on the altar of that religion to whose ministry we are called, and of concentrating all the lights of history and science to the illustration of these wonderful testimonies. But, though, to illustrate and defend the faith, such aids are, doubtless, needful, the faith itself can spring from no other source than that volume which alone can make men wise to everlasting salvation, that engrafted word which, though the ignorant and unstable may wrest it to their own destruction, is, to those who receive it with meekness and with faith, the wisdom and the power of God.

By this book the Paraclete has guided the church into whatever truths the church of Christ has, at any time, believed or known; by this book and the doctrine which it contains, he has convinced the world of sin, and justified the Son of Man from the malicious slanders of his enemies; by this book he consoles us for the absence of our Lord, and instructs us in things to come; by this he reigns; where this is found his kingdom reaches also; by this weapon, proceeding from the mouth of God, shall the enemies of his Christ be at length extirpated from the world; and by this, it may be thought, as by the rule of God's approbation, shall the secrets of all hearts be, finally, made known, in that day when "whosoever is not found written in the book of life, shall be cast into the lake of fire."

Wherefore, holy brethren, partakers of the spiritual gift, seeing that we have not followed after cunningly devised fables, let us, each in his station, abound in the labour of the Lord, diffusing as we may that saving knowledge, the possession of which alone could make it expedient for the disciples of Christ that their Master should depart and leave them! And let us pour forth, above all, our fervent prayers to that Almighty Spirit, who hath given us these Holy records of his will, that, by his supporting grace, they may bring forth in us the fruit of holiness, and the harvest of life without end, through the mercies of the Father, the merits of the Son, and the strong protection of the Comforter.

HISTORY

OF THE

PROGRESS AND SUPPRESSION

OF THE

REFORMATION IN SPAIN

IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

BY THOMAS M'CRIE, D. D.

PREFACE.

THE following work is a sequel to that which I lately published on the Reformation in Italy, and completes what I intended as a contribution to the history of that memorable revolution in the sixteenth century, which, in a greater or less degree, affected all the nations of Europe.

More than twenty years have elapsed since I inserted, in a periodical work, a short account of the introduction of the reformed opinions into Spain, and the means employed to extirpate them. The scanty materials from which that sketch was formed have gradually increased in the course of subsequent reading and research. My earliest authority is Reynaldo Gonzalez de Montes, a Protestant refugee from Spain, who in 1567 published at Heidelberg, in Latin, a Detection of the Arts of the Spanish Inquisition, interspersed with anecdotes of his countrymen who had embraced the Protestant faith, and containing an account of such of them as suffered at Seville. That work was immediately translated into English, and underwent two editions, to the last of which is subjoined an account of Protestant martyrs at Valladolid. Another contemporary authority is Cypriano de Valera, who left Spain for the sake of religion about the same time as De Montes, and has given various notices respecting his Protestant countrymen in his writings, particularly in a book on the Pope and the Mass, of which also an English translation was published during the reign of Elizabeth.

These early works, though well known when they first made their appearance, fell into oblivion for a time, together with the interesting details which they furnish. As a proof of this it is only necessary to mention the fact, that the learned Mosheim translated the meagre tract of our countrymen Dr Michael Geddes, entitled, The Spanish Protestant Martyrology, and published it in Germany as the best account of that portion of ecclesiastical history with which he was acquainted.

Additional light has been lately thrown on the fate of Protestantism in Spain by the Critical History of the Spanish Inquisition, compiled by Don Juan Antonio Llorente, formerly secretary to the Inquisition of Madrid. Though confusedly written, that work is very valuable, both on account of the new facts which the official situation of the author enabled him to bring forward, and also because it verifies, in all the leading features, the picture of that odious tribunal drawn by De Montes and other writers, whose representations were exposed to suspicion on account of their presumed want of information, had the prejudices which, as Protestants, they were supposed to entertain. Llorente was in possession of documents from which I might have derived great advantage; and it certainly reflects little honour on Protestants, and especially British Protestants, that he received no encouragement to execute the proposal which he made, to publish at large the trials of those who suffered for the reformed religion in his native country.

The other sources from which I have drawn my information, including many valuable Spanish books lately added to the Advocate's Library, will appear in the course of the work itself.

My acknowledgments are due to Dr. Friedrich Biallobloztky, who kindly furnished me, from the University Library or Göttingen, with copious extracts from the dissertation of Busching, De Vestigiis Lutheranismi in Hispania, a book which I had long sought in vain to procure. For the use of a copy of De Valera's Dos Tratados, del Papa y de la Missa, now become very rare, as well as of other Spanish books, I am indebted to the politeness of Samuel R. Block, Esquire, London.

The general prevalence, both among Spaniards and others, of the mistaken notion that the Spanish Church was at an early period dependent on the See of Rome, has induced me to enter into minuter details in the preliminary part of this work than I should otherwise have thought necessary.

CHAPTER I.

Review of the Ecclesiastical History of Spain before the era of the Reformation.

Erroneous opinions as to their early history, originating in vanity, and fostered by ignorance and credulity, have been common among almost every people. These are often harmless; and while they afford matter of good-humoured raillery to foreigners, excite the more inquisitive and liberal-minded among themselves to exert their talents in separating truth from fable, by patient research, and impartial discrimination. But they are sometimes of a very different character, and have been productive of the worst consequences. They have been the means of entailing political and spiritual bondage on a people, of rearing insurmountable obstacles in the way of their improvement, of propagating feelings no less hostile to their domestic comfort than to their national tranquillity, and of making them at once a curse to themselves and a scourge to all around them.

If the natives of Spain have not advanced those extravagant pretentions to high antiquity which have made the inhabitants of some other countries ridiculous, they have unhappily fallen under the influence of national prejudices equally destitute of truth, and far more pernicious in their tendency. Every true Spaniard is disposed to boast of the purity of his blood, or, in the established language of the country, that he is "an Old Christian, free from all stain of bad descent." The meanest peasant or aritizan in Spain looks upon it as a degradation to have in his veins the least mixture of Jewish or Moorish blood, though transmitted by the remotest of his known ancestors, in the male or female line. To have descended from that race, "of which, as concerning the flesh, Christ came," or from Christians who had incurred the censure of a tribunal whose motto is the reverse of his who "came not to destroy men's lives but to save them," is regarded as a greater disgrace than to have sprung from savages and pagans, or from those who had incurred the last sentence of justice for the most unnatural and horrid crimes. "I verily believe," says a modern Spanish writer who sometimes smiles through tears at the prejudices of his countrymen, "that were St. Peter a Spaniard, he would either deny admittance into heaven to people of tainted blood, or send them into a corner, where they might not offend the eyes of the Old Christian." We might go farther, and say, that if a Spaniard had the keys of heaven in his keeping, St. Peter, and all the apostles with him, would be "removed into a corner." It is easy to conceive what misery must have been felt by persons and families who have incurred this involuntary infamy in their own estimation, or in that of their neighbours; and what bitter and rancorous feelings must have been generated in the hearts of individuals and races of men living together or contiguously, both in a state of peace and of warfare.

But, when the records of antiquity are consulted, the truth turns out to be, that in no other country of Europe has there been such an intermixture of races as in Spain—Iberian, Celtic, Carthaginian, Roman, Greek, Gothic, Jewish, Saracennic, Syrian, Arabian, and Moorish. With none are the Spaniards more anxious to disclaim all kindred than with Jews and Moors. Yet anciently their Christian kings did not scruple to form alliances with the Moorish sovereigns of Grenada, to appear at their tournaments, and even to fight under their banners. Down to the middle of the fifteenth century, the Spanish poets and romancers celebrated the chivalry of "the Knights of Grenada, gentlemen though Moors." It was no uncommon occurrence for the Christians in Spain to connect themselves by marriage with Jews and Moors; and the pedigree of many of the grandees and titled nobility has been traced up to these "cankered branches" by the Tizon de Espana, or Brand of Spain, a book, which neither the influence of government, nor the terror of the Inquisition, has been able completely to suppress. Nor is greater credit due to the opinion which has long been prevalent in the Peninsula, that its inhabitants have uniformly kept themselves free from all stain of heretical pravity, and preserved the purity of the faith inviolate since their first reception of Christianity.

The ancient state of the church in Spain is but little known. Modern writers of that nation have been careful to conceal or to pass lightly over those spots of its history which are calculated to wound the feelings or abate the prejudices of their countrymen. Shut out from access to original documents, or averse to the toil of investigating them, foreigners have generally contented themselves with the information which common books supply. And knowing that the Spaniards have signalized their zeal for the See of Rome and the catholic faith during the three last centuries, the public, as if by general agreement, have come to the hasty conclusion that this was the fact from the beginning. To correct such mistakes, and to furnish materials for an accurate judgment, it may be proper to take a more extensive view of the state of religion in Spain before the Reformation, than would otherwise have been necessary to our undertaking.

The ecclesiastical history of Spain during the three first centuries may be comprised in two facts,—that the Christian religion was early introduced into that country; and that churches were erected in various parts of it, notwithstanding the persecution to which they were exposed at intervals. All beside this is fable or conjecture. That the gospel was first preached to their ancestors by St. James, the son of Zebedee, is an opinion which has been long so popular among the Spaniards, and so identified with the national faith, that such of their writers as were most convinced of the unsound foundation on which it rests have been forced to join in bearing testimony to its truth. The ingenuity of the warm partizans of the popedom has been put to the stretch in managing the obstinate fondness with which the inhabitants of the Peninsula have clung to a prepossession so hazardous to the claims of St. Peter and of Rome. They have alternately exposed the futility of the arguments produced in its support, and granted that it is to be received as a probable opinion, resting on tradition. At one time they have urged that the early martyrdom of the apostle precludes the idea of such an expedition; and at another time they have tendered their aid to relieve the Spaniards from this embarrassment, and to "elude the objection," by suggesting, with true Italian dexterity, that the Spirit might have carried the apostle from Palestine to Spain, and after he had performed his task, conveyed him back with such celerity that he was in time to receive the martyr's crown at Jerusalem. By such artful managements, they succeeded at last in settling the dispute, after the following manner; that, agreeably to the concurring voice of antiquity, the seven first bishops of Spain were ordained by St. Peter, and sent by him into the Peninsula; but that, as is probable, they had been converted to the Christian faith by St. James, who despatched them to Rome to receive holy orders from the prince of the apostles; from which the inference is, that St. James was the first who preached the gospel to the Spaniards, but St. Peter was the founder of the church of Spain.* Leaving such fabulous accounts, which serve no other purpose than to illustrate human credulity, and the ease with which it was wrought upon by artifice and cunning, we proceed to the period of authentic history.

The facts which we have to bring forward may be arranged under three heads:—the doctrine of the ancient church of Spain; her government; and her worship.

I. Sentiments which by common consent have been regarded as heretical, without as well as within the pale of that church which arrogates to herself the title of catholic, sprang up repeatedly in Spain, and in some instances overran the whole country. In the fourth century, Priscillian, a native of Gallicia, founded a new sect, which united the tenets of the Manichæans and Gnostics. It made many converts, including persons of the episcopal order, and subsisted in Spain for two hundred years. When they boast of the pure blood of the Goths, the Spaniards appear to forget that their Gothic

* A curious specimen of the managements referred to in the text is to be seen in the alterations made on the Roman Calendar. Cardinal Quignoni obtained the following insertion in the Rubric, referring to St. James the elder: "He went to Spain, and preached the gospel there, according to the authority of St. Isidore." (Breviarum Paul III.) A change more agreeable to the Spaniards was afterwards made: "Having travelled over Spain, and preached the gospel there, he returned to Jerusalem." (Brev. Pii. V.) This having given offence to Cardinal Baronius and others at Rome, the following was substituted: "That he visited Spain and made some disciples there, is the tradition of the churches of that province." Brev. Clementis VIII.) If the former mode of expression gave great offence at Rome, this last gave still greater in Spain. The whole kingdom was thrown into a ferment; and letters and ambassadors were despatched by his Catholic Majesty to the Pope, exclaiming against the indignity done to the Spanish nation. At last the following form was agreed upon, which continues to stand in the Calendar: "Having gone to Spain, he made some converts to Christ, seven of whom being ordained by St. Peter, were sent to Spain as its first bishops." (Brev. Urbani VIII.)

ancestors were Arians, and that Arianism was the prevailing and established creed of the country, for nearly two centuries. Nor did Spain long preserve her faith uncontaminated, after she had adopted the common doctrine under Reccared, who reigned in the close of the sixth century. To pass by the spread of Nestorianism and some tenets of less note, she gave birth, in the eighth century, to the heresy called the adoptionarian, because its disciples held that Christ is the adopted Son of God. This opinion was broached by Elli-pand, archbishop of Toledo, who was at the head of the Spanish church; it was vigorously defended by Felix, bishop of Urgel, a prelate of great ability; and maintained itself for a considerable time, in spite of the decisions of several councils, supported by the learning of Alcuin and the authority of Charlemagne.

Nor were there wanting in the early ages Spaniards who held some of the leading opinions afterwards avowed by the protestant reformers. Claude, bishop of Turin, who flourished in the ninth century, and distinguished himself by his valuable labours in the illustration of the scriptures, was a native of Spain. His decided condemnation of the worship of images, and of the veneration paid to the relics and sepulchres of the saints, together with his resistance to the ecclesiastical authority which imposed these practices, has exposed the memory of this pious and learned divine to the deadly hatred of all the devotees of superstition and spiritual despotism. In support of his principle tenet, Claude could plead the authority of one of the most venerable councils of his native church, which ordained that there should be no pictures in churches, and that nothing should be painted on the walls which might be worshipped or adored.

Galindo Prudentio, bishop of Troyes, was a countryman and contemporary of Claude. His learning was superior to that of the age in which he lived; and the comparative purity of his style bears witness to his familiarity with the writings of the ancient classics. Having fixed his residence in France, he enjoyed the confidence of Charlemagne, who employed him in visiting and reforming the monasteries. In the predestinarian controversy which divided the French clergy of that time, he took part with Goteschalcus against Hincmar, archbishop of Rheims, and the noted schoolman, Joannes Scotus, surnamed Erigena. The sentiments which Prudentio held on that subject, bear a striking resemblance to those which the church of Rome has since anathematized in the writings of Luther and Calvin.

II. The Spanish church, at the beginning of the fourth century, acknowledged no other officers than bishops, presbyters, and deacons. She was equally a stranger to the superior orders of metropolitans and archbishops, and to the inferior orders of sub-deacons and lectors. Her discipline was at that time characterised by great strictness and even rigour, of which there was a palpable relaxation when the government of the church came to be formed upon the model of the empire, after Constantine had embraced christianity. This change was, however, introduced more slowly into Spain than into some other countries. The church of Africa was careful to guard the parity of episcopal power against the encroachments of the metropolitans; and the Spanish bishops, who appear from an early period to have paid great deference to her maxims and practices, continued for a considerable time to evince the same jealousy. To the supremacy of the bishops of Rome the ancient church of Spain was a stranger, and there is no good evidence that she acknowledged, during the eight first centuries, their right to interfere authoritively in her internal affairs.

The titles of pope or father, apostolical bishop, and bishop of the apostolic see, were at first given promiscuously to all who were invested with the episcopal office. After they came to be used in a more restricted sense, they were still applied to a number in common. The bishops of Rome early acquired high consideration among their brethren, founded on the dignity of the city in which they had their residence, the number of the clergy over whom they presided, and the superior sanctity of life by which some of their line had been distinguished; to which must be added the opinion, which soon became general, that they were the successors of St. Peter. In matters which concerned religion in general, or in difficult questions relating to internal managements, it was a common practice to ask the advice of foreign and even transmarine churches. On these occasions the bishops of Rome were consulted, but not to the exclusion of others. The African bishops, in a council held at Carthage, agreed to take the advice of Siricius, bishop of Rome, and Simplician, bishop of Milan, on the affair of the Donatists; and in a subsequent council they agreed to consult Anastasius and Venerius, who at that time filled the same seats, on the controversy respecting the validity of the baptism of heretics. With this the practice of the Spanish church agreed. Indeed, the bishops of Rome, in those days, disclaimed the pretensions which they afterwards put forth with such arrogance. Gregory the Great himself, when in danger of being eclipsed by his Eastern rival, acknowledged this in the memorable words which have so much annoyed his successors and their apologists. Speaking of the title of universal patriarch, which the bishop of Constantinople had assumed, he says:—"Far from the hearts of Christians be this name of blasphemy, which takes away the honours of the whole priesthood, while it is madly arrogated by one! None of my predecessors would ever consent to use this profane word, because if one patriarch is called universal, the rest are deprived of the name of patriarchs."

But there is positive evidence that the ancient church of Spain maintained its independence, and guarded against the interference of the Roman see, or any other foreign authority. Whatever judgment we form concerning the disputed canon of the council of Sardis, as to references to the bishop of Rome, it is certain that an African council, which met at Mela in the year 416, decreed that if any of the clergy had a dispute with his bishop, he might bring it before the neighbouring bishops; but if he thought proper not to rest in their decision, it should be unlawful for him to make any appeal except to an African council, or to the primates of the African churches. In accordance with the spirit of this canon, with some variation in particulars, the ninth council of Toledo, in the year 655, determined that appeals should lie from a bishop to a metropolitan, and from a metropolitan to the royal audience; a regulation which was confirmed by a subsequent council held in the same city. In the fifth and sixth centuries Arianism was predominant in Spain. During that period the bishops who adhered to the orthodox faith being few in number, discountenanced by the royal authority, and rarely allowed to assemble in provincial councils, were naturally induced to turn their eyes to Rome for counsel and support; while the popes laid hold of the opportunity which the circumstances afforded them to extend their influence over that country, by holding correspondence with the dissenting clergy, and conferring on some of them the title of apostolical vicars. But, strange as the assertion may appear to some, this intercourse ceased as soon as Spain embraced the catholic faith.

Spain is always spoken of as a catholic country from the time that she renounced Arianism under Reccared; and if we are to believe some of her writers, her monarchs obtained, at that early period, the title of Catholic kings, which they retain to this day, as expressive of their devotion to the faith and authority of the Roman see. But this is a glaring mistake, originating in, or concealed by the equivocal use of a word which was anciently understood in a sense very different from its modern acceptation. It was by adopting the common doctrine received by the church at large, in opposition to the Arian and other errors condemned by the first ecumenical or universal councils, that Spain became catholic, and that her kings, bishops and people, obtained this designation, and not by conforming to the rites of the church of Rome, or owning the supremacy of its pontiffs. Ecclesiastical affairs were managed in Spain without any interference on the part of the See of Rome, or any reference to it, during the whole of the century which elapsed after the suppression of Arianism. This is so undeniable, that those advocates of the pontifical authority who have examined the documents of that age, have been forced to admit the fact, and endeavour to account for it by saying, that such interference and reference was unnecessary during a peaceful state of the church; a concession which goes far to invalidate the whole of their claims. The pall sent from Rome to Leander, bishop of Seville, forms no exception to the remark now made; for, not to mention that it was never received, it was not intended to confer any prerogative upon him, but merely as a testimony to his sanctity, and a mark of personal esteem from pope Gregory, who had contracted a friendship with him when they met at Constantinople. It was of the nature of a badge of honour conferred by a prince on a deserving individual belonging to another kingdom.

There is one piece of history which throws a great light on the state of the Spanish church during the seventh century, and which I shall relate at some length, as it has been either passed over or very partially brought forward by later historians. The sixth ecumenical council, held at Constantinople in the year 680, condemned the heresy of the Monothelites, or those who, though they allowed that Christ had two natures, ascribed to him but one will and one operation. In 683, Leo II., bishop of Rome, sent the acts of that council, which he had received from Constantinople, to Spain, requesting the bishops to give them their sanction, and to take measures for having them circulated through their churches. As a council had been held immediately before the arrival of the papal deputation, and a heavy fall of snow prevented the re-assembling of the members at that season, it was thought proper to circulate the acts among the bishops, who authorised Julian, archbishop of Toledo, to transmit a rescript to Rome, intimating in general their approbation of the late decision at Constantinople, and stating at considerable length the sentiments of the Spanish Church on the controverted point. A council, convened at Toledo during the following year, entered on the formal consideration of this affair, in which they proceeded in such a manner as to evince their determination to preserve at once the purity of the faith and the independence of the Spanish church. They examined the acts of the council of Constantinople, at which it does not appear that they had any representative, and declared that they found them consonant with the decisions of the four preceding canonical councils, particularly that of Chalcedon, of which they appeared to be nearly a transcript. "Wherefore (say they) we agree that the acts of the said council be reverenced and received by us, inasmuch as they do not differ from the foresaid councils, or rather as they appear to coincide with them. We allot to them therefore that place in point of order to which their merit entitles them. Let them come after the council of Chalcedon, by whose light they shine." The council next took into consideration the rescript which archbishop Julian had sent to Rome, and pronounced it "a copious and lucid exposition of the truth concerning the double will and operation of Christ;" adding, "wherefore, for the sake of general instruction, and the benefit of ecclesiastical discipline, we confirm and sanction it as entitled to equal honour and reverence, and to have the same permanent authority as the decretal epistles.

The council of Constantinople had condemned pope Honorius I. as an abettor of the Monothelite heresy; a stigma which the advocates of papal infallibility have laboured for ages to wipe off. But the Spanish council, on the present occasion, proceeded farther, and advanced a proposition which strikes at the very foundation on which the bishops of Rome rest their claims, by declaring, that the rock on which the church is built is the faith confessed by St. Peter, and not his person or office.

But this was not all that the Spanish clergy did. When the rescript of the archbishop of Seville reached Rome, it met with the disapprobation of Benedict II., who had succeeded Leo in the popedom. Having drawn up certain animadversions upon it, his holiness gave them to the Spanish deputy to communicate to his constituents, that they might correct those expressions savouring of error which they had been led incautiously to adopt. An answer, not the most agreeable to the pope, was returned by Julian in the mean time; and the subject was afterwards taken up by a national council held in 688 at Toledo. Instead of retracting their former sentiments, or correcting any of the expressions which the pope had blamed, the Spanish prelates drew up and sanctioned a laboured vindication of the paper which had given offence to his holiness, of whom they speak in terms very disrespectful, and even contemptuous. They accuse him of "a careless and cursory perusal" of their rescript, and of having passed over parts of it which were necessary to understand their meaning. He had found fault with them for asserting that there are three substances in Christ, to which they reply: "As we will not be ashamed to defend the truth, so there are perhaps some other persons who will be ashamed at being found ignorant of the truth. For who knows not that in every man there are two substances, namely, soul and body?" After confirming their opinion by quotations from the fathers, they add: "But if any one shall be so shameless as not to acquiesce in these sentiments, and acting the part of a haughty inquirer, shall ask, whence we drew such things, at least he will yield to the words of the gospel, in which Christ declares that he possessed three substances." Having quoted and commented on several passages of the New Testament, the council concludes in these terms: "If, after this statement, and the sentiments of the fathers from which it has been taken, any person shall dissent from us in any thing, we will have no farther dispute with him, but keeping steadily in the plain path, and treading in the footsteps of our predecessors, we are persuaded that our answer will commend itself to the approbation of all lovers of truth who are capable of forming a divine judgment, though we may be charged with obstinacy by the ignorant and envious."*

III. The independence of the ancient church of Spain will appear more fully if we attend to its form of worship. All the learned who have directed their attention to ecclesiastical antiquities are now agreed that, although the mode of worship was substantially the same throughout the Christian church, during the fourth, fifth, and sixth centuries, yet different liturgies or forms of celebrating divine service were practised in different nations, and sometimes in different parts of the same nation. The Ambrosian liturgy, used by the church of Milan, differed from the Roman. It was adopted in many parts of France, and continued in use there until the time of Charlemagne, when it was supplanted by the Roman or Gregorian. So far was the church of Rome from having at first regulated the religious service of other churches by her laws or even by her example, that she did not even preserve her own forms, which were superseded in their most important parts, by the sacramentary or missal which has drawn up by pope Gelasius, corrected finally by Gregory at the close of the sixth century, and imposed gradually, and at distant periods, on the several divisions of the western church. Different offices, or forms of celebrating divine service, were used in Spain down to the year 633, when the fourth council of Toledo passed a decree that one uniform order should be observed in all the churches of the Peninsula. This decree led to the adoption of that liturgy which has been called the Gothic, and sometimes the Isadorian, or the Ildefonsian, from St. Isidore and Ildefonso, archbishops of Seville, by whom it was revised and corrected. That this ritual was quite different from the Roman or Gregorian is put beyond all doubt, by the references made to both in the course of the adoptionarian controversy, which raged in the eighth century. The patrons of the adoptionarian tenet in Spain appealed to their national ritual, "compiled by holy men who had gone before them," and quoted passages from it as favourable to their views. To this argument the fathers of the council of Frankfort replied: "it is better to believe the testimony of God the Father concerning his own Son, than that of your Ildefonso, who composed for you such prayers, in the solemn masses, as the universal and holy church of God knows not, and in which we do not think you will be heard. And if your Ildefonso in his prayers called Christ the adopted Son of God, our Gregory, pontiff of the Roman see, and a doctor beloved by the whole world, does not hesitate in his prayers to call him always the only begotten." In like manner Alcuin, after insinuating that they might have taken improper liberties in their quotations, says: "but it matters not much whether these testimonies have been altered or correctly quoted by you; for we wish to be confirmed in the truth of our assertion and faith by Roman rather than Spanish authority.

The Gothic or Isidorian office has also been called the Mozarabic or Mixtarabic, probably because it was used and held in great veneration by the Christians in Spain who lived under the dominion of the Arabians or Moors. The identity of these formularies has, indeed, been of late disputed by several learned men. But it is most probable that they were originally the same office, and that alterations were made upon it, both by the Mozarabes and the Montanes, (as those were called who betook themselves to the mountains to escape the yoke of the Moors), during the period that they lived under.

* Concil. Tolet. XV. post symbolum; Labbe, VI. 1296—1303, Hardum, III. 1752—1767. Coustant, at a greater expense than that of contradicting himself, labours to do away, or rather to conceal, the indignity offered to the Roman see, and the disregard shown to its authority, by the procedure of the Spanish councils. He allows that the fourteenth council of Toledo "arrogated to itself an unjust authority, and openly departed from obedience to the Holy see;" that "it adopted a new and unheard-of method of approving of the decisions of a general council;" and that, on these accounts, "none of its decrees were admitted to a place in the collection of sacred canons." But he asserts that the fifteenth council of Toledo "manifestly amended their doctrine concerning the three substances;" that "Julian" (as if the decree had been his only, and not that of a national council,) "sometimes makes use of words rather too free, though somewhat obscure, against Rome; and that, upon the whole, he changed or explained his former sentiment, agreeably to the admonition of the Roman Pontiff." Yet he grants, or rather pleads, that this "apology," as he calls it, was not approved at Rome; is angry with those writers who speak in its defence; and concludes by saying, that "this blemish on the well-constituted church of Spain should be a perpetual monument to teach the churches of all other nations to revere the one sure, infallible and supreme judgment of the Holy see, in matters of faith and of manners."—(De Antiq. Eccl. Hispanæ, tom. ii. p. 55—59.)

Other instances in which the worship of the ancient church of Spain differed widely from the modern might be produced. We have already mentioned that a national council, in the beginning of the fourth century, prohibited the worship of images, and the use of pictures in churches. It may be added, that the first council of Braga, held in the year 561, forbade the use of uninspired hymns, which came afterwards to be tolerated, and were ultimately enjoined under the highest penalties.

Having produced these facts as to the early opinions and usages of the Spanish church, we proceed to state the manner in which she was led to adopt the rites, and submit to the authority of the church of Rome.

In the eleventh century Spain was divided into three kingdoms—the kingdom of Leon and Castile, of Aragon, and Navarre, of which the two first were by far the most powerful. In the latter part of that century, Alfonso, the sixth of Leon, and first of Castile, after recovering Valentia by the valour of the famous Cid, Ruy Diaz de Bivar, finally obtained possession of Toledo, which had been in the power of the Moors for three centuries and a half. He had married, for his second wife, Constance, a daughter of the royal house of France, who, from attachment to the religious service to which she had been accustomed, or under the influence of the priests who accompanied her, instigated her husband to introduce the Roman liturgy into Castile. Richard, abbot of Marseilles, the papal legate, exerted all his influence in favour of a change so agreeable to the court which he represented. The innovation was warmly opposed by the clergy, nobility, and people at large, but especially by the inhabitants of Toledo and other places which had been under the dominion of the Moors. To determine this controversy, recourse was had, according to the custom of the dark ages, to judicial combat. Two knights, clad in complete armour, appeared before the court and an immense assembly. The champion of the Gothic liturgy prevailed; but the king insisted that the litigated point should undergo another trial, and be submitted to, what was called, the judgment of God. Accordingly, in the presence of another great assembly, a copy of the two rival liturgies was thrown into the fire. The Gothic resisted the flames and was taken out unhurt, while the Roman was consumed. But upon some pretext—apparently the circumstance of the ashes of the Roman liturgy curling on the top of the flames and then leaping out—the king, with the concurrence of Bernard, archbishop of Toledo, who was a Frenchman, gave out that it was the will of God that both offices should be used; and ordained, that the public service should continue to be celebrated according to the Gothic office in the six churches of Toledo which the Christians had enjoyed under the Moors, but that the Roman office should be adopted in all the other churches of the kingdom. The people were greatly displeased with the glaring partiality of this decision, which is said to have given rise to the proverb, The law goes as kings choose. Discountenanced by the court and the superior ecclesiastics, the Gothic liturgy gradually fell into disrepute, until it was completely superseded by the Roman.

The introduction of the Roman liturgy had been undertaken rather more early in Aragon than in Castile, but was completed in both kingdoms about the same time. The modern inhabitants of the Peninsula please themselves with the idea that they are hearing the self-same mass which has been performed in Spain from the days of the apostles; whereas, the exact day and place in which the modern service began, can be pointed out. The first mass, according to the Roman form, was celebrated in Aragon in the monastery of St. Juan de la Pena, on the 21st of March 1071; and in Castile, in the Grand Mosque of Toledo, on the 25th of October 1086. Gregory VII. commemorates this change, "as the deliverance of Spain from the illusion of the Toledan superstition." His holiness was more clear-sighted than those moderns, who, looking upon all forms of worship as equal, treat with contempt or indifference the efforts made by the people to defend their religious rights against the encroachments of domestic, or the intrusions of foreign authority. The recognition of the papal authority in Spain followed upon the establishment of the Roman liturgy; nor would the latter have been sought with such eagerness, had it not been with a view to the former. Having once obtained a footing in the Peninsula, the popes pushed their claims, until at last the whole nation, including the highest authorities in it, civil as well as ecclesiastical, acknowledged the supremacy of the Roman see.

It is sufficient to exemplify this statement in the subjugation of the crown and kingdom of Aragon. Don Ramiro I., who died in 1063, was the first Spanish king, according to the testimony of Gregory the Great, who recognised the pope and received the laws of Rome. In 1201, Don Pedro II., eight years after he had ascended the throne, went to Rome, and was crowned by pope Innocent III. On that occasion his holiness put the crown on his head in the monastery of Pancracio, after Pedro had given his corporal oath that he and all his successors would be faithful to the church of Rome, preserve his kingdom in obedience to it, defend the catholic faith, pursue heretical pravity, and maintain inviolate the liberties and immunities of the holy church. Then going to the chapel of St. Peter, the pope delivered the sword into the hands of the king, who, armed as a cavalier, dedicated all his dominions to St. Peter, the prince of the the apostles, and to Innocent and his successors, as a fief of the church; engaging to pay an annual tribute, as a mark of homage and gratitude for his coronation. In return for all this his holiness granted, as a special favour, that the kings of Aragon, instead of being obliged to come to Rome, should afterwards be crowned in Saragossa, by the archbishop of Tarragona, as papal vicar. This act of submission was highly offensive to the nobility, who protested for their own rights, and to the people at large, who complained that their liberties were sold, and power given to the popes to disturb the peace of the kingdom at their pleasure. It was not long before these fears were realized. The king, having a few years after offended the pope by taking arms in defence of heretics, was laid under the sentence of excommunication, for violating the oath which he had sworn; and his grandson, Pedro the Great, was deprived of his kingdom, as a vassal of the church, which kindled a civil war, and led to the invasion of Aragon by the French. Attempts to release themselves from this degrading vassalage were made by different monarchs, but these always issued in the renewal of their oaths of fealty to Rome; and they found it too late to throw off a yoke which had by this time been received by all the nations around them, and which they had taught their own subjects to revere and hold sacred.

The history of Spain during the period we are reviewing, furnishes important notices respecting the Waldenses, Vaudois or Albigenses, whom we formerly met with in tracing the progress of the Reformation in Italy. It is well known, that these early reformers had fixed their abode in the southern provinces of France, where they multiplied greatly in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Various causes contributed to this. The inhabitants of the south of France, though inferior in arms, were superior in civilization, to those of the north. They had addicted themselves to commerce and the arts. Their cities, which were numerous and flourishing, enjoyed privileges favourable to the spirit of liberty, and which raised them nearly to the rank of the Italian republics, with which they had long traded. They possessed a language rich and flexible, which they cultivated both in prose and verse; academies for promoting the Gui Saber, or polite letters, were erected among them; and the Troubadours, as the Provençal poets were called, were received with honour, and listened to with enthusiasm, at the courts of the numerous petty princes among whom the country was divided. A people advanced to this stage of improvement were not disposed to listen with implicit faith to the religious dogmas which the clergy inculcated, or to submit tamely to the superstitious and absurd observances which they sought to impose. Add to this, that the manners of the clergy, both higher and lower, in these provinces, were disorderly and vicious to a proverb. "I would rather be a priest, than have done such a thing!" was a common exclamation among the people on hearing of any unworthy action. With these feelings they were prepared to listen to the reformers, who exposed the errors and corruptions which had defaced the beauty of the primitive church, and whose conduct formed, in point of decency and sobriety, a striking contrast to that of the established clergy. For the last mentioned fact we have the testimony of those monkish writers, who strove to blacken their characters, by alleging that they practised all kinds of licentiousness in secret. "I will relate (says the abbot Puy Laurens) what I have heard bishop Fulco tell as to a conversation which he had with Pons Ademar de Rodelia, a prudent knight. 'I cannot bring myself to believe,' said the latter, 'that Rome has sufficient grounds to proceed against these men.'—'Are they not unable to answer our arguments?' demanded the bishop. 'I grant it,' said the other. 'Well, then,' rejoined the bishop, 'why do you not expel and drive them from your territories?' 'We cannot do it,' replied the knight; 'we have been brought up with them; we have our friends among them; and we see them living honestly.' After relating this anecdote on the authority of the archbishop of Thoulouse, the great adversary of the Albigenses, the historian adds: "Thus it is that falsehood, veiled under the appearance of a spotless life, draws uncautious men from the truth."

The Albigensian bards, or pastors, enjoying a respite from persecution during the early part of the twelfth century, applied themselves to the study of the Scriptures, and devoted their hours of relaxation to the cultivation of poetry. They were held in veneration by the people, who named them in their wills, and left for the support of the new worship those sums which had been formerly bequeathed to the priests or appropriated for the saying of masses for their own souls and those of their departed relations. They had chapels in the principal castles; their religious service was frequented by persons of all ranks; and they numbered among their converts many individuals of noble birth, and who held some of the principal situations in the country. Among their protectors were the powerful counts of Toulouse, Raymond VI. and VII., the counts of Foix and Comenges, the viscounts of Beziers and Bearn, Savary de Mauleon, seneschal of Aquitaine, Guiraud de Minerve, and Olivier de Termes, a cavalier who had distinguished himself greatly in the wars against the infidels in the Holy Land, in Africa and in Majorca. Their opinions were avowedly entertained by the wives and sisters of these great lords, as well as by the heads of the noble houses of Mirepoix, Saissac, Lavour, Montreal, St. Michael de Fanjaux, Durfort, Lille-Jourdain, and Montsegur.

When we have stated these facts, we have said enough to account for the implacable hostility to this sect on the part of the ruling ecclesiastics, and the bloody crusades preached up against it by the monks, and conducted, under the direction of the popes, by Simon de Montfort and Louis VIII. of France, during the early part of the thirteenth century. By means of these the attempted reformation of the church was suppressed, and its disciples nearly exterminated; one of the finest regions of the world was laid waste by countless and successive hordes of barbarous fanatics—its commerce destroyed, its arts annihilated, its literature extinguished; and the progress of the human mind in knowledge and civilization, which had commenced so auspiciously, was arrested and thrown back for ages.

The intimate connection which subsisted between Spain and the South of France had great influence on the fate of the Albigensian reformers. Provence and Languedoc were at that time more properly Aragonese than French. As count of Provence, the king of Aragon was the immediate liege lord of the viscounts of Narbonne, Beziers, and Carcassone. Avignon and other cities acknowledged him as their baronial superior. The principal lords, though they did homage to the king of France or to the emperor, yielded obedience in reality to the Spanish monarch, lived under his protection, and served in his armies. And several of them, by gifts from the crown, or by marriages, possessed lands in Spain.

In consequence of this connection between the two countries, some of the Vaudois had crossed the Pyrenees and established themselves in Spain as early as the middle of the twelfth century. They appear to have enjoyed repose there for some time; but in the year 1194, pope Celestin III. sent the cardinal St. Angelo as legate to attend a council at Lerida, who prevailed on Alfonso II. king of Aragon, to publish an edict, ordering the Vaudois, Poor Men of Lyons, and all other heretics, to quit his territories under severe pains. This edict not having produced any effect, was renewed three years after by Pedro II., in consequence of a decree of a council held at Gironna. With the view of securing the execution of this measure, the subscriptions of all the grandees of Catalonia were procured to the decree; and all governors and judges were required to swear before the bishops, that they would assist in discovering and punishing those infected with heresy, under the penalty of being themselves treated as heretics. Notwithstanding this edict, and the engagements he had contracted at his coronation, Pedro was disposed to be favourable to this sect. He was from the beginning displeased at the crusade which raged on the north of the Pyrenees; and having at last joined his army to those of his brother-in-law Raymond, count of Toulouse, he fell, in the year 1213, fighting in defence of the Albigenses in the battle of Muret.

This disaster, together with those that followed it, induced multitudes of the Albigenses to take refuge in Aragon, who gave ample employment to the inquisition after it was established in that country. From the accession of pope Gregory IX. to that of Alexander IV. (that is, from 1227 to 1254,) they had grown to such numbers and credit as to have churches in various parts of Catalonia and Aragon, which were provided with bishops, who boldly preached their doctrine. Gregory, in a brief which he addressed to the archbishop of Tarragona and his suffragans, in 1232, complains of the increase of heresy in their dioceses, and exhorts them to make strict inquisition after it by means of the Dominican monks; and his successor Alexander repeated the complaint. In 1237, the flames of persecution were kindled in the viscounty of Cerdagne and Castlebon, within the diocess of Urgel; forty-five persons being condemned, of whom fifteen were burnt alive, and eighteen disinterred bodies cast into the fire. In 1267, the inquisitors of Barcelona pronounced sentence against Raymond, count of Forcalquier and Urgel, ordering his bones, as those of a relapsed heretic, to be taken out of the grave; and two years after they passed the same sentence on Arnold, viscount of Castlebon and Cerdagne, and his daughter Ermesinde, wife of Roger-Bernard II. count of Foix, surnamed the Great. Both father and daughter had been dead upwards of twenty years, yet their bones were ordered to be disinterred, "provided they could be found;" a preposterous and unnatural demonstration of zeal for the faith, which is applauded by the fanatical writers of that age, but was in fact dictated by hatred to the memory of the brave and generous Count de Foix. When summoned in his lifetime to appear before the inquisition at Toulouse, that nobleman not only treated their order with contempt, but, in his turn summoned the inquisitors of the county of Foix to appear before him as his vassals and subjects. During his exile at the court of his father-in-law, he was excommunicated by the bishop of Urgel as a favourer of heresy; and although the sentence was removed, and he died in the communion of the church, yet the inquisitors never could forgive the disinterested and determined resistance which he had made to their barbarous proceedings. They put one of his servants to the torture, with the view of extorting from him some evidence upon which they might pronounce that his master had died a heretic; and, having failed in that attempt, they now sought to wreck their vengeance on the memory and the ashes of the countess and her father.

It has been said that the Poor Men of Lyons or Waldenses, when they made their first appearance, were looked upon at Rome as an order of monks who wished to revive the decaying fervour of piety among the people, and to lead a life of superior sanctity among themselves; and that it was seriously proposed at one time to give the pontifical sanction to their internal regulations. Whatever truth there may be in this statement, it, is a curious fact, that, in Spain, some individuals of this sect did obtain a temporary respite from persecution by forming themselves into a new religious fraternity. In consequence of a dispute held at Pamiers in Languedoc, Durando de Huesca, a native of Aragon, with a number of his Albigensian brethren, yielded to the Romish missionaries, and having obtained liberty to retire into Catalonia, formed a religious community under the name of the Society of Poor Catholics. In 1207 Durando went to Rome, where he obtained from Innocent III. the remission of his former heresy, and an approbation of his fraternity, of which he was declared superior. Its members lived on alms, applied themselves to study and the teaching of schools, kept lent twice a-year, and wore a decent habit of white or gray, with shoes open at the top, but distinguished by some particular mark from those of the Poor Men of Lyons, who, from this part of their dress, were sometimes called Insabatati. The new order spread so rapidly, that in a few years it had numerous convents both to the south and north of the Pyrenees. But although the Poor Catholics professed to devote themselves to the conversion of heretics, and their superior wrote some books with that view, they soon incurred the suspicion of the bishops, who accused them of favouring the Vaudois, and concealing their heretical tenets under the monastic garb. They had interest to maintain themselves for some time, and even to procure letters from his holiness, exhorting the bishops to endeavour to gain them by kindness instead of alienating their minds from the church by severe treatment; but their enemies at last prevailed, and within a short time no trace of their establishments was to be found.

The Albigenses were not confined to Aragon and Catalonia. Of the extent to which they spread in the kingdom of Castile and Leon, we may form some judgment from an amusing anecdote, related from personal knowledge, by Lucio, bishop of Tuy, known as a writer against the Albigenses, by the name of Lucas Tudensis; and which I shall give nearly in his own words as is consistent with perspicuity. After the death of Roderic, bishop of Leon (in the year 1237), great dissention arose about the election of his successor. Taking advantage of this circumstance, the heretics flocked from all quarters to that city. In one of the suburbs, where every kind of filth was thrown, lay, along with those of a murderer, the bones of a heretic, named Arnold, who had been buried sixteen years before. Near to this was a fountain, over which they erected an edifice, and having taken up the bones of Arnold, whom they extolled as a martyr, deposited them in it. To this place a number of persons, hired by the heretics, came; and feigning themselves to be blind, lame, and afflicted with other disorders, they drank of the waters of the fountain, and then went away, saying that they were suddenly and miraculously healed. This being noised abroad, great multitudes flocked to the spot. After they had got a number of the clergy, as well as laity, to give credit to the pretended cures, the heretics disclosed the imposition which they had practised, and then boasted that all the miracles performed at the tombs of the saints were of the same kind. By this means they drew many to their heresy. In vain did the Dominican and Franciscan friars attempt to stem the torrent of defection, by exclaiming against the sin of offering sacrilegious prayers in a place defiled by profane bones. They were cried down as heretics and unbelievers. In vain did the adjacent bishops excommunicate those who visited the fountain or worshipped in the temple. The devil had seized the minds of the people and fascinated their senses. At last, a deacon, who resided at Rome, hearing of the state of matters in his native city, hastened to Leon, and "in a kind of frenzy," at the risk of his life, upbraided the inhabitants for favouring heretics, and called on the magistrates to abate the nuisance. For some months before his arrival, the country had been afflicted with a severe drought. This he declared to be a judgment from heaven on account of their sin, but promised that it should be removed within eight days from the time that they pulled down the heretical temple. The magistrates granted him permission, and he razed the building to its foundation. Scarcely was this done, when a fire devoured a great part of the city, and for seven days no symptom of rain appeared; upon which the heretics insulted over the deacon. But on the eighth day the clouds collected, and poured down copious and refreshing showers on all the surrounding country. "After this, the aforesaid deacon raised persecution against the heretics, who, being forced to leave the city, were miserably scattered abroad." We are assured, and not without great probability, that the deacon was no other than Lucas Tudensis, whose modesty induced him to suppress his name in relating the prediction and the persecution, in both of which he appears to have equally gloried.

In spite of the occupation given to the clergy by the suppression of the Knights Templars, and the schism of the antipopes, the persecution of the Albigenses seldom relaxed during the fourteenth century. Scarce a year passed in which numbers were not barbarously led to the stake. Among those who were condemned for heresy at this period, was Arnaldo of Villaneuva in Aragon, a celebrated physician and chemist. He taught, that the whole Christian people had, through the craft of the devil, been drawn aside from the truth, and retained nothing but the semblance of ecclesiastical worship, which they kept up from the force of custom; that those who lived in cloisters threw themselves out of charity, and that the religious orders in general falsified the doctrines of Christ; that it is not a work of charity to endow chapels for celebrating masses for the dead; that those who devoted their money to this purpose, instead of providing for the poor, and especially the poor belonging to Christ, exposed themselves to damnation; that offices of mercy and medicine are more acceptable to the Deity than the sacrifice of the altar; and that God is praised in the eucharist not by the hands of the priest, but by the mouth of the communicant. Such being his avowed sentiments, we need not wonder that he was doomed to expiate his temerity by suffering the fire, from which he saved himself by flying from his native country, and taking refuge with Ferdinand, king of Sicily. To Arnald we may add a writer of the following century, Raimond de Sebonde, author of a treatise on natural theology, who was charged with heresy for asserting that all saving truths are contained, and clearly proposed, in the sacred scriptures.

From 1412 to 1425, a great number of persons who entertained the sentiments of the Vaudois were committed to the flames by the inquisitors of Valentia, Rousillon, and Majorca. It appears that the followers of Wickliffe had migrated to the Peninsula; for in 1441, the inquisitors of Aragon and Valentia reconciled some of them to the church, and condemned others to the fire as obstinate heretics. If we may trust the monkish annalists, Spain was also visited at this period by the Beghards, a fanatical sect which the corruptions of the church and the ignorance of the times had generated in Germany and other parts of Europe. But this is uncertain, as it was common for the clergy to apply this and similar names to the Vaudois, with the view of exciting odium against them, and justifying their own cruelties. In 1350, we are told, a warm inquisition was commenced in Valentia against the Beghards, whose leader was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and the bones of many of his disciples dug up and consigned to the flames; and in 1412, it was found they had multiplied at Durango, a town of Biscay, and in the diocese of Calahorra. Alfonso de Mella, a Franciscan, and brother of the bishop of Zamora, who was afterwards invested with the purple, having incurred the suspicion of being at the head of this party, fled, along with his companions, to the Moors, among whom "he died miserably at Grenada, being pierced with reeds; an example (says the biographer of his brother) worthy to be recorded, of the variety of human affairs, and the opposite dispositions of persons who lay in the same womb." On application to John II. king of Castile, a band of royal musqueteers was sent to scour the mountains of Biscay, and the higher districts of Old Castile, who drove down the heretics like cattle before them, and delivered them to the inquisitors, by whom they were committed to the flames at St. Domingo de la Calzado, and Valladolid. Thus were the Albigenses, after a barbarous and unrelenting persecution of two centuries, exterminated in Spain, with the exception of a few, who contrived to conceal themselves in the more remote and inaccessible parts of the country, and at a subsequent period, furnished occasionally a straggling victim to the familiars of the inquisition, when surfeited with the blood of Jews and Moriscoes.

During these proceedings, Rome succeeded in establishing its empire a second time in Spain, and that in a more durable form than in the days of the Scipios and Augustus. This conquest was achieved chiefly by means of the monks and friars. Anciently the number of convents and of monks in Spain was small; but it multiplied greatly from the twelfth to the fifteenth century. The beginning of that period was marked by the infliction of that scourge of society, and outrage of all decency—privileged and meritorious mendicity. Of all the orders of mendicant friars, the most devoted to the See of Rome were those founded by St. Dominic and St. Francis, the former the most odious, the latter the most frantic, of modern saints. Within a few years after their institution, convents belonging to both these orders were to be found in every part of Spain. Though the Dominicans, owing to the patronage of the court of Rome, or to their founder being a Spaniard, enjoyed the greatest share of political power, yet the reception given to the Franciscans left them no ground to complain of Spanish inhospitality. An event which happened at the close of the fifteenth century contributed to the still more rapid increase of religious houses. A great part of the wealth which flowed into Spain after the discovery of the New World, found its way to the church. Imitating the Pagan warriors who dedicated the spoils which they had gained to their gods, the Spaniards who enriched themselves by pillaging and murdering the Indians, sought to testify their gratitude or to expatiate their crimes by lavishing ornaments on churches and endowing monasteries. The following examples show the rate at which the regular clergy increased. The first Franciscan missionaries entered Spain in the year 1216; and, in 1400, they had, within the three provinces of Santiago, Castile, and Aragon, including Portugal, twenty-three custodiæ, composed of an hundred and twenty-one convents. But in the year 1506, the Regular Observantines, who formed only the third division of that order, had a hundred and ninety convents in Spain, excluding Portugal. In the year 1030, the city of Salamanca did not contain a single convent; in 1480, it possessed nine, of which six were for males, and three for females; and in 1518 it could number thirty-nine convents, while its nuns alone amounted to eleven thousand.

The corruption of the monastic institutions kept pace with the increase of their numbers and wealth. The licentiousness of the regular clergy became notorious. They broke through the rules prescribed by their founders, and laid aside that austere mode of living by which they had at first acquired all their reputation. Even those who had vowed the most rigid poverty, such as the Observantines, or third order of St. Francis, procured dispensations from Rome, in virtue of which they possessed rents, and property in houses and lands. By the original regulations of St. Francis, all belonging to his order bound themselves to live purely on alms, and were strictly prohibited from receiving any money, on whatever pretext, even as wages for labour performed by them, "unless for the manifest necessity of infirm brethren." The monastic historians are greatly puzzled to account for the glaring departure from this rule of poverty; probably forgetting, or not wishing to have recourse to the well known maxim, that nature abhors a vacuum. Sometimes they wish to account for it by saying that a destructive pestilence, about the beginning of the fourteenth century, thinned the monasteries, which were afterwards filled with novices of a more earthly mould. But they are forced to trace the evil to a more remote source, and to impute it to brother Elias, a native of Cortona, and vicar-general of the order of Franciscans, under its founder. As early as 1223, he began to hint to his brethren that the rule prescribed to them was a yoke which neither they nor their successors could bear; but was silenced by the authority of St. Francis. After the death of the saint, he was more successful in gaining proselytes to his opinion, and drew upon himself the sentence of excommunication, from which, however, he was ultimately relieved.

The kings of Spain attempted at different times to correct these abuses, but the monks and friars had always the influence or the address to defeat the measure. When the glaring nature of the evil induced Ferdinand and Isabella to renew the attempt at the close of the fifteenth century, they were obliged to employ force; nor would their united authority have been sufficient to carry the point, had they not availed themselves of the sagacity and firmness of the celebrated cardinal Ximenes, himself a friar, and inflamed with the passion of restoring the order of St. Francis, of which he was then provincial, to all the poverty and rigour of its original institution. Lorenzo Vacca, abbot of the monastery of the Holy Spirit at Segovia, relying on the papal bulls which he had procured, made such resistance to the plans of his provincial, that the government found it necessary to commit him to prison, from which he escaped, and repairing to Rome, exerted himself, through the influence of Ascanio Sforza and other cardinals, in counteracting the reform of the religious order in Spain. The Franciscan Friars of Toledo carried their resistance so far, that an order was issued to banish them from the kingdom; upon which they left the city in solemn procession, carrying a crucifix before them, and chaunting the psalm which begins, When Israel went up out of Egypt, &c. The biographers of Ximenes represent him as having reformed all the religious institutions in Spain; but it is evident that his success was partial, and chiefly confined to his own order. So far as they proceeded on the rigid principles of monarchism, the regulations which he introduced were unnatural and pernicious, and such of them as were favourable to morals were soon swept away by the increasing tide of corruption.

It has been said, that Ximenes abolished a number of superstitious practices which had crept into the worship of the Spanish church during the dark ages; and in proof of this we are told that he revived the Mozarabic office, and appointed it to be used in all the churches of his diocese. But the writers who make this assertion have fallen into a mistake, both as to what was done by the cardinal, and as to the object he had in view. Perceiving that the Mozarabic service had fallen into desuetude in the six churches of Toledo, in which its use had been enjoined by an old law, he was desirous to preserve this venerable relic of antiquity. With this view he employed Alfonso Ortiz, one of the canons of his cathedral, to collate all the copies of that liturgy which could be found; and, the Gothic letters in which they were written being changed into Roman, he caused the work to be printed. Some years after, he erected a chapel in the cathedral church, with an endowment for thirteen priests, whose duty it was to celebrate the service according to that liturgy. There is reason to think that he ordered it to be also used on certain festivals in the churches commonly called Mozarabic; but it is certain that the order did not extend to the other churches of his diocese. So far was it from his intention to make any innovation on the existing forms of worship, or to supplant the Roman by the ancient Spanish liturgy, that he interpolated his edition of the latter, in order to render it more conformable to the former; thus destroying its character and use as an ancient document. Among these interpolations are "a prayer for the adoration of the cross," and offices for a number of saints who lived before as well as after the compilation of the liturgy; for the ancient Goths and Mozarabes commemorated none but martyrs in their public service. Ferdinand de Talavera, archbishop of Granada, endowed, about the same time, a chapel in Salamanca, in which the service continued to be celebrated according to this ritual at the close of the seventeenth century.

It might be presumed, from the statements already made, and from what we know of other countries, that the Spanish clergy had sunk very low in point of knowledge, and that the absurdities which one of their countrymen afterwards exposed so wittily in Fray Gerundio, were not less common or less ridiculous before the revival of letters. But on this head we are not left to conjecture. In an address to queen Isabella, cardinal Ximenes acknowledges the gross ignorance that prevailed among the priests. This led to the adoption of the most absurd opinions, and the practice of the most extravagant superstitions. Legends and lives of saints formed the favourite reading of the devout, while the vulgar fed on the stories of every-day miracles which the priests and friars ministered fresh to their credulity. The doctrine of the immaculate conception of the Virgin met with believers in other countries; but Spain could boast of an order of nuns consecrated to the honour of that newly-invented mystery. The doctrine of transubstantiation, which many even at that period could not digest without difficulty, was no trial of faith to a Spaniard. "Do you believe that this wafer is the body of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost?" was the question which the parish priests of Valencia, in the fourteenth century, were accustomed to put to dying persons; and on obtaining an affimative answer, they administered the host. Another attempt to extend the mysterious process a little farther met with greater opposition. Eimeric, the author of the celebrated Guide to Inquisitors, wrote against Bonet and Mairon, who maintained that St. John the Evangelist became the real son of the Virgin, in consequence of his body being transubstantiated into that of Christ, by the words pronounced on the cross, Ecce filius tuus, Behold thy Son.

CHAPTER II.

On the state of Literature in Spain before the era of the Reformation.

Having taken a general survey of the state of religion in Spain before the Reformation, let us look back for a little and trace the restoration of letters, which opened the prospect of a better order of things in that country. The learning of Isidore, archbishop of Seville, who flourished in the seventh century, and, next to St. James, is venerated by the Spaniards as a tutelary saint, rests on a better foundation than the encomium of Gregory the Great, who called him a second Daniel. Besides various theological and historical treatises, he composed a work on entomology, which, though disfigured by errors, discovers a considerable portion of philological knowledge, and contributed to check the barbarism which had already invaded every country in Europe. But ages of darkness succeeded, during which, while the name of St. Isidore was held in veneration, his works were disregarded, by an ignorant priesthood, into whose hands the key of knowledge had fallen.

It is not to the credit of Christianity, or at least of those who professed it, that, during the middle ages, letters were preserved from extinction, and even revived from the decline which had seized them, by the exertions of the followers of Mahomet. The tenth century, which has been denominated the leaden age of Europe, was the golden age of Asia. Modern writers have perhaps gone to an extreme on both sides in forming their estimate of the degree in which European literature is indebted to the Arabians. But when we find that this people have left such evident marks of their language upon that of Spain, it seems unreasonable to doubt that they had also great influence upon its literature. Cordova, Granada, and Seville, rivalled one another in the magnificence of their schools and libraries, during the empire of the Saracens, who granted to the Spanish Christians, whom they had subjugated, that protection in their religious rights, which the latter were far from imitating when they in their turn became the conquerors. The two languages were spoken in common. The Christians began to vie with their masters in the pursuit of science, composed commentaries on the scriptures in Arabic, and transfused the beauties of eastern poetry into the Castilian language. It is even said, that a bishop of Seville, at this early period, translated the scriptures into the Arabic tongue.

If the Spanish language was in danger of suffering from the predominance of the Arabians, the evil was counteracted by the cultivation of Provençal poetry. In the twelfth century, Alfonso II. of Aragon, whose name has an honourable place among the Troubadours, zealously patronised those who wrote in the Catalonian or Valencian dialect. In the subsequent century, Alfonso X. of Castile, surnamed the Wise, showed himself equally zealous in encouraging the study of the Castilian tongue, in which he wrote several poems; at the same time that he extracted the knowledge which was to be found in the books of the Arabians; as appears, among other proofs, from the astronomical tables, called from him Alphonsine. The writings of Dante, Checo, Dascoli, and Petrarch, gave a new impulse to the literature of Spain. From this period the study of the ancient classics imparted greater purity and elevation to works of imagination; and a taste for poetical compositions in their native tongue began to be felt by the Spanish gentry, who had hitherto found their sole pastime in arms and military tournaments. Among those who distinguished themselves by improving the taste of their countrymen in the first part of the fifteenth century, were two persons of illustrious birth, in whose families the love of learning was long hereditary. Henry of Aragon, marquis of Villena, descended from the royal houses of Aragon and Castile, revived the Consistorio de la Gaya Sciencia, an academy instituted at Barcelona for the encouragement of poetry, of which he was the president. His superior knowledge, combined perhaps with a portion of that learned credulity of which those who addicted themselves to astronomy and experimental science during the middle ages were often the dupes, brought on him the suspicion of necromancy. In consequence of this, his books were seized after his death, by the orders of Juan II. king of Castile, and sent for examination to Lope de Barrientos, a Dominican monk of considerable learning, and preceptor to the prince of Asturias. "Barrientos," says a contemporary writer, "liking better to walk with the prince than to revise necromancies, committed to the flames upwards of a hundred volumes, without having examined them any more than the king of Morocco, or understood a jot of their contents more than the dean of Ciudad Rodrigo. There are many in the present day," continues he, "who become learned men, by pronouncing others fools and magicians; and what is worse, make themselves saints, by stigmatizing others as sorcerers." This indignity done to the memory of "the ornament of Spain and of the age," was bewailed, both in verse and prose, by writers of that time.

Equally learned as Villena, but more fortunate in preserving his good name and his books, was Inigo Lopez de Mendoza, marquis of Santillana, who, in a treatise, intended as a preface to his own poetical works, has acted the part of historian to his countrymen who preceded him in paying court to the muse. The merits of both marquises have been celebrated by the pen of Juan de Mena, unquestionably the first Spanish poet of that age.

It is not unworthy of remark here, that the Jews while they enjoyed protection in Spain, co-operated with the Christians in the cultivation of polite letters. Rabbi Don Santo, who flourished about the year 1360, makes the following modest and not inelegant apology for taking his place among the poets of the land which had given him birth:—

> The rose that twines a thorny sprig,
> Will not the less perfume the earth;
> Good wine, that leaves a creeping twig,
> Is not the worse for humble birth.
>
> The hawk may be of noble kind,
> That from a filthy aiery flew;
> And precepts are not less refined,
> Because they issue from a Jew.

Long after their expulsion from Spain, the Jews cherished an ardent attachment to the Castilian tongue, in which they continued to compose works both in prose and verse.

On looking into the writings of the ancient Spanish poets, we are induced to conclude, that they were not in the habit of using those liberties with the church and clergy which were indulged in by the poets of Italy and the troubadours of Provence. There is reason however to think, that the absence of these satires is to be accounted for, in no small degree, by the prudence of the editors of their works, and the vigilance of the censors of the press, after the invention of printing. Accordingly, of later years, since the severity of the inquisition relaxed, and a passion to do justice to their literary antiquities has been felt by the Spaniards, poems have been brought to the light, though still with much caution, which two centuries ago would have earned for their learned editors a perpetual prison. The poems of Juan Ruiz, archpriest of Hita, who flourished in the middle of the fourteenth century, contain severe satires on the avarice and loose manners of the clergy. He represents money as opening the gates of Paradise, purchasing salvation to the people, and benefices to priests; as equally powerful at the court of Rome and elsewhere, with the pope and with all orders of the clergy, secular and regular; as converting a lie into the truth, and the truth into a lie. In another poem he is as severe against the manners of the clergy, whom he describes as living avowedly in concubinage. He represents Don Gil de Albornoz, archbishop of Talavera, as having procured a mandate from the pope, ordering all his clergy to put away the wives or concubines whom they kept in their houses, under the pain of excommunication. When this mandate was read to them in a public assembly, it excited a warm opposition; violent speeches were made against it by the dean and others; some of them declared that they would sooner part with their dignities; and it was finally agreed that they should appeal from the pope to the king of Castile.

About the middle of the fifteenth century, literature was advanced under the patronage of Alfonso V. of Aragon. The education of this monarch had been neglected, and the early part of his life was spent in arms; but at fifty years of age he applied himself to study with such eagerness that he was soon able to read with ease the Roman classics, which became his constant companions. He disputed with the house of Medici the honour of entertaining men of letters, and rescuing the writings of antiquity from oblivion. When he had taken a town, his soldiers could not do the prince a greater pleasure than to bring him a book which they had discovered among the spoils; and Cosmo de' Medici, by the present of an ancient manuscript, procured from him a treaty highly favourable to Florence. Anthony of Palermo, usually styled Panormitanus, who wrote the history of his life, resided at his court in great honour; and Laurentius Valla, one of the most profound and elegant scholars of that age, when persecuted for the freedom of his opinions, was protected by Alfonso at Naples, where he opened a school for Greek and Roman eloquence.

Alfonso de Palencia, having visited Italy, became acquainted with cardinal Bessarian, and attended the lectures which the learned Greek Trapezuntius delivered on eloquence and his native tongue. On his return to Spain, he was made historiographer to Henry IV. of Castile, and afterwards to queen Isabella; and by his translations from Greek into the Castilian language, as well as by a work on grammar, excited a taste for letters among his countrymen. He was followed by Antonio de Lebrixa, usually styled Nebrissensis, who became to Spain what Valla was to Italy, Erasmus to Germany, and Budé to France. After a residence of ten years in Italy, during which he had stored his mind with various kinds of knowledge, he returned home in 1473, by the advice of the younger Philelphus and Hermolaus Barbarus, with the view of promoting classical learning in his native country. Hitherto the revival of letters in Spain was confined to a few inquisitive individuals, and had not reached the schools and universities, whose teachers continued to teach a barbarous jargon, under the name of Latin, into which they initiated the youth by means of a rude system of grammar, rendered unintelligible, in some instances, by a preposterous intermixture of the most abstruse questions in metaphysics. By the lectures which he read in the universities of Seville, Salamanca, and Alcala, and by the institutes which he published on Castilian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew grammar, Lebrixa contributed in a wonderful degree to expel barbarism from the seats of education, and to diffuse a taste for elegant and useful studies among his countrymen. His improvements were warmly opposed by the monks, who had engrossed the art of teaching, and who, unable to bear the light themselves, wished to prevent all others from seeing it; but, enjoying the support of persons of high authority, he disregarded their selfish and ignorant outcries. Lebrixa continued, to an advanced age, to support the literary reputation of his native country. During his residence at Salamanca, he was joined by three able coadjutors. The first was Arius Barbosa, a Portuguese, who had studied under the elegant Italian scholar, Angelo Politiano, and was equally skilled in Greek as Lebrixa was in Latin. The second was Lucio Marineo, a native of Sicily, who, in 1485, accompanied the grand admiral of Castile into Spain, and began to read lectures on poetry. The third was Peter Martyr of Anghiera, to whose letters we are indebted for some interesting particulars respecting the state of literature in Spain, along with much valuable information on the political transactions of that country, and the affairs of the new world. In 1488, he was persuaded to leave Italy by the conde de Tendilla, who inherited that love of letters which had distinguished his illustrious ancestor, the Marquis of Santillana. Martyr commenced his literary career in Spain, by reading, with great applause, a lecture on one of the satires of Juvenal, at Salamanca; but he was soon called from that station to an employment of higher responsibility, for which he was eminently qualified. Under the patronage, and at the earnest desire of queen Isabella, who had herself taken lessons from Lebrixa, he undertook to superintend the education of the sons of the principal nobility, with the view of rooting out an opinion almost universally prevalent among persons of that order in Spain, that learning unfitted them for military affairs, in which they placed all their glory. The school was accordingly opened at court, not without a flattering prospect of success. But Spain was destined to exhaust her energies in gratifying the mad ambition for conquest of a succession of princes, and then to sink into inactivity under the benumbing influence of superstition and despotism. Finding the prejudice against education, in the minds of his pupils, more inveterate than he had anticipated, Martyr accepted of a political appointment; and the plan for inspiring the nobility with the love of polite letters, was abandoned soon after it had been begun under such good auspices.

In the mean time, the passion for learning spread from Salamanca to the other universities of the kingdom. In the beginning of the sixteenth century, Francesco Ximenes, at that time archbishop of Toledo, restored and enlarged the university of Alcala de Henares, in which he founded a trilingual college. To acquire celebrity to his favourite institution he procured learned teachers to fill its chairs, among whom were Demetrius Ducas and Nicetas Phaustus, two natives of Greece, and Fernando Nunez, a descendant of the noble house of Guzman. The latter, who had sacrificed his prospect of civil honours to the love of study, was inferior to none of his learned countrymen, and has left behind him a name in the republic of letters.

Living in the midst of Jews and Moors, and frequently engaged in controversy with them on their respective creeds, the Christians in Spain had better opportunities and a more powerful stimulus to study the oriental languages, than their brethren in other parts of Europe. About the middle of the thirteenth century, Raymond de Pennaforte, general of the Dominicans, persuaded Juan I., king of Aragon, to appropriate funds for the education of young men who might be qualified for entering the lists in argument with Jews and Mahometans. And in 1259 it was appointed, at a general chapter of the Dominicans held at Valencia, that the prior of that order in Spain should see to the erection of a school for Arabic, at Barcelona or elsewhere. From this school proceeded several individuals who distinguished themselves as disputants, both orally and by writing. Among the latter was Raymond Martini, the author of Pugio Fidei, or Poignard of the Faith against Jews and Moors; a work which discovers no contemptible acquaintance with the Hebrew language, and with the Rabbinical writings, which it quotes and comments upon in the original.* To the attention paid to the oriental tongues in Spain may be traced the decree of the council of Vienne, held under pope Clement V. in the year 1311, which ordained that Hebrew, Chaldee and Arabic, should be taught in whatever place the pontifical court might be held, and in the universities of Bologna, Paris, Oxford and Salamanca.

The ardour with which these studies were prosecuted, during the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, led to the publication of the famous Complutensian Polyglot. This chef d'oeuvre of Spanish erudition was executed under the patronage and at the expense of cardinal Ximenes, then archbishop of Toledo; a prelate whose pretensions to learning were slender, but whose ambition prompted him to seek distinction equally in the convent, the academy, the cabinet, and the field. In imitation of the celebrated Origen, he projected an edition of the Bible in various languages, and expended large sums of money in supporting the learned men who were engaged in the undertaking, purchasing manuscripts for their use, and providing the requisite printers and types. The work commenced in 1502, and the printing was finished in 1517, in six volumes folio, at the press of Complutum, or Alcala de Henares. The Old Testament contained the original Hebrew text, the Vulgate or Latin version of Jerome, and the Greek version of the Septuagint, arranged in three columns; and at the foot of each page of the Pentateuch was printed the Chaldee paraphrase of Onkelos, accompanied with a Latin translation. The New Testament contained the original Greek, and the Vulgate Latin version. To the whole were added a grammar and dictionary of the Hebrew language, and a Greek lexicon or vocabulary, with some other explanatory treatises. John Brocar, the son of the printer, was accustomed to relate, that when the last sheet came from the press, he, being then a boy, was sent in his best clothes with a copy of it to the cardinal, who gave thanks to God for sparing him to that day, and turning to his attendants, said that he congratulated himself on the completion of that work more than on any of the acts which had distinguished his administration.

Spanish writers have been two lavish of their encomiums on the Polyglot of Alcala. The Hebrew and Greek manuscripts employed by its compilers were neither numerous nor ancient; and instead of correcting the text of the Septuagint from the copies which were in their possession, they made alterations of their own, with the view of adapting it to the Hebrew text. Some of the learned men who laboured in this work, must have been ashamed of the following specimen of puerile devotion to the Vulgate, which occurs in one of the prologues written in the name of Ximenes. Speaking of the order in which the matter is disposed in the columns, he says: "We have put the version of St. Jerome between the Hebrew and Septuagint, as between the synagogue and Eastern church, which are like the two thieves, the one on the right and the other on the left hand, and Jesus, that is, the Roman church, in the middle: for this alone, being founded upon a solid rock, remains always immovable in the truth, while the others deviate from the proper sense of scripture."* But notwithstanding these defects, when we consider the period at which it was composed, and the example which it held out, we cannot hesitate in affirming that this work reflects great credit on its authors, and on the munificence of the prelate at whose expense it was executed.

The Arabic language was also cultivated at this time by some individuals in Spain. This branch of study was zealously patronised by Fernando de Talavera, who, after the overthrow of the Moorish kingdom, was appointed the first archbishop of Grenada. This pious and amiable prelate, being desirous of converting the Moors who resided in his diocese by gentle and rational methods, and consequently of promoting the knowledge of Christianity among them, encouraged the clergy under his charge to make themselves masters of the Arabian tongue. With the view of assisting them in this task, he employed his chaplain, Pedro de Alcala, a Hieronymite monk, to draw up an Arabic grammar, vocabulary, and catechism containing the first rudiments of Christian doctrine, for the use of parish priests and catechists; which were the first books ever printed in that language. In order

* The work was composed in 1278. (Pugio Fidei, part ii. cap. 10 § 1. p. 395 edit. Carpzovii.) Its fate is curious. Porchet, a converted Jew, in the fourteenth century, transcribed a great part of it into a work which he composed under the title of Victoria adversus Hebraeos, which was printed in 1520. He acknowledged his obligations to Martini; an act of justice which was not done him by Galatinus, who used the same liberties in his Arcana Catholicae Veritatis, printed in 1518. De Porta says that Galatinus, when he departs from the Pugio, copies almost verbally from the Capistrum or Nouse, (another work of Martini,) as he found by consulting a MS. copy of the last-named book in the library of Bologna. (De Linguis Orient. p. 62.) The plagiarism of Galatinus was first detected in 1605 by Joseph Scaliger, who, however, confounded Raymond Martini with Raymond Schonde. The Pugio Fidei was at last published entire in 1651, with learned annotations by Joseph de Voisin, and elegantly reprinted in 1687, under the care of John Benedict Carpzov, who prefixed to it an Introduction to Jewish Theology.

* Many Roman catholic writers are ashamed of this conceit, (as they call it,) which, if it has any meaning, implies a severe censure on the whole undertaking. Le Long suppressed it, in his account of the work. Not so Nicholas Ranus, bishop of Cuba, who, in a commentary on the words, informs us that "the Hebrew original represents the bad thief, and the Septuagint version the good thief." Pere Simon appeared at first inclined to make the transatlantic bishop responsible both for the text and the commentary; but he afterwards acknowledges that the former is to be found in the Complutensian prologue to the reader. (Hist. Crit. du Vieux Test. p. 556; conf. p. 577.)

the grand effect [illegible] the same object, the archbishop caused the religious service to be performed in their vernacular tongue, to such of the Moors as had submitted to baptism, or were willing to be instructed; and, accordingly, Arabic translations of the collects from the Gospels and Epistles were also made by his orders. It was his intention to have the whole scriptures translated into that language, agreeably to what is said to have been done at an early period of the Moorish dominion in Spain.

These measures, which were applauded by enlightened men, met with the strenuous opposition of cardinal Ximenes, who, while he wished to be regarded as the patron of learning, was a determined enemy to the progress of knowledge. The archbishop had appealed to the authority of St. Paul, who said, "In the church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue." But the cardinal pleaded that the times were changed, and appealed to St. Peter. To put the sacred oracles into the hands of those who were but newly initiated into our religion, was, in his opinion, to throw pearls before swine. Nor did he think it a whit safer to intrust the old Christians with this treasure; for, (added he, changing the metaphor,) in this old age of the world, when religion is so far degenerated from that purity which prevailed in the time of St. Paul, the vulgar are in danger of wresting the scriptures to their destruction. Knowing that the common people are inclined to revere what is concealed, and to despise what is known, the wisest nations have always kept them at a distance from the mysteries of religion. Books written by men of approved piety, and calculated, by the examples which they propose, or by the fervour of their style, to raise the dejected, and recall the minds of men from the things of sense to divine contemplation, might be safely circulated in the vulgar tongue; and it was the cardinal's intention, as soon as he found leisure, to publish some works of this description; but the sacred scriptures ought to be exclusively preserved in the three languages in which the inscription on our Saviour's cross was written; and if ever this rule should be neglected, the most pernicious effects would ensue. This opinion, which is merely a commentary on the favourite maxim of the church of Rome, that ignorance is the mother of devotion, has met with the warm approbation of his biographer, and was afterwards produced as a proof of his prophetic gift, along with his miracles, in the application which the Colegio Mayor de San Ildefonso made to the papal court for his canonization. The arguments of Ximenes were not of a kind to carry conviction to the minds of those who favoured enlightened measures; but they were the arguments of a man who, unfortunately for the best interests of Spain, had even then acquired great influence in the councils of government, and continued for many years to have the chief direction of the affairs of the nation, both civil and ecclesiastical. The books which the cardinal had promised as a substitute for the Gospels and Epistles made their appearance, consisting of treatises of mystic or rather monastic devotion, and the lives of some of its most high-flying zealots, both male and female; such as, the Letters of Santa Catalina de Sena, of Santa Angela de Fulgino, and of Santa Matilda, the Degrees of San Juan Climaco, the Instructions of San Vicente Ferrer, and of Santa Clara, the Meditations of the Carthusian Thomas Landulpho, and the Life of St. Thomas a Becket, archbishop of Canterbury.

The opposition of Ximenes, and the violent and impolitic measures which the government adopted against the Jews and Moors, checked the cultivation of oriental literature to such a degree, that, in the year 1535, when an enthusiastic scholar visited Spain, he found Hebrew neglected, and could not meet with a single native acquainted with Arabic, except the venerable Nunez, who still recollected the characters of a language to which he had paid some attention in his youth.

A translation of the Scriptures into Spanish, of which I shall afterwards speak, had probably little influence in preparing for the introduction of the reformed opinions, as all the copies of it appear to have been destroyed soon after it came from the press. Considerable light was thrown upon the sacred writings by those who studied them in the original languages, at the close of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth century. Pablo de San Maria of Burgos, commonly called Paulus Burgensis, a converted Jew, discovered the same acquaintance with Hebrew which distinguishes the Postilla, or notes on Scripture, by Nicolas de Lira, to which he made additions. Alfonso Tostado, bishop of Avila, who wrote commentaries on the historical books of the Old Testament, and on Matthew, had formed correct notions of the literal and proper sense of Scripture, and of the duty of an interpreter to adhere to it in opposition to the method of the allegorizing divines; but he swelled his works to an immoderate bulk, by indulging in digressions on common places. Pedro de Osma, professor of theology at Salamanca, employed his talents in correcting the original text of the New Testament, by a critical collation of different manuscripts. He displayed the same freedom of opinion on doctrinal points; and in 1479 was forced to abjure eight propositions relating to the power of the pope, and the sacrament of penance, which were extracted from a book written by him on Confession, and condemned as erroneous by a council held at Alcala. Besides his services in the cause of polite literature, Antonio Lebrixa wrote several works, illustrative of the Scriptures, for which he was brought before the Inquisition, and would have incurred the same censure as De Osma, had he not been so fortunate as to secure the protection of their Catholic Majesties.

By the labours of these men, together with the writings of their countryman Ludovicus Vives, who had settled in the Low Countries, and of his friend Erasmus, a salutary change was produced on the minds of the youth at the universities. They became disgusted at the barbarism of scholastic theology, read the Scriptures for themselves, consulted them in the originals, and from these sources ventured to correct the errors of the Vulgate, and to expose the absurd and puerile interpretations which had so long passed current under the shade of ignorance and credulity.

Having put the reader in possession of the circumstances connected with the state of letters and knowledge which tended to facilitate the introduction of the reformed doctrine into Spain, I shall now take a view of the obstacles with which it had to contend, of which the most formidable by far was the Inquisition.

CHAPTER III.

Of the Inquisition, and its Influence on the Reformation in Spain.

Soon after the Roman empire became Christian, laws were enacted, subjecting those who propagated erroneous opinions to punishment, under the false idea that heresy, or error in matters of revelation, was a crime and an offence against the state. The penalties were in general moderate, compared with those which were decreed at a subsequent period. Manicheism, which was considered as eversive of the principles of natural religion, and dangerous to morals, was the only heresy visited with capital punishment; a penalty which was afterwards extended to the Donatists, who were chargeable with exciting tumults in various parts of the empire. The bishops of that time were far from soliciting the execution of these penal statutes, which in most instances had passed at their desire, or with their consent. They flattered themselves that the publication of severe laws, by the terror which it inspired, would repress the hardihood of daring innovators, and induce their deluded followers to listen to instruction, and return to the bosom of the faithful church. When Priscillian was put to death for Manicheism, at Treves in 384, St. Martin, the apostle of the French, remonstrated with the emperor Maximus against the deed, which was regarded with abhorrence by all the bishops of France and Italy. St. Augustine protested to the proconsul of Africa, that, if capital punishment was inflicted on the Donatists, he and his clergy would suffer death at the hands of these turbulent heretics sooner than be instrumental in bringing them before the tribunals. But it is easier to draw than to sheathe the sword of persecution; and the ecclesiastics of a following age were zealous in stimulating reluctant magistrates to execute these laws, and in procuring the application of them to persons who held opinions which their predecessors looked upon as harmless or laudable. In the eleventh century, capital punishment, even in its most dreadful form, that of burning alive, was extended to all who obstinately adhered to opinions differing from the received faith.

Historians have not pointed our with precision the period at which this extension of the penal code took place, or the grounds on which it proceeded. Instances of the practice occur previously to the imperial edict of Frederic II. in 1224, and even to that of Frederic I. in 1184. It appears to me to have been at first introduced by confounding the different sects which arose with the followers of Manes. Taking advantage of the circumstance, that some individuals belonging to those who went by the names of Henricians, Arnoldist, Poor Men of Lyons, and Vaudois, held the leading tenet of Manicheism, the clergy fixed this stigma on the whole body, and called on magistrates to visit them with the penalty decreed against that odious heresy. In an ignorant age this charge was easily believed. It was in vain that the victims of persecution protested against the indiscriminate accusation, or disowned the sentiments imputed to them. By the time that undeniable facts cleared their innocence, the public mind had learned to view the severity of their fate with indifference or approbation; and the punishment of death, under the general phrase of delivering over to the secular arm, came to be considered as the common award for all who entertained opinions opposite to those of the church of Rome, or who presumed to inveigh against the corruptions of the priesthood.

Other causes, some of which had been long in operation, contributed to work, in the course of the eleventh century, a great change on the criminal proceedings against heretics. The sentence of excommunication, which at first only excluded from the privileges of the church, was now considered as inflicting a mark of public infamy on those who incurred it; from which the transition was not difficult, in a superstitious age, to the idea that it deprived them of all the rights, natural or civil, of which they were formerly in possession. The unhappy individuals who were struck with this spiritual thunder, felt all the bonds which connected them with society suddenly dissolved, and were regarded as objects at once of divine execration and human abhorrence. Subjects threw off their allegiance to their legitimate sovereigns; sovereigns gave up their richest and most peaceable provinces to fire and sword; the territories of a vassal became lawful prey to his neighbours; and a man's enemies were those of his own house. The Roman pontiffs, who had extended their authority by affecting an ardent zeal for the honour of the Christian faith, found a powerful engine for accomplishing their ambitious designs, in the crusades, undertaken at their instigation, to deliver the Holy Land, and the sepulchre of Christ, from the pollution of infidels. These mad expeditions, whose indirect influence was ultimately favourable to European civilization, were in the mean time productive of the worst effects. While they weakened the sovereigns who embarked in them, they increased the power of the popes, and placed at their disposal immense armies, which they could direct against all who opposed their measures. They perverted, in the minds of men, the essential principles of religion, justice, and humanity, by cherishing the false idea that it is meritorious to wage war for the glory of the Christian name,—by throwing the veil of sanctity over the greatest enormities of which a licentious soldiery might be guilty,—by conferring the pardon of their sins on all who arrayed themselves under the banners of the cross,—and by holding out the palm of martyrdom to such as should have the honour to fall in fighting against the enemies of the faith. Nor were the popes either dilatory or slack in availing themselves of these prejudices. Finding that their violent measures for suppressing the Albigenses were feebly seconded by the barons of Provence, they proclaimed a crusade against heretics, launched the sentence of excommunition against both superiors and vassals, and carried on a war of extermination in the south of France during a period of twenty years. It was amidst these scenes of blood and horror that the Inquisition rose.

Historians are divided in opinion as to the exact time at which the Inquisition was founded. Inquisitors and informers are mentioned in a law published by the emperor Theodosius against the Manicheans; but these were officers of justice appointed by the prefects, and different entirely from the persons who became so notorious under these designations many centuries after that period. The fundamental principle of that odious institution was undoubtedly recognised in 1184, by the counsel of Verona; which however established no separate tribunal for the pursuit of heretics, but left this task entirely in the hands of the bishops. Rainier, Castelnau, and St. Dominic, who were sent into France at different times from 1198 to 1206, had a commission from the pope to search for heretics, and in this sense may be called inquisitors; but they were invested with no judicial power to pronounce a definitive sentence. The council of the Lateran in 1218 made no innovation on the ancient practice. The council held at Toulouse in 1229, ordained that the bishops should appoint, in each parish of their respective dioceses, "one priest and two or three laics, who should engage upon oath to make a rigorous search after all heretics and their abettors, and for this purpose should visit every house from the garret to the cellar, together with all subterraneous places where they might conceal themselves." But the Inquisition, as a distinct tribunal, was not erected until the year 1233, when pope Gregory IX. took from the bishops the power of discovering and bringing to judgment the heretics who lurked in France, and committed that task to the Dominican friars. In consequence of this the tribunal was immediately set up in Toulouse, and afterwards in the neighbouring cities, from which it was introduced into other countries of Europe.

It may be considered as a fact at least somewhat singular, that in the proceedings of the first Spanish council whose records have reached our time, we find a deeper stigma affixed to the character of informers than to that of heretics. The council of Elvira, after limiting the duration of the penance of those who might fall into heresy, decreed that "if a catholic become an informer, and any one be put to death or proscribed in consequence of his denunciation, he shall not receive the communion, even at the hour of death." On a review of criminal proceedings in Spain anterior to the establishment of the court of Inquisition, it appears in general that heretics were more mildly treated there than in other countries. Jews who relapsed, after having been baptized, were subject to whipping and spare diet, according to the age of the offenders. Those who apostatized to paganism, if nobles or freemen, were condemned to exile, and if slaves, to whipping and chains. The general law against heretics was, that such as refused to recant, if priests, should be deprived of all their dignities and property, and if laics, that they should, in addition, be condemned to perpetual banishment. Even after the barbarous custom of committing obstinate heretics to the flames had been introduced into other parts of Europe, Spain testified her aversion to sanguinary measures. In 1194, when Alfonso II. of Aragon, at the instigation of the legate of pope Celestine, published an edict, commanding the Vaudois, and all other sectaries, to quit his dominions, those who remained after the time specified were expressly exempted from suffering either death or the mutilation of their bodies.

No sooner had the Inquisition received the papal sanction, than measures were taken for having it introduced into Spain, where the Dominicans had already established convents of their order. In the course of the thirteenth century, inquisitorial tribunals were permanently erected in the principal towns of the kingdom of Aragon, from which they were extended to Navarre. Though a papal brief was issued in 1236 for the special purpose of introducing the Holy Office into Castile, and Ferdinand III., surnamed the Saint, is said to have carried with his own hand the wood destined for burning his subjects,—yet it does not appear that there ever was a permanent tribunal in that kingdom under the ancient form of the Inquisition; either because heresy had made little progress among the Castilians, or because they were averse to the new method of extirpating it.

The mode of proceeding in the court of inquisition, when first erected, was simple, and differed very little from that which was followed in the ordinary courts of justice. In particular, the interrogatories put to persons accused, and to witnesses, were short and direct, evincing merely a desire to ascertain the truths on the subjects of inquiry. But this simplicity soon gave place to a system of the most complicated and iniquitous circumvention. Grossly ignorant of judicial matters, the Dominicans modelled their new court after what is called in the Roman Church, the Tribunal of Penance. Accustomed, in the confessional, to penetrate into the secrets of conscience, they converted to the destruction of the bodies of men all those arts which a false zeal had taught them to employ for the saving of their souls. Inflamed with a passion for extirpating heresy, and persuading themselves that the end sanctified the means, they not only acted upon, but formally laid down, as a rule for their conduct, maxims founded on the grossest deceit and artifice, according to which they sought in every way to ensnare their victims, and by means of false statements, delusory promises, and a tortuous course of examination, to betray them into confessions which proved fatal to their lives and fortunes. To this mental torture was soon after added the use of bodily tortures, together with the concealment of the names of witnesses.

After this court had subsisted for two centuries and a half, it underwent what its friends have honoured with the name of a reform; in consequence of which it became a more terrible engine of persecution than before. Under this new form it is usually called the Modern Inquisition, though it may with equal propriety bear the name of the Spanish, as it originated in Spain, and has been confined to that country, including Portugal, and the dominions subject to the two monarchies.

The war of the Albigenses was the pretext used by the popes for the establishment of the ancient Inquisition; the necessity of checking the apostasy of the converts from Judaism was urged as the reason for introducing the modern. While the Spaniards were engaged in continual wars with one another or with the Moors, the Jews, who had been settled for ages in the Peninsula, by addicting themselves to trade and commerce, had, in the fourteenth century, engrossed the wealth of the nation, and attained to great influence in the government both of Castile and Aragon. Those who were indebted to them, and those who envied them on account of the civil offices which they held, united in stirring up the religious prejudices of the populace against them; and in one year five thousand Jews fell a sacrifice to popular fury. With the view of saving their lives, many submitted to baptism, and it is computed that, in the course of a few years, nearly a million of persons renounced the law of Moses and made profession of the Christian faith. The number of converts, as they were called, was increased in the beginning of the fifteenth century, by the zeal of the Dominican missionaries, and especially of St. Vincent Ferrer, to whom the Spanish historians have ascribed more miracles and conversions than were wrought by the apostles. These converts were called New Christians, and sometimes Marranos from a form of execration in use among the Jews. As their adoption of the Christian profession proceeded from the fear of death, or a desire to secure secular emoluments, rather than internal persuasion, the greater part repented of having abjured the religion of their fathers, and resumed the practice of its rites in secret, while they publicly conformed to those of the Christians. This forced conformity could not fail to be painful to their minds, and was relaxed in proportion as the fears which they felt for their safety abated. The consequence was, that many of them were discovered by the monks, who cried out that if some severe means were not adopted to repress the evil, the whole body of converted Jews would soon relapse into their former habits, and the faith of the old Christians would be corrupted and overthrown by these concealed apostates with whom they were intermingled.—But, although more immediately intended to guard the fidelity of the New Christians, the modern Inquisition, like the ancient, was charged with the discovery and punishment of all kinds of heresy, and extended its jurisdiction over the Old Christians, as well as Jewish and Moorish converts.

It is proper that the names of those individuals to whom Spain owes this institution should not be forgotten. The most active were Felippe de Barberis, inquisitor of Sicily, and Alfonso de Hoyeda, prior of Seville, both of them Dominican friars, assisted by Nicolas Franco, bishop of Treviso, who was at that time nuncio from pope Sixtus IV. to the Spanish court.

The whole of Spain was at this period united into one kingdom by the marriage of Ferdinand, king of Aragon, and Isabella, queen of Castile. Ferdinand readily acceded to a proposal which gave him the prospect of filling his coffers by means of confiscations; it was equally agreeable to Sixtus, from its tendency to promote the views of the court of Rome; and they succeeded, by the help of the friars, in overcoming the repugnance which it excited in the humane but superstitious mind of Isabella. The bull for establishing the Inquisition in Castile was issued on the 1st of November 1478; and on the 17th of September 1480, their catholic majesties named the first inquisitors, who commenced their proceedings on the 2d of January 1481, in the Dominican convent of St. Paul at Seville. The tribunal did not however assume a permanent form until two years after, when friar Thomas Torquemada, prior of Santa Cruz in the town of Segovia, was placed at its head, under the designation of inquisitor-general, first of Castile, and afterwards of Aragon. Torquemada proceeded without delay to exercise the high powers with which he was intrusted, by choosing his assessors, and erecting subordinate tribunals in different cities of the united kingdom. Over the whole was placed the Council of the Supreme, consisting of the inquisitor-general as president, and three counsellors, two of whom were doctors of law. This regulated and controlled the inferior tribunals; and by its fundamental laws, the counsellors had a deliberative voice in all questions relating to civil law, but a consultative voice only in those which appertained to ecclesiastical law, of which Torquemada was constituted the sole judge by the apostolical bulls. These counsellors appear to have been appointed with the view of preventing encroachments on the secular authorities, and accordingly altercations did sometimes arise between the inquisitors-general and the counsellors of the Supreme; but as the latter were all of the clerical order, and as no clear line of distinction between civil and ecclesiastical affairs was drawn, the questions which came before the court were generally brought under the rules of canon law, or in other words, decided according to the pleasure of the president. Torquemada's next employment was to form a body of laws for the government of his new tribunal. This appeared in 1484; additions were made to it from time to time; and, as a diversity of practice had crept into the subordinate courts, the inquisitor-general Valdes, in 1561, made a revisal of the whole code, which was published in eighty-one articles, and continues, with the exception of a few slight alterations, to be the law to this day. From these constitutions, as illustrated by the authentic documents connected with the history of the Inquisition which have been lately made public, a correct idea may be formed of the mode of process observed in that dreadful tribunal. Instead however of entering here into details which may be found elsewhere, I shall select such particulars as show that the Inquisition possessed powers which enabled it effectually to arrest the progress of knowledge, and to crush every attempt which might be made for the reformation of religion and the church.

The first thing which presents itself to our view, is the immense apparatus which the inquisition possesses for the discovery of heresy, and the apprehension of those who are suspected of having incurred its taint. Deceived by the importance attached to the denunciation in the instructions of the Holy Office, some writers would lead us to believe that there is no way in which a process can be commenced before the inquisition, except by a formal charge preferred by some individual; whereas the truth is, that information, in whatever way it may be obtained, is sufficient for this purpose. The inquisition is not only a court of justice, but also, as its name intimates, a body of police, employed in discovering the offences on which it is afterwards to sit in judgment. Every individual belonging to its tribunals, supreme or subordinate, from the inquisitor-general down to the lowest alguazil or familiar, is charged with this employment. At those periods when its vigilance was aroused by the alarm of heresy, it had its secret spies and authorized agents at every port and pass of the kingdom, as regularly as government had its tide-waiters and custom-house officers, armed with authority to arrest the persons and property of all who incurred their suspicions. In addition to its internal resources, it avails itself of the superstitious prejudices of the people, whom it raises en masse, to drive the poor heretics into the legal toils spread for them in all parts of the country. At any time which it judges proper, but statedly on two Sundays every year during lent, an edict is published in all the churches in the kingdom, requiring every one who knows any person suspected of heresy to give information to the inquisition within six days, upon pain of incurring mortal sin and excommunication by their silence. At the same time, the priests in the confessional exert all the influence which they possess over the minds of their penitents to persuade them to comply with this order. In this way the worst and the best, the weakest and the strongest passions of the human breast are engaged; and persons are induced to become informers from private malice, from pious scruples, and from selfish fears. The father sometimes informs against his own child, the wife against her husband, and the love-sick maiden against the object of her tenderest attachment. Though the holy fathers prefer a process by denunciation to one ex officio, and in order to encourage informers, conceal their names, yet anonymous informations are received without any scruple, provided they furnish the smallest clue by which the charge may be brought home to the accused. One prosecution is often the means of fastening the suspicion of heresy on a number of individuals; for it is an invariable rule with the inquisitors, not to inform a witness of the particular object for which he is cited, but to commence by desiring him to task his memory and say if he recollects having seen or heard any thing which appeared to be inconsistent with the catholic faith; in consequence of which, he is led to mention names not implicated in the process. If, upon inquiry, the inquisitors are of opinion that they will find it difficult to convict the suspected person, they do not examine him, because this would only serve to put him on his guard; nor do they use any means to recover him from the supposed errors into which he has fallen; but suspending their proceedings, wait until they obtain additional proof to substantiate the charge. If the evidence is deemed sufficient, they issue the order of arrest to the alguazil, who, accompanied by the sequestrator and receiver of goods, instantly repairs to the house of the accused; and provided the latter has absconded, the familiars are furnished, not only with a minute description of his person, but also with his picture, so that it is next to impossible that their prey can escape them.

Nor is it less difficult for a person to escape without condemnation, if he once has had the misfortune to be apprehended. It is only in the way of being able to convict him of heresy, that the inquisitors are entitled to seize on his property; and as it is an established maxim of theirs, that the Holy Office cannot err, they consider it as a reflection on its proceedings, if any individual whom it has apprehended shall clear himself from suspicion. Without acquainting him either with his accuser or the charge brought against him, every art is employed, both by his judges in the repeated examinations to which they subject him, and also by the jailer to whose care he is intrusted, to induce the prisoner to confess that he has been guilty of some offence against the faith. He is strictly interrogated as to his kindred, connexions, acquaintances, and manner of life; the records of all the tribunals of the Holy Office are ordered to be searched; and if it is found that any of his ancestors or relations, however remote, either in the male or female line, or any of those with whom he has consorted, were Jews, Moors, or heretics, or had incurred the censures of the inquisition, this circumstance is regarded as sufficient to fasten on him a legitimate presumption of guilt. Even a failure to repeat the Ave Maria or creed exactly after the manner of the Roman church, is viewed in the same light.

The impenetrable secrecy with which all the proceedings of the inquisition are shrouded, is at once an instrument of terror, and an encouragement to every species of injustice. Every person who enters its walls is sworn, before he is permitted to depart, to observe the most profound silence as to all that he may have seen, heard, or uttered.* The names of the witnesses are carefully concealed from the prisoner; and they are not confronted with him, nor, so far as appears, with one another. No check is imposed on the infidelity or ignorance of the notaries or clerks who take down the depositions. The accused is not furnished with a copy of the evidence against him, but merely with such garbled extracts as his judges are pleased to order; and, taking advantage of the different modes of expression used by the witnesses in speaking of the same fact, the procurator-fiscal often converts one charge into three or four, by which means the prisoner is thrown into confusion on his defence, and exposed to popular odium, as a person laden with crimes, if he is ultimately brought out in the public auto-de-fe. Every thing which the witnesses in their examination may have said in his favour, or which might be conducive to his exculpation, is studiously and totally suppressed.

The same partial and unjust rules are observed in forming the extracts, which, both at the commencement and termination of the process, are submitted to certain divines, called qualificators of the Holy Office, whose business it is to say whether the propositions imputed to the accused individual are heretical, or to say to what degree they subject him to the suspicion of heresy. These individuals, besides, are generally monks or scholastic divines, imbued with false notions, and ready to qualify, or stigmatize as heretical, opinions sanctioned by the authority of the most approved doctors of the church, merely because they have not met with them in the contracted circle of their studies.

It is not easy to conceive a greater mockery of justice than is to be found in the provisions made for the defence of the prisoner. The judges appoint one of their advocates to act as his counsel, who has no means of defending his client, except the garbled extracts from the depositions of the witnesses already mentioned. But the truth is, that his ability is as great as his inclination; for, while nominally the advocate of the prisoner, he is really the agent and proctor of the court, in obedience to whose directions, given at the time of his nomination, he labours in most instances to induce his client to confess and throw himself on the mercy of his judges. Nor is the pretended privilege of challenging the witnesses less nugatory and insulting to the prisoner. Deprived of every means of knowing the persons who have deponed against him, he can have recourse to conjecture only; malice is the soul ground of exception which he is permitted to urge; he may have been accused from fanaticism, fear, or ignorant scruples; or his personal enemy may have put forward, as the instrument of his malice, an individual whom the prisoner would never think of suspecting; and sometimes the procurator-fiscal takes the precaution of secretly establishing the credibility of his witnesses beforehand, with the view of defeating the challenge. The inquisitors are uniformly disposed to favour the witnesses for the prosecution, and to screen them from punishment, even in cases of perjury. Nor is this evil to be traced to the character of particular judges; it springs from the very genius of the tribunal, which induces all who are connected with it to set at defiance the most essential principles of justice by which every other court is governed, and even to disregard its own regulations, for the sake of encouraging informations and indulging a morbid jealousy. Of the same illusory nature is the privilege which, in certain cases, they give the prisoner to bring forward exculpatory evidence. For, in the first place, he is restricted in his choice of witnesses. While the testimony of persons of all descriptions—relations, domestics, New Christians, malefactors, infamous characters, children, and even idiots, is admissible against him; he, on the contrary, is directed to name, for his exculpation, only Christians of ancient race, of unimpeached character, and who are neither his relatives nor domestics. And, in the second place, the tribunal reserves to itself the power of examining such of the prisoner's witnesses only as it shall judge "most fit and worthy of credit."

The injustice of the inquisitorial process can only be equalled by its cruelty. Persons of undoubted veracity, who had the happiness to escape from the secret prisons of the Inquisitions during the sixteenth century, have described them as narrow and gloomy cells, which admitted the light only by a small chink,—damp, and resembling graves more than prisons, if they were subterraneous; and if they were situated in the upper part of the building, feeling in summer like heated furnaces. At present, they are described as, in general, good vaulted chambers, well lighted, free of humidity, and of such size as to allow the prisoner to take a little exercise. But even those who give the most favourable description of these abodes admit, that nothing can be conceived more frightful than the situation of the individual who is immured in them, left as he is to conjecture respecting his accuser and the particular crime with which he is charged; kept in ignorance of the state of his process; shut out from every kind of intercourse with his friends; denied even the consolation of conversing confidentially with the person to whom his defence has been intrusted; refused all use of books; afraid, if he has a fellow-prisoner for a few days, to do more than exchange salutations with him, lest he should be confiding in a spy; threatened if he hum a tune, and especially a sacred one, to relieve his languor; plunged, during the rigor of the winter months, in total darkness for fifteen hours of every day in an abode that never saw the cheerful blaze of a fire; and, in fine, knowing that if ever he should be set free, he must go out to the world lost forever in public opinion, and loaded with an infamy, heavier than that of the pardoned assassin or parricide, which will attach to his children of the remotest generation. What wonder that such prisoners as are not induced, at an early period of their confinement, to confess guilt, become a prey to dejection, and seek relief from their miseries in death, or else sink into a hopeless and morbid insensibility, from which the rack itself is scarcely sufficient to rouse them?

That part of the process which relates to the torture is a monstrous compound of injustice and barbarity. If, after the evidence is closed, the tribunal find that there is only a demi-proof of guilt against the prisoner, it is warranted, by its instructions, to have recourse to the torture, in order to force him to furnish additional evidence against himself. He is allowed, indeed, to appeal to the council of the Supreme

* Mr. Townsend relates, that the Dutch consul, with whom he became acquainted during his travels in Spain in 1787, could never be prevailed on to give an account of his imprisonment in the inquisition at Barcelona, which had happened thirty-five years before, and betrayed the greatest agitation when pressed to say any thing about the treatment he had received. His fellow-prisoner, M. Falconet, who was but a boy, turned gray-headed during his short confinement, and to the day of his death, though retired to Montpellier, observed the most tenacious silence on the subject. He had destroyed a picture of the virgin; and his friend, the Dutch consul, being present and not turning accuser, was considered as a partner in his guilt. (Townsend's Journey through Spain, vol. ii. p. 336.)

against the sentence of the inquisitors ordering him to be tortured; but then, by a refinement in cruelty, it is provided that the inquisitors shall be judges of the validity of this appeal, and, "if they deem it frivolous, shall proceed to the execution of their sentence without delay." In this case, the appeal of the poor prisoner is as little heard of as are the shrieks which he utters in the subterraneous den to which he is conducted without delay, where every bone is moved from its socket, and the blood is made to start from every vein of his body. But it is not my intention to shock the feelings of the reader by any description of the infernal operation; and, instead of trusting myself to make any reflections of my own on a practice so disgraceful to human nature, I shall merely quote those of the late historian and ex-secretary of the Inquisition. "I do not stop (says he) to describe the several kinds of torture inflicted on the accused by order of the Inquisition; this task having been executed with sufficient exactness by a great many historians. On this head, I declare that none of them can be accused of exaggeration. I have read many processes which have struck and pierced me with horror, and I could regard the inquisitors who have recourse to such methods in no other light than that of cold-blooded barbarians. Suffice it to add, that the council of the Supreme has often been obliged to forbid the repetition of the torture in the same process; but the inquisitors, by an abominable sophism, have found means to render this prohibition almost useless, by giving the name of Suspension to that cessation from torture which is imperiously demanded by the imminent danger to which the victim is exposed of dying among their hands. My pen refuses to trace the picture of these horrors, for I know nothing more opposed to the spirit of charity and compassion which Jesus Christ inculcates in the gospel, than this conduct of the inquisitors; and yet, in spite of the scandal which it has given, there is not, after the eighteenth century is closed, any law or decree abolishing the torture."

Of the punishments inflicted by the inquisition, of the sanbenito, or coat of infamy, and the auto-de-fe, with all its dread accompaniments, we shall have too much occasion to speak in the sequel.

The principles of the ancient and modern inquisition were radically the same, but they assumed a more malignant form under the latter than under the former. Under the ancient inquisition, the bishops had always a certain degree of control over its proceedings; the law of secrecy was not so rigidly enforced in practice; greater liberty was allowed to the accused on their defence; and in some countries, as in Aragon, in consequence of the civil rights acquired by the people, the inquisitors were restrained from sequestrating the property of those whom they convicted of heresy. But the leading difference between the two institutions consisted in the organization of the latter into one great independent tribunal, which, extending over the whole kingdom, was governed by one code of laws, and yielded implicit obedience to one head. The inquisitor-general possessed an authority scarcely inferior to that of the king or the pope; by joining with either of them, he proved an overmatch for the other; and when supported by both, his power was irresistible. The ancient inquisition was a powerful engine for harassing and rooting out a small body of dissidents; the modern inquisition stretched its iron arms over a whole nation, upon which it lay like a monstrous incubus, paralysing its exertions, crushing its energies, and extinguishing every other feeling but a sense of weakness and terror.

In the course of the first year in which it was erected, the inquisition of Seville, which then extended over Castile, committed two thousand persons alive to the flames, burnt as many in effigy, and condemned seventeen thousand to different penances. According to a moderate computation, from the same date to 1517, the year in which Luther made his appearance, thirteen thousand persons were burnt alive, eight thousand seven hundred were burnt in effigy, and one hundred and sixty-nine thousand seven hundred and twenty-three were condemned to penances; making in all one hundred and ninety-one thousand four hundred and twenty-three persons condemned by the several tribunals of Spain in the course of thirty-six years. There is reason for thinking that this estimate falls much below the truth. For from 1481 to 1520, it is computed that in Andalusia alone thirty thousand persons informed against themselves, from the dread of being accused by others, or in the hope of obtaining a mitigation of their sentence. And down to the commencement of the seventeenth century, the instances of absolution were so rare, that one is scarcely to be found in a thousand cases; the inquisitors making it a point, that, if possible, none should escape without bearing a mark of their censure, as at least suspected de levi, or in the lowest degree.

It was to be expected that the inquisitors would exert their power in checking the cultivation of biblical learning. In 1490, many copies of the Hebrew Bible were committed to the flames at Seville by the order of Torquemada; and in an auto-de-fe celebrated soon after at Salamanca, six thousand volumes shared the same fate, under the pretext that they contained judaism, magic, and other illicit arts. Deza, archbishop of Seville, who had succeeded Torquemada as inquisitor-general, ordered the papers of Lebrixa to be seized, and passed sentence against him as suspected of heresy, for the corrections which he had made on the text of the Vulgate, and his other labours in elucidation of the Scriptures. "The archbishop's object (says Lebrixa, in an apology which he drew up for himself) was to deter me from writing. He wished to extinguish the knowledge of the two languages on which our religion depends; and I was condemned for impiety, because, being no divine, but a mere grammarian, I presumed to treat of theological subjects. If a person endeavour to restore the purity of the sacred text, and point out the mistakes which have vitiated it, unless he will retract his opinions, he must be loaded with infamy, excommunicated, and doomed to an ignominious punishment! Is it not enough that I submit my judgment to the will of Christ in the Scriptures? must I also reject as false what is as clear and evident as the light of truth itself? What tyranny! To hinder a man, under the most cruel pains, from saying what he thinks, though he expresses himself with the utmost respect for religion, to forbid him to write in his closet or in the solitude of a prison, to speak to himself, or even to think! On what subject shall we employ our thoughts, if we are prohibited from directing them to those sacred oracles which have been the delight of the pious in every age, and on which they have meditated by day and by night!"

Arbitrary as this court was in its principles, and tyrannnical and cruel as it has proved in its proceedings, so blinded did the Spanish nation become as to felicitate herself on the establishment of the inquisition. The cities of ancient Greece vied with one another for the honour of having given birth to Homer. The cities of modern Germany have warmly disputed the honour of having invented the art of printing. Even the credit of having first adopted this German invention has given rise to an honourable rivalry among the states of Italy; and the monastery of St. Subiac, in the Campagna di Roma, has endeavoured to wrest the palm from both Milan and Venice. But the cities of Spain have engaged in a more than inglorious contest for the credit of having been the first seat of an institution which, after failing to strangle learning in its birth, has all along persecuted it with the most unrelenting malice. The claims of the inhabitants of Seville are engraven on a monument erected in their city to the memory of this event. Segovia has contested this honour with Seville, and its historians are seriously divided on the question, whether the Holy Office held its first sitting in the house of the marques de Moya, or in that of the majorat de Caceres.*

It is but justice, however, to the Spaniards to state, that this perverted and degrading sentiment was the effect of the inquisition, and formed no original trait in the national character. The fact is now ascertained beyond all question, that the erection of this tribunal was viewed by the nation with the greatest aversion and alarm. Talavera, the excellent archbishop of Granada, resisted its introduction with all his influence. The most enlightened Spaniards of that age spoke of its proceedings with horror and shame. "The losses and misery which the evil ministers of the inquisition have brought on my country can never be enough deplored," says the chevalier de Cordova, Gonzalez de Ayora, in a letter to the secretary of king Ferdinand. "O, unhappy Spain, mother of so many heroes, how unjustly disgraced by such a horrible scourge!" exclaims Peter Martyr. D'Arbues, the first inquisitor of Aragon, and afterwards canonized as a martyr, was not the only individual who fell a sacrifice to the indignation against the inquisition, shared by all classes of the community. Torquemada, the first inquisitor-general, was obliged to adopt the greatest precautions for his personal safety. In his journeys he was uniformly accompanied by a guard of fifty familiars on horseback, and two hundred on foot; and he had always on his table the tusk of a wild animal, to which he trusted for discovering and neutralizing poisons. In Aragon, where the inhabitants had been accustomed to the old inquisition for two centuries and a half, the introduction of it in its new form excited tumults in various places, and met with a resistance almost national. No sooner had the inhabitants of Castile felt the yoke, than they sought to throw it off; and the cortes of that kingdom joined with those of Aragon and Catalonia, in representing the grievances which they suffered from the inquisition, and in demanding a radical reform on its iniquitous and oppressive laws. It is unnecessary to say, that these attempts, which were renewed at intervals during thirty years from the establishment of that tribunal, proved finally abortive.

* Llorente, i. 151. This is astonishing; but what follows is still more so. "During my residence in London (says Llorente) I heard some Catholics say, that the inquisition had been useful in Spain by preserving the Catholic faith; and that it would have been well for France if she had had a similar establishment." "An English Catholic priest, in my hearing, made an apology for it." (Ibid. Pref. p. xxi. and tom. ii. p. 288.)

This unfortunate issue was in no small degree owing to cardinal Ximenes, who contributed more than any other individual to rivet the chains of political and spiritual despotism on his native country. Possessed of talents which enabled him to foresee the dire effects which the Inquisition would inevitably produce, he was called to take part in public affairs at a time when these effects had decidedly appeared. It was in his power to abolish that execrable tribunal altogether as an insufferable nuisance, or at least to impose such checks upon its procedure as would have rendered it comparatively harmless. But he not only allowed himself to be placed at its head, but employed all his influence and address in defeating every attempt to reform its worst and most glaring abuses. In 1512, the New Christians made an offer of six hundred thousand crowns to Ferdinand, to assist him in carrying on the war in Navarre, on condition that a law were passed enjoining the testimonies of the witnesses, in processes before the Inquisition, to be made public. With the view of diverting the king from acceding to this proposal, Ximenes seconded his remonstrances against it by placing a large sum of money at the royal disposal. And, in 1516, when a similar offer was made to the ministers of Charles V., and when the universities and learned men of Spain and Flanders had given their opinion, that the communication of the names and depositions of the witnesses was conformable both to divine and human laws, the cardinal again interposed, and by messengers and letters urged the rejection of the measure, upon the wretched plea that a certain nameless witness had been assassinated, and that the person of the king was put in danger by the admission of converted Jews into the palace He exerted himself with equal zeal in resisting the applications which the New Christians made to the court of Rome for the same object. During the eleven years that he was at the head of this tribunal, fifty-one thousand one hundred and sixty-seven persons were condemned, of whom two thousand five hundred and thirty-six were burnt alive. Not satisfied with perpetuating the Inquisition in his native country, he extended the precious boon to two quarters of the globe, by establishing one tribunal at Oran in Africa, and another at Cuba in America. With the exception of the check which, at the commencement of his ministry, he put on the mad proceedings of the inquisitor Luzero, who, by listening to false accusations, had harassed the good archbishop of Granada, the marquis of Pliego, and many of the most respectable persons of the kingdom, the reforms which the cardinal made on the Inquisition are confined to the substitution of a St. Andrew's cross, in place of the ordinary one, on the sanbenito, and the allotment of separate churches for the New Christians. If mankind were to be treated as their foolish admiration of talents merit, they would be left to groan under the rod of oppression. Ximenes has obtained the title of a great man, from foreigners as well as natives of Spain. But in spite of the eulogiums passed upon him, I cannot help being of opinion, with a modern writer, that Ximenes bore a striking resemblance to Philip II., with this difference, that the cardinal was possessed of higher talents, and that his proceedings were characterized by a certain openness and impartiality, the result of the unlimited confidence which he placed in his own powers. His character was eesentially that of a monk, in which the severity of his order was combined with the impetuosity of blood which belongs to the natives of the south.

The cardinal would be still more inexcusable if he were the author of an unpublished work which has been ascribed to him. It is a fictitious composition, after the manner of the Utopia of Sir Thomas More, and treats of the best mode of governing a kingdom. In one part of it, the abuses of the Holy Office are discussed freely and at large in the presence of Prudenciano, monarch of the kingdom of Truth, who, after hearing the inquisitors, decides, with the advice of his counsellors, that all persons accused of heresy shall be put in possession of the names and depositions of the witnesses; that they shall have the same liberty of holding intercourse with their advocates, procurators and friends, which is granted to other prisoners; that they shall not be excluded from the benefit of divine service during their confinement; that New Christians, and the descendants of heretics, shall be admissible to all offices, and exempted from every stigma; that, to prevent ignorant convictions, the tribunals of the Inquisition shall be provided with judges well instructed in questions of faith; that the confiscation of the goods of those condemned for heresy shall be limited to the property which they actually possess at the time, and shall not extend to the portions which they had previously given to their married children, nor interfere with the fulfilment of any lawful engagement which they had contracted; and in general, that processes before the Inquisition shall be conducted on the maxims which regulate other courts of criminal judicature. This treatise, drawn up during the minority of Charles V., was intended for the instruction of that young prince, and proves that Spain possessed at that time persons of superior illumination; but we may safely acquit cardinal Ximenes from the suspicion of being the author of a work containing principles of liberal policy and enlightened justice, which there is no reason to think that ghostly statesman ever entertained at any period of his life.

The history of the Inquisition, during the first thirty years after its erection, discloses a series of intrigue, in which it is hard to say whether the court of Rome, the court of Spain, or the Holy Office, acted the most deceitful and unprincipled part. While they combined to oppress and impoverish the people of Spain, each of them sought to overreach the other and to promote its own selfish designs. The court of Rome readily gave its sanction to the establishment of the Inquisition; and Sixtus IV., in a letter to queen Isabella, signified that "he had felt the most lively desire to see it introduced into the kingdom of Castile." Notwithstanding this, the papal court both secretly and openly encouraged the New Christians to appeal to Rome, reversed the sentences which the Inquisition had pronounced against them in Spain, and admitted them to reconciliation in secret. But after it had extorted large sums of money for these favours, no sooner did the Spanish monarch, at the instigation of the inquisitors, reclaim against these proceedings, than it revoked its decisions, suspended the execution of its bulls, and left the victims of its avarice and duplicity to the vengeance of their incensed persecutors. It was evidently on the same avaricious principle that Leo X., in the year 1517, authorized the inquisitors at Rome to judge in complaints of heresy against natives of Spain. On that occasion, Gerónimo Vich, the Spanish ambassador, received orders from his court to remonstrate against this decree, as inflicting a stigma on a nation which had testified such zeal for the catholic faith, and to request that the remedy against heresy should be applied equally to those of other countries. To this representation Leo gravely replied, that so far from wishing to inflict a disgrace, he had intended to confer an honour on the Spanish nation; that he had dealt with them as a rich man does with his jewels, which he guards with greater care than the rest of his property; and thought that, as the Spaniards entertained so high an esteem for the Inquisition at home, they would not be offended with it abroad.

The conduct of the Inquisition presented the same glaring contradiction of the avowed principles on which it was founded. Amidst all their professions of zeal for the purity of the faith, the inquisitors carried on the scandalous traffic of commuting canonical censure for pecuniary mulcts. To retain Christians within the sacred enclosure of the catholic church, and in dutiful subjection to its supreme head, was the grand object of the institution of the Holy Office; and the exercise of its powers was delegated to the monks, who were the most devoted supporters of the Roman pontiff, and held that his decrees in matters of faith, when pronounced ex cathedra, were infallible. Yet, when the decrees of the holy see were opposite to their own determinations, or interfered with their particular interests, they made no scruple of resisting them, and engaging the government of the country in their quarrel.

It was not to be expected that the conduct of the court of Spain would be less selfish. All are agreed that Ferdinand, in supporting the Inquisition, regarded it, not as a means of preserving the purity of religion, but as an instrument of tyranny and extortion. Nor was his grandson Charles V. actuated by higher motives. On assuming the reins of government in Spain, he swore to observe certain equivocal regulations for correcting the abuses of the Inquisition; but he declared, at the same time, in private, that this promise had been extorted from him by the importunity of the representatives of certain cities. Despairing of any relief from this quarter, the cortes of Aragon sent deputies to Rome, and, by the distribution of a sum of money among the cardinals, obtained three briefs reforming the Inquisition, and placing its procedure on the footing of common law. Charles, who wished to employ that formidable tribunal as an engine for suppressing the tumults which his arbitrary measures had excited in various parts of the kingdom, applied to Leo. X. for a bull annulling the obnoxious briefs. The negotiation which ensued, and was protracted during three years, is equally disgraceful to both parties. His Holiness told Senor de Belmonte, the Spanish ambassador, that he had been informed by credible persons, that the Inquisition was the cause of terrible mischief in Spain; to which the ambassador bluntly replied, that the persons who gave this information were believed, because they were liberal of their money. At the same time, he advised his master to have recourse to that system of bribery of which he complained. "Cardinal Santiquatro (writes he) can be of great service in this affair, because he draws as much money as possible to his master and himself. It is only on this condition that he is authorized by the pope to act, and he executes his task with great adroitness. The cardinal of Ancona is a learned man, and an enemy to the former. He is minister of justice, and can be useful, as he is well disposed, to serve your majesty; but he is reckoned as great a thief as his colleague." In another missive he says, "Always I am assured that, in what relates to the Inquisition, money is a means of gaining over these cardinals." And after soliciting instructions from his court, he adds, "All this is necessary, and something besides; for money does much here. The pope expects (from Aragon and Catalonia) forty-six or forty-seven thousand ducats." The cardinals were too "wise in their generation" to be deceived by the flattering representations which the ambassador made of his master's disinterestedness, and laughed at the idea of sovereigns supporting the Inquisitions "from pure zeal for religion." In vain did Charles himself endeavour to quicken the tardy steps of Leo, by writing that "the world surmised that his Holiness and he understood one another, and wished to squeeze as much money as possible from the bull in question." The crafty pontiff, assuming the tone of justice, threatened, by a decree of the sacred Rota, to annul all the sentences of confiscation pronounced against those Spaniards who had made a voluntary confession of heresy; "and I am told," says the ambassador, "that if this measure pass, as is expected, your majesty will be obliged to restore more than a million of ducats acquired in that way." A few persons, through perversion of judgment, have burnt men alive for the love of God, but, in the greater number of instances, I apprehend it will be found that this has been done for the love of money.

Leo X., having died during this dispute, was succeeded by Adrian, the preceptor of Charles V., who continued to hold the situation of inquisitor-general of Spain, along with that of supreme pontiff, for nearly two years. This union of offices, in the person of the spiritual adviser of the young monarch, led to measures which extinguished every hope of procuring a reform of the Holy Office. Despairing of relief, the nation submitted to the yoke; habit reconciled them to it; and, making a virtue of necessity, they soon came to congratulate themselves on an institution which they had regarded as an engine of the most intolerable and degrading servitude.

Other causes contributed, along with the Inquisition, to rivet the chains of religious bondage on the minds of the Spaniards, and to render the prospect of ecclesiastical reform among them next to hopeless.

One of these causes was the suppression of their civil liberties. Formerly the victims of persecution had often found shelter within the independent domains of the nobles, or the privileged walls of great cities. Cardinal Ximenes, by flattering the commons without adding to their real consequence, had succeeded in breaking the power of the nobility. Charles pursued the line of policy which his minister had begun, by invading the rights of the people. Irritated by the assistance which the latter had given to the attack on their immunities, the nobles either stood aloof from the contest which ensued, or sided with the crown. The consequence was, that the commons, after an enthusiastic resistance, were subdued; the cortes and the chartered towns were stripped of their privileges; and the authority of the sovereign became absolute and despotical throughout the united kingdom.

The great accession of wealth and reputation which Spain had acquired by the discovery of the New World, proved no less fatal to her religious than to her political liberty. Columbus appears to have been at first actuated solely by an enthusiastic passion for nautical discovery; but during the discouragements with which his ardent and unconquerable spirit had to contend, another feeling arose of a no less powerful kind, which was cherished, if not infused, by the monks of La Rabida, among whom he resided for some time, and who zealously assisted him in his applications to the court of Castile, and in his exertions to fit out the fleet with which he entered on his daring enterprise. His imagination was now fired with the idea of not only adding to the boundaries of the known world, but also of enlarging the pale of the catholic church, by converting to the Christian faith the inhabitants of those rich and populous countries with which he hoped to open a communication, by stretching across the waters of the western ocean. Similar views, but associated with baser feelings, were adopted by the successors of Columbus. As the see of Rome, in virtue of the universal authority which it arrogated, had granted to Spain all the countries which she might discover beyond the Atlantic, the conquerors of America looked upon themselves as the servants of the church as much as of the sovereigns from whom they immediately received their commission; their cupidity was inflamed by fanaticism; and the consideration that every battle which they won was subservient to the spread of the catholic faith, atoned for and sanctified, in their eyes, the unheard-of cruelties which they inflicted on the intimidated and unoffending natives of the New World. Sanctioned as they were by the government and clergy, these views were easily diffused through the nation. Astonished at the intelligence which they received from their countrymen who had visited the newly-discovered regions, elated by the splendid success which had crowned their undertakings, and flushed with the hopes of the inexhaustible riches which would continue to flow in upon them, the Spaniards were thrown into a feverish intoxication, which, meeting with other causes, produced an important change on their sentiments and character. New feelings sprung up in their breasts; and late transactions were seen by them in a light different from that in which they had formerly viewed them. Reflecting that they had expelled the Jews, the hereditary and inveterate enemies of Christianity, from their coasts, overturned the Mahomedan empire which had been established for ages in the Peninsula, and planted the standard of the cross among pagans on a new continent of incalculable extent, they began to consider themselves as the favourites of heaven, destined to propagate and defend the true faith, and bound, by national honour, as well as duty, to preserve their sacred soil from being polluted by the slightest taint of heretical pravity.

To these causes must be added the vast increase of strength which the Spanish monarchy received by the succession of its youthful sovereign to his paternal dominions in the Low Countries, Austria, Bohemia, and Hungary; and by his elevation to the imperial throne of Germany, under the name of Charles V. The chief obstacle which this presented to the spread of the reformed opinions in Spain, did not lie in the ease with which it enabled him to crush the least symptom of revolt from the established faith. Independently of all personal convictions, Charles, in seeking to realize his towering projects of universal empire, must have seen it his interest to cultivate the friendship of the court of Rome; and although he was involved in contests with particular pontiffs, and held one of them for some time a prisoner in his own castle, yet he uniformly testified the warmest regard for the catholic faith, and the honour of the popedom. In the forcible measures to which he had recourse for suppressing the Reformation in Germany, he relied chiefly on the troops which he drew from Spain, whose detestation of heresy was heightened by the hostilities which they waged against its professors. To their countrymen at home, who already regarded them as the champions of the faith, they transmitted the most hateful representation of the protestants, whom they described as at once the pest of the church, and the great obstacle to the execution of the splendid schemes of their beloved monarch. Thus the glory of the Spanish arms became associated with the extirpation of heresy. And when the protestant cause ultimately triumphed over the policy and power of the emperor, the mortification felt by the Spaniards settled into a deadly antipathy to every thing which proceeded from Germany, and a jealous dread lest the heresy with which it was infected should secretly find its way into their own country.

CHAPTER IV.

Introduction of the Reformed Doctrine into Spain.

The boldness with which Luther attacked, first the abuses, and afterwards the authority of the Roman see, soon attracted general attention throughout Christendom. Nor could his opinions remain long unknown in Spain, especially after the intercourse between that country and Germany became frequent, in consequence of the advancement of the Spanish monarch to the imperial throne.

So early as the beginning of the year 1519, John Froben, a celebrated printer at Basle, sent to Spain a quantity of a collection of tracts by Luther, which he had lately reprinted. These were in Latin, and consequently were confined to the learned. But, in the course of the following year, the reformer's commentary on the Galatians, a work which exhibited his doctrinal sentiments on the most important points, was translated into Spanish. This was followed by translations into the same language of his treatise on Christian liberty, and his reply to Erasmus on free-will. These books appear to have been translated and printed at Antwerp, a place of great trade within the paternal dominions of Charles V., from which the Spanish merchants, who were at the expense of the publication, could most easily get copies conveyed to their native country.

Alfonso Valdes, a young man of talents who accompanied Charles V., as secretary, to his coronation in 1520, sent to Spain, at the request of Peter Martyr, a particular account of the religious dispute in Germany, from the first declaration of Luther against indulgences to his burning of the pontifical decrees at Wittenberg. In another letter, written during the following year, he continued his account to the close of the diet of Worms. His narrative is in general correct; and although he expresses great horror at the boldness with which the reformer attacked the papal authority, he acknowledges the necessity of reform, and ascribes the continuance of the evil to the aversion of the pope to a general council, and "his preferring his private interest to the public good." "While he tenaciously adheres to his rights," says he, "and shutting his ears, under the influence of a pious feeling perhaps, wishes to have Luther devoted to the flames, the whole Christian commonwealth is going to ruin, if God interpose not." Myrtyr, who seems to have felt in the same way with his correspondent, imparted these letters to his friends; but it may be mentioned, as a proof of the state of feeling in Spain, that he declined giving them any account of Luther's opinions, referring them for this to the writings of his opponents, "which they could easily procure, if they wished them, and in which they would find the antidote along with the poison."

Another Spaniard of greater authority, who was in Germany at the same time, felt somewhat differently from Valdes. Francisco de Angelis, provincial of the religious order called Angeli in Spain, had been present at the coronation of the emperor, by whom he was despatched, after the diet of Worms, to assist in quelling the revolt which had broken out in Castile. On his way home he stopped at Basle, where he had a long conversation with Conrad Pellican on the opinions of Luther, with whom he professed to agree upon most points.

Who would have thought of the Spanish ambassador at Rome writing home in favour of Luther? We have already adverted to the difficulty which Charles found in procuring the recall of certain briefs which the pope had issued for the reform of the Inquisition. It occurred to Don Juan de Manuel, as a stroke of policy, that his master should give countenance to another species of reform which his Holiness dreaded. Accordingly, in a letter dated 10 May, 1520, he advises his majesty "to undertake a journey to Germany, and to appear to show a little favour to a certain friar, Martin Luther, at the court of Saxony, who gives great uneasiness to the sovereign pontiff, by certain things which he preaches and publishes against the papal authority. This monk (adds the ambassador) is said to be very learned, and creates great embarrassment to the pope." Nor was this a mere passing thought; for he recurs to the subject in a subsequent letter. "As to the affair of Liege, the pope appears much more discontented, because it has been told him that the bishop favours friar Martin Luther, who condemns the pontifical power in Germany. He is also displeased with Erasmus in Holland, and for the same reason. I say, they complain here of the bishop of Liege in the affair of Luther, who gives them more distress than they could wish.

On the 20th of March 1521, Leo X. issued two briefs, one addressed to the constable and the other to the admiral of Castile, who governed the kingdom in the absence of Charles V., requiring them to adopt measures for preventing the introduction of the books of Luther and his defenders into Spain. In the course of the following month, cardinal Adrian charged the inquisitors to sieze all books of this description; and this charge was reiterated by him in the year 1523, after he had ascended the papal throne, on which occasion he required the corrigidor of Guipuscoa to furnish the officers of the Inquisition with every assistance which they might require in the execution of this duty.

These were not measures of mere precaution, or intended only for the purpose of display; for the works of Luther were read and approved of in Spain. The report of this fact drew from Erasmus the sarcasm which gave great offence to the duke of Alva, "that the Spaniards favoured Luther, in order that they might be thought Christians." So eager were the inquisitors in their search after the disciples of the new doctrine, that they fixed their suspicions on the venerable Juan de Avila, commonly called the apostle of Andalusia. In his preaching, which was recommended by the exemplary piety and charity of his life, he kept to the simplicity of scripture, rejecting the abstruse and foolish questions of the schools. Irritated by his reproofs, and envious of his fame, the monks, in 1525, denounced to the Inquisition some propositions advanced by him, as Lutheran, or savouring of Lutheranism and the doctrine of the illuminati. He was thrown into prison, and would have been condemned, had not Manrique, one of the mildest of the inquisitors-general, who felt a high respect for his character, extended to him the shield of his powerful protection, which did not however prevent his works from being afterwards put into the list of prohibited books.

The Spanish monks were diverted for a time from searching after the writings of Luther, by their anxiety to suppress those of Erasmus, from which they dreaded more immediate danger. This learned man, to whom the name of the forerunner of Luther has not unjustly been given, had many friends in Spain, who were so confident in their strength, as to write him that they expected to be victorious in the contest. They were mistaken; for his adversaries outnumbered them in an ecclesiastical junta held at Madrid in the year 1527; and in consequence of this, his Colloquies, his Praise of Folly, and his Paraphrase of the New Testament, were censured, and prohibited to be explained in schools, or to be sold or read. "How I am to be pitied!" exclaims he; "the Lutherans attacked me as a convicted papist, and the Catholics run me down as a friend of Luther."

The patrons of ignorance resolved to pursue their victory, and prosecutions for heresy were immediately commenced against some of the most learned men in the kingdom. Pedro de Lerma, professor of divinity and chancellor of the university of Alcala, was denounced to the inquisition of Toledo, as suspected of the Lutheran opinions, and fled to Paris. His nephew and successor, Luis de Cadena, soon fell under the same suspicion, and followed his example. Juan de Vergara, one of the editors of the Polyglot, and his brother Bernardin Tobar, were less fortunate; for, being seized by the orders of the inquisitors of Toledo, they were not permitted to leave the dungeons of the Holy Office, until they had adjured the heresy of Luther as persons slightly suspected, received absolution ad cautelam, and submitted to certain penances.

Two events which happened at this time had considerable influence in turning the attention of the Spaniards to the cause of Luther, and giving them a more favourable impression of his opinions. The first was the dispute between Charles V. and pope Clement VII., which led, in 1527, to the sack of Rome and imprisonment of the pontiff. Though Charles, on that occasion, ordered the public rejoicings for the birth of his son Philip to be suspended, as a mark of his sorrow for so untoward an occurrence, yet it was regarded as a triumph by the nation, and gave occasion to satirical ballads against the pope and see of Rome. The other event was the presenting, in 1530, of the protestant confession of faith to the imperial diet of Augsberg, at which Charles was present, attended by a great body of Spanish nobles and clergy. This had no inconsiderable effect in dissipating the false idea of the opinions of Luther which had hitherto been industriously propagated. At the diet at Worms in 1521, the Spanish attendants of the emperor, instead of admiring the heroism displayed by Luther, treated him with insult as he retired from the court-room to his lodgings. But there was a marked difference in their behaviour on the present occasion. Persons of note, including the emperor's confessor, who was a native of Spain, acknowledged that they had hitherto been deceived. When Charles asked the advice of the Spanish nobility who were present, they replied, after perusing the confession in a French translation, that if his majesty found it contrary to the articles of faith, he ought to suppress the Lutherans; but if it merely required the abolition of certain ceremonies and such like things, he ought not to have recourse to violent measures against them; and they gave it as their advice, that the litigated points should be submitted to some pious persons who were addicted to neither party. Alfonso Valdes, the emperor's secretary, of whom we have already spoken, had several friendly and confidential interviews with Melanchthon at this important crisis. He read the Augsburg confession before it was presented to the diet; and the only objection which he appears to have made to it was, that its language was rather too severe for its opponents. In one of the conversations between these two learned men, held in the presence of Cornelius Scepper, an agent of the king of Denmark, Melanchthon lamented the strong prejudices which the natives of Spain had conceived against the reformers, and said, that he had frequently endeavoured, both by word of mouth and by letters, to convince them of the misconceptions under which they laboured, but with very little success. Valdes acknowledged that it was a common opinion among his countrymen, that Luther and his followers believed neither in God nor the Trinity, in Christ nor the Virgin; and that in Spain it was thought as meritorious an action to strangle a Lutheran as to shoot a Turk. He added, that his influence had been exerted to relieve the mind of the emperor from such false impressions; and that, at a late interview, he had received it in charge to say, that his majesty wished Melanchthon to draw up a clear summary of the opinions of the Lutherans, contrasted, article by article, with those of their opponents. The reformer readily complied with this request, and the result of his labours was communicated by Valdes to Campegio, the papal legate.

These proceedings did not escape the vigilant eye of the Inquisition. When Valdes returned soon after to his native country, he was accused before the Holy Office, and condemned as a suspected Lutheran; a censure which he incurred by his exertions to promote polite letters in his native country, as well as by the familiarity which he had cultivated with the reformers of Germany. Alfonso de Virves met with the same treatment as his friend Valdes, and for the same reasons. This learned Benedictine was chaplain to Charles V. who had taken him along with him in his late visits to Germany, and was so fond of him that, on his return to Spain, he would hear no other preacher. Virves had favoured, though with much reserve, the writings of Erasmus, and was known to have conversed with some of the principal reformers. On these grounds his conduct was watched, and he soon found himself in the hands of the inquisitors at Seville. In vain did he appeal to a work against Melanchthon which he had prepared for the press; and, what is more singular, in vain did the emperor interpose to stop the process, banish the inquisitor-general from Seville, and signify his displeasure against the other members of the council of the Supreme. Virves was kept in the secret prisons for four years, during which, to use his own words, "he was occupied, without breathing or respite, with charges, replies, rejoinders, depositions, defences, arguments, acts, (words, the very utterance of which made him shudder) errors, heresies, schisms, blasphemies, anathemas." At last, in 1537, a definitive sentence was pronounced, condemning him, as suspected of holding the errors of Luther, to make a formal abjuration, to be absolved ad cautelam, to be confined in a monastery for two years, and to be prohibited from preaching for other two years. He was accordingly obliged to abjure, on the day of his auto-de-fe in the metropolitan church of Seville, all the heresies of Luther in general, and those in particular which he was suspected of entertaining. The emperor procured a brief from the pope, absolving his favourite preacher from the remaining pains of censure; but when he afterwards presented him to the bishopric of the Canaries, it was with the utmost reluctance that his Holiness granted the bull of confirmation to a man who had incurred the suspicion of heresy in the eyes of the Inquisition. "Many have adopted the maxim," says Virves, speaking of the proper manner of converting heretics, "that it is lawful to abuse a heretic by word and writing, when they have it not in their power to kill or torture him. If they get a poor man, whom they can persecute with impunity, into their hands, they subject him to a disgraceful sentence; so that, though he prove himself innocent and obtain an acquittal, he is stigmatized for life as a criminal. If, on the other hand, the unhappy person has fallen into error through inadvertence, or the conversation of those with whom he associated, his judges do not labour to undeceive him by explaining the doctrine of Scripture, soft persuasion, and paternal advice, but, in spite of the character of fathers to which they lay claim, have recourse to the prison, the torture, chains, and the axe. And what is the effect of these horrible means? All these torments inflicted on the body can produce no change whatever on the dispositions of the mind, which can be brought back to the truth only by the word of God, which is quick, powerful, and sharper than a two-edged sword."

These reflections are so excellent in themselves, and so refreshing as coming from the pen of a Spanish catholic of the sixteenth century, that, in reading them, we feel disposed to rejoice, instead of grieving at that imprisonment which, if it did not suggest them, must have served to deepen their impression on his mind. No thanks, however, to the persecutors. Some writers have expressed their surprise that the proceedings against Virves and others did not open the eyes of Charles V. to the iniquity of the Inquisition; and they think he continued to be its protector from horror at Lutheranism. But Charles was instructed in the nature of that court, and had given it his decided support, before the name of Luther became formidable. A despotical monarch may be displeased at the procedure of a tribunal of terror when it happens to touch one of his favourites, and may choose to check its encroachments on his own authority, without feeling the slightest wish to weaken its power as an engine for enslaving and oppressing his subjects.

In the mean time every method was taken to prevent the spread of Lutheran books and opinions. The council of the Supreme, in 1530, addressed a circular letter to the inquisitors dispersed over the kingdom, informing them that the writings of Luther had made their way into the country under fictitious names, and that his errors were introduced in the form of notes appended to the works of catholic authors; and therefore requiring them to add to the annual edict of denunciation a clause relating to such books, and to examine all public libraries with the view of discovering them. This led to the domiciliary visits which the familiars of the Inquisition were accustomed, at a subsequent period, to pay to private houses. During the following year the inquisitors were authorized to strike with the sentence of excommunication all who hindered them in the discharge of their duty, and all who read or kept such books, or who did not denounce those whom they knew to be guilty of that offence. The same penalty was extended to the parish priests who did not publish the edict in every city, town, and village; and all prelates of the regular orders, confessors, and preachers, were laid under an obligation to urge their hearers and penitents, under the pain of incurring mortal sin, to inform against themselves and others. The edict enumerated the different articles of the Lutheran heresy, down to the slightest deviation from the ceremonies of the church, and required the informers to declare "if they knew or had heard it said, that any person had taught, maintained, or entertained in his thoughts, any of these opinions."

Hitherto we have not met with a single Spaniard who avowed the reformed tenets, or who was convicted on good grounds of holding them. We have every reason, however, to think that there were persons of this description in Spain, though their names have not come down to us. If this had not been the case, the inquisitors would have been guilty of the grossest indiscretion, in exposing the ears of the people to the risk of infection by publishing, with such particularity, the opinions of the German heretic in every parish church of the kingdom. Yet it must be acknowledged that, in their eagerness to discover what did not exist, and to aggravate the the slightest deviation from the received faith into a dangerous error, they were sometimes instrumental in propagating what they sought to extripate. A simple countryman was brought before the inquisitors of Seville, accused of having said among his friends, that he did not think there was any purgatory but the blood of Christ. He confessed that he had thought so, but, understanding that it was offensive to the holy fathers, declared himself ready to retract the sentiment. This was by no means satisfactory to the inquisitors, who told him, that by adopting that one error he had involved himself in a multitude; for, if there was no purgatory, then the pope, who had decreed the contrary, was not infallible, then general councils had erred, then justification was by faith; and so on. In vain did the poor man protest that such ideas had never once entered into his mind; he was remanded to prison until he should be prepared to retract them. The consequence was, that he was led seriously to think on these topics, and came out of the Inquisition a confirmed Lutheran.

The study of polite letters had been communicated from Spain to Portugal, and the knowledge of the reformed opinions poceeded in the same course. As early as 1521, Emanuel, the Portuguese monarch, addressed a letter to the elector of Saxony, urging him to punish Luther, and extirpate his pernicious tenets, before they should spread farther in Germany, and penetrate into other Christian countries. In 1534, pope Clement VII. being informed that the reformed opinions were daily making progress in Portugal, appointed Diego de Silva as inquisitor of that kingdom; and, in the following year, we find the king representing to the court of Rome that a number of the converted Jews had become protestants.

It has been conjectured that the first converts to the reformed doctrine in Spain belonged to the religious fraternity of Franciscans, because the pope, in 1526, granted power to the general and provincials of that order to absolve such of their brethren as had imbibed the new opinions, and were willing to abjudge them. But this is rather to be viewed in the light of a privilege, craved by the Franciscans to exempt them from the jurisdiction of the inquisitors, who were at first chosen from the rival order of Dominicans. Few of those who afterwards became protestants belonged to the brotherhood of St. Francis.

Juan Valdes, with whom we have met elsewhere, was the first person, so far as I can discover, who embraced and was active in spreading the reformed opinions in Spain. He was of a good family, and had received a liberal education. If we may judge from those with whom he was on terms of intimacy, he had studied at the university of Alcala. Having attached himself to the court, he quitted Spain about the year 1535 in the company of Charles V., who sent him to Naples to act as secretary to the viceroy. The common opinion has been that he became a convert to the Lutheran creed in Germany, but the fact is, that his mind was imbued with its leading tenets before he left his native country. This appears from a treatise drawn up by him under the title of Advice on the Interpreters of Sacred Scripture, which was circulated privately among his acquaintance. It was originally sent in the form of a letter to his friend Bartolomé Carranza, who afterwards became archbishop of Toledo, but had early incurred the suspicions of the Holy Office by the freedom of his opinions. This tract was found among the papers of the primate when he was subsequently seized by the order of the Inquisition, and formed one of the gravest articles of charge against that distinguished and long-persecuted prelate. The Advice contained the following propositions, among others: first, that in order to understand the sacred Scriptures, we must not rely on the interpretations of the fathers; second, that we are justified by a lively faith in the passion and death of our Saviour; and third, that we may attain to certainty concerning our justification. The agreement between these and the leading sentiments maintained by Luther, renders it highly probable that Valdes had read the writings of that reformer or of some of his adherents. At the same time we are told that the principal things in this tract were taken from the Christian institutes of Tauler. This fact throws light on the sentiments of Valdes, and the peculiar cast of his writings. John Tauler was a distinguished German preacher of the fourteenth century, and one of those writers in the church of Rome who have obtained the name of mystics. They were disgusted with the intricate and jejune theology of the scholastic divines, and with the routine of exterior services which constituted the whole practice of piety in the convents; but, being imperfectly instructed in the doctrine of the gospel, in flying from the vice of their age they fell into the opposite extreme. They resolved religion almost entirely into contemplation and meditation; their discourses, consisting of soliloquies on the love of God and the sufferings of Christ, were chiefly calculated to stimulate the passions; and they occasionally made use of extravagant and hyperbolical expressions, which implied that the soul of the devotee was absorbed in the divine essence, and, when favoured with supernatural visitations, was rendered independent upon and superior to external means and ordinances. The exercises, or meditations, on the Life of Christ by Tauler bear a strong resemblance to the better-known work of Thomas à Kempis on the Imitation of Christ. They have the same excellencies and the same faults; breathe the same rich odour of spiritual devotion, and labour under the same deficiency of clear and distinct views of divine truth. These who are well grounded in the doctrines of Christianity may reap great advantage from a perusal of them; candidates for the ministry will find in them an excellent supplement to a course of systematic divinity; but in minds warm and uninformed they are apt to foster a self-righteous and servile disposition, and to give rise to enthusiastic notions.

The mystic theology had its votaries in Spain. A Spanish translation of the Imitation of Christ, and of an earlier work of the same character, entitled the Ladder of Paradise, were published at the close of the fifteenth century. Juan de Avila, Luis de Granada, confessor to the queen regent of Portugal, and St. Francis de Borgia, duke of Gandia, and third general of the order of Jesuits, were the authors of works, for which they were prosecuted before the inquisition as mystics and illuminati. Several of the protestants, who were afterwards brought to the stake at Valladolid, appealed to the writings of the two last-named individuals as containing sentiments similar to those which they held on the head of justification.

Valdes may have become acquainted with the writings of Tauler through the recommendation of Luther, who, at one period of his life, was enamoured with them, and republished, with a commendatory preface, a work written in the same strain, but more liable to exception, under the title of German Theology. In a letter to his friend Spalatin, the reformer says, "If you wish to read in your own language the ancient and pure divinity, procure Tauler's Sermons, of which I now send you an abstract; for nowhere, either in Latin or German, have I met with a theology more wholesome and accordant to the gospel." The doctrines of justification by faith in Christ, and of regeneration by the agency of the Spirit, form the groundwork of the writings of Valdes, and so far his creed is Lutheran or protestant; but we can trace in them the influence of the trancendental divinity which he had caught from Tauler. More intellectual and speculative than the mystic divines, he exhibits in his works the rationale of their creed rather than an exemplification of their mode of writing, and hazards some sentiments which gave just offence to several of the principal reformers. It is amusing to observe his natural inquisitiveness contending with and overcoming that principle in his creed which led him to condemn as sinful all curious inquiries into matters of religion, or indeed into any other matter.

Valdes left his native country at an early period, but he contributed greatly to the spread of the reformed opinions in it by his writings, several of which were published in Spanish. Though he had remained, his personal presence would most probably have produced little effect. It required a person of less caution and more adventurous spirit to burst the terrible barrier which opposed the entrance of the gospel into Spain, and to raise the standard of truth within sight of the flames of the inquisition. Such a person was found in the man of whom I am now to speak.

Rodrigo de Valer, a native of Lebrixa, distant about thirty miles from Seville, had spent his youth in those idle and dissipated habits which were common among the nobility and gentry of Spain. The love of dress, and of horses and sports, engrossed his attention; and in Seville, which was his favourite residence, he shone in the first rank among the young men of fashion in every scene of amusement and feat of gallantry. All of a sudden he disappeared from those places of entertainment of which he had been the life and ornament. He was in good health, and his fortune had sustained no injury. But his mind had undergone a complete change; his splendid equipage was laid aside; he became negligent of his dress; and, shut up in his closet, he devoted himself entirely to reading and meditation on religion. Had he become unexpectedly pious, and immured himself to a convent, his conduct would not have excited general surprise among his countrymen; but to retire from the world, and yet to shun those consecrated abodes, the choice of which was viewed as the great and almost exclusive mark of superior sanctity, appeared to them unaccountable on any other supposition than that of mental derangement. Valer had acquired a slight acquaintance with the Latin language in his youth. He now procured a copy of the Vulgate, the only translation of the Bible permitted in Spain; and having by dint of application, by day and by night, made himself master of the language, he, in a short time, became so well acquainted with the contents of the Scriptures, that he could repeat almost any passage in them from memory, and explain it with wonderful promptitude and intelligence. Whether he had any other means of instruction, or what these were, must remain a secret; but it is certain that he was led to form a system of doctrine not different from that of the reformers of Germany, and to lay the foundations of a church in Seville which was Lutheran in all the main articles of its belief.

When Valer had informed and satisfied his mind as to the truths of religion, he left off that solitary life which had been chosen by him as an instrument and not as an end. He now returned to company, but with a very different spirit and intention. His great desire was now to impart to others those impressions of divine truth which had been made on his own mind. With this view he courted the society of the clergy and monks, with whom he dealt, first by argument and persuasion, and afterwards in the severer style of reproof. He set before them the general defection, among all classes, from primitive Christianity, both as to faith and practice; the corruption of their own order, which had contributed to spread infection over the whole Christian community; and the sacred obligations which they were under to apply a speedy and thorough remedy to the evil before it should become altogether incurable. These representations were uniformly accompanied with an appeal to the sacred writings as the supreme standard in religion, and with an exhibition of the principal doctrines which they taught. When the clergy, weary of the ungrateful theme, shunned his company, he threw himself in their way, and did not hesitate to introduce his favourite but dangerous topics in the public walks and other places of concourse. His exhortations were not entirely without success; but in most instances their effects were such as might have been anticipated from the situation and character of those to whom they were addressed. The surprise excited by his first address gave place to indignation and disdain. It was not to be borne that a layman, and one who had no pretensions to learning, should presume to instruct his teachers, and inveigh against doctrines and institutions which were held in reverence by the universal church, and sanctioned by its highest authority. Whence had he his pretended knowledge of the scriptures? Who gave him a right to teach? And what were the signs and proof of his mission? To these questions Valer replied with candour, but with firmness, that it was true he had been brought up in ignorance of divine things; he had derived his knowledge, not from the polluted streams of tradition and human inventions, but from the pure fountain of revealed truth, through the teaching of that Spirit by whose influence living waters are made to flow from the hearts of those who believe in Christ; there was no good reason for supposing that these influences were confined to persons of the ecclesiastical order, especially when it was so deeply depraved as at present; private and illiterate men had convicted a learned sanhedrim of blindness, and called a whole world to the knowledge of salvation; he had the authority of Christ for warning them of their errors and vices; and none would require a sign from him but a spurious and degenerate race, whose eyes could not bear the brightness of that pure light which laid open and reproved their works of darkness.

It was not to be expected that he would be long permitted to continue in this offensive course. He was brought before the inquisitors, with whom he maintained a keen dispute on the church, the marks by which it is distinguished, justification, and similar points. On that occasion, some individuals of considerable authority, who had secretly imbibed his sentiments, exerted themselves in his favour. Their influence, joined to the purity of his descent, the station which he held in society, and the circumstance that his judges either believed or wished it to be believed that he was insane, procured for him a milder sentence than that jealous and inexorable tribunal was accustomed to pronounce. He was dismissed with the loss of property. But neither confiscation of goods, nor the fear of a severer punishment, could induce Valer to alter his conduct. He yielded so far to the importunities of his friends as to abstain from a public declaration of his sentiments for a short time, during which he explained to them in private the Epistles of the Romans. But his zeal soon burst through this restraint. He considered himself in the light of a soldier sent on the forlorn hope, and resolved to fall in the breach, trusting that others, animated by his example, would press forward and secure the victory. Resuming his former reproofs of the reigning errors and superstition, he was a second time denounced to the Holy Office, which condemned him to wear a sanbenito, and to be imprisoned for life. When conducted, along with other penitents, to the church of St. Salvador in Seville, to attend public service on festival days, instead of exhibiting the marks of sorrow exacted from persons in his situation, he scrupled not to address the audience after sermon, and to warn them against the erroneous doctrine which they had heard from the preacher, whenever he thought it contrary to the word of God. This of itself would have been reckoned sufficient cause for adjudging him to the flames; but the reasons already mentioned had influence to save him from that fate. To rid themselves in the most quiet way of so troublesome a penitent, the inquisitors came to the resolution of confining him in a monastery belonging to the town of San Lucar, near the mouth of the Guadalquiver, where, secluded from all society, he died about the age of fifty. His sanbenito, which was hung up in the metropolitan church of Seville, long attracted curiosity by its extraordinary size, and the inscription which it bore,—"Rodrigo Valer, a citizen of Lebrixa and Seville, an apostate, and false apostle, who pretended to be sent of God."

It was about the year 1541 that the final sentence was pronounced on Valer. The most distinguished of his converts was Juan Gil, commonly called Doctor Egidius. He was born at Olvera in Aragon, and educated at the university of Alcala, where he distinguished himself by his skill in scholastic theology, the only science then valued in Spain, except among a few individuals who, by addicting themselves to the study of scripture in the original languages, were derisively named Biblists. After obtaining the highest academical honours, he was appointed professor of divinity at Siguenza. Such was his celebrity, that when the office of canon-magistral, or preacher, in the cathedral church of Seville became vacant, he was chosen to fill it by the unanimous vote of the chapter, without being required to undergo the comparative trial prescribed in such cases. But how well versed soever in the writings of Lombard, Aquinas and Scotus, he proved an unpopular preacher; and not being indifferent to his reputation and usefulness, he felt, after continuing for some years, nearly as anxious to relinquish his situation as the people were to get rid of him. In this state of mind he was accosted by Valer, who had the penetration to discover his feelings, and to perceive the good dispositions, as well as talents, with which he was endowed. He pointed out the defects of his mode of preaching, and exhorted him, as the sure remedy, to give himself to the diligent and serious perusal of the word of God. This advice, frequently repeated, produced at last the desired effect. He took the course pointed out to him, and his "profiting appeared to all." He soon became the most acceptable preacher who had appeared in Seville. Instead of the dry, abstruse and unprofitable discussions which he had formerly pursued, he brought forward the great truths of the Bible; and the frigid manner in which he had been accustomed to acquit himself in public was succeeded by powerful appeals to the consciences, and affectionate addresses to the hearts of his auditors. Their attention was aroused; deep convictions of the necessity and suitableness of that salvation which the gospel reveals were made on their minds; and they were prepared for receiving those new views of divine truth which the preacher presented to them, as they were gradually unfolded to himself, and with a caution, which regard to the weakness of the people, as well as to his own perilous situation, seemed to warrant and require. In this manner, by a zeal more tempered with prudence than that of his revered instructor, he was honoured not only to make converts to Christ, but to train up martyrs for the truth. "Among the other gifts divinely bestowed on this holy man," says one who owed his soul to him, "was the singular faculty which he had of kindling in the breasts of those who listened to his instructions a sacred flame, which animated them in all the exercises of piety, internal and external, and made them not only willing to take up the cross, but cheerful in the prospect of the sufferings of which they stood in jeopardy every hour; a clear proof that the master whom he served was present with him, by his Spirit engraving the doctrine which he taught on the hearts of his hearers.

Egidius was not left alone in the work of enlightening the citizens of Seville. In addition to those who, like himself, had profited by the conversation of Valer, he was joined by doctor Vargas and Constantine Ponce de la Fuente, who had been his fellow-students at the university, and were men of superior talents and learning. He imparted to them his knowledge of evangelical truth, and they in their turn contributed by their conversation to the improvement of his ministerial gifts. The three friends concerted a plan, according to which they might co-operate in advancing the common cause. Vargus read lectures to the more learned, in which he expounded the Epistle to the Romans, and subsequently the book of Psalms; and Constantine, of whom we shall have occasion to speak more particularly afterwards, assisted Egidius occasionally in the pulpit. Their zeal, while it awakened the suspicions, provoked the diligence of the clergy who were devoted to the ancient superstition; and the city was divided in its attachments between the two classes of preachers. Those of the one class urged the necessity and importance of the repetition of prayers at certain stated hours, the frequent hearing of mass, the visiting of consecrated places, and the regular observance of fasting and of auricular confession; while they exhorted those who aimed at higher degrees of sanctity to dedicate their substance to pious uses, or, renouncing the world, to take on them the triple vow. Those of the other class either passed over these things entirely, or inculcated their inefficacy; exhorted their hearers to rely on the merits of Christ instead of their own works, and to prove the genuineness of their faith by obedience to the commands of God; and, in place of recommending rosaries and scales of devotion, spoke in the warmest style of the advantages to be derived from a serious and daily perusal of the sacred writings. The first class carried along with them the great body of the people, whose religion is the creature of authority and habit. But the eloquence of Egidius and his two associates, their prudence, unaffected piety, and irreproachable morals, and the harmony with which they continued to act, gradually subdued the prejudices of the multitude, and thinned the ranks even of their clerical opponents. Assiduously employed in the duties of their public functions through the day, they met in the evening with the friends of the reformed doctrine, sometimes in one private house and sometimes in another; the small society in Seville grew insensibly, and became the parent stock, from which branches were taken and planted in the adjacent country.

The inquisition had for some time fixed its jealous eyes on the three preachers; nor were there wanting persons ready to accuse them, and especially Egidius, who was most obnoxious on account of his greater openness of disposition, and his appearing more frequently in the pulpit. Surmises unfavourable to his orthodoxy were circulated, spies were set on his conduct, and consultations held in secret as to the surest method of ruining one who had become popular among all ranks. While these things were going on he was deprived of his two trusty associates; Vargas being removed by death, and Constantine called to the Low Countries. But even after he was thus left alone his enemies were afraid to proceed against him.

So great was the reputation of Egidius, that in 1550 the emperor nominated him to the vacant bishopric of Tortosa, which was one of the richest benefices in Spain, and had been held by cardinal Adrian, the preceptor of Charles V., immediately before his elevation to the popedom. This distinguished mark of royal favour inflamed the resentment of his adversaries, and determined them to proceed to extremities. Instead of confining themselves as formerly to murmurs, they now charged him openly with heresy, and predicted that his elevation to the episcopate would prove the most disastrous calamity which Spain had witnessed. He was formally denounced to the Holy Office, and, the preliminary steps having been taken, was thrown into its secret prisons. The charges against him related to the doctrine of justification, assurance of salvation, human merits, plurality of mediators, purgatory, auricular confession, and the worshipping of images. He was also accused of having favoured Rodrigo de Valer on his trial, and opposed the erection of a crucifix in the room of one which had been accidentally burnt. In his defence he drew up an ample statement of his sentiments on the head of justification, with the reasons on which they were founded; a display of frankness which proved hurtful to his cause, as it furnished the procurator fiscal at once with evidence in support of his charges, and materials for increasing their number. The friends of Egidius now became alarmed for his safety. The emperor, hearing of the danger to which he was exposed, wrote in his favour to the inquisitor general. The chapter of Seville followed his example. And, what is more strange, the licentiate Correa, one of the most inexorable judges of the Holy Office, became an advocate for him, influenced, it is said, by indignation at the conduct of Pedro Diaz, another inquisitor, who had formerly been a disciple of Valer along with Egidius, whom he now prosecuted with base and unrelenting hostility. In consequence of this powerful intercession, the inquisitors found it necessary to adopt a moderate course, and agreed, instead of remitting the articles of charge to the ordinary qualificators, to submit them to two arbiters chosen by the parties.

Egidius, after nominating Bartolomé Carranza and several other individuals, who were either absent from the country or objected to by the inquisitors, at last fixed, with the approbation of his judges, on Domingo de Soto, a Dominican and professor at Salamanca, as his arbiter. Soto came to Seville, and having obtained access to Egidius, with whom he had been acquainted at the university, professed, after mutual explanations, to coincide with him in his views of justification, which was the main article in the indictment, and to think that there would be no difficulty in procuring an amicable adjustment of the affair. It was arranged between them, that each should draw up a paper containing his sentiments on the disputed point, expressed in his own words, and that these papers should be read in the presence of the inquisitors. As the cause had excited great interest from its relation to a bishop elect and a preacher so popular in Seville, it was thought proper that it should be discussed at a public meeting held in the cathedral. On the day appointed for the trial, pulpits were allotted for Egidius and his arbiter, Soto; but, either from design or accident, they were placed at a great distance from one another. After sermon was ended, Soto read the declaration of his sentiments. Egidius, owing partly to the distance at which he sat, and partly to the bustle prevailing in a crowded and anxious assembly, was unable to follow the speaker; but taking it for granted that what was read agreed with what had passed between them in conversation, he nodded assent to it, as Soto raised his voice and looked toward him at the end of every proposition. He then proceeded to read his own declaration, which, in the judgment of all who were present, whether friends or foes, contradicted the former on all the leading points. The inquisitors availed themselves of this variance between his gestures and language to raise an outcry against him. The two declarations were instantly joined in process, and sentence was given forth, declaring him violently suspected of the Lutheran heresy, and condemning him to abjure the propositions imputed to him, to be imprisoned for three years, to abstain from writing or teaching for ten years, and not to leave the kingdom during that period, under the pain of being punished as a formal and relapsed heretic, or, in other words, being burnt alive. Confounded at the unexpected issue of the process, abashed by the exultation of his enemies, and half-convinced, by the mortification which he read in the countenances of his friends, that he must have said something far wrong, Egidius lost courage, and silently acquiesced in the sentence pronounced against him. It was not until some time after he had returned to his prison that he learned from one of his companions the base treachery of the friend in whom he had confided.

Such is the account of the process given by De Montes. The late historian of the Inquisition is disposed to call in question the truth of his statement so far as concerns the artifice imputed to the professor of Salamanca; upon this ground, that Carranza, archbishop of Toledo, during his trial, retaliated upon Soto by accusing him of "having been too indulgent in regard to doctor Egidius of Seville." But this objection is by no means conclusive. For, in the first place, Llorente bears witness to the general accuracy of De Montes, who expressly asserts that he received his information from Egidius in prison. In the second place, the charge of Carranza is not irreconcilable with the narrative which has been given; for De Montes states that Soto claimed the merit of having procured a lenitent sentence for Egidius. In fine, Llorente has shown, in reference to another case, that Soto was perfectly capable of the disgraceful conduct imputed to him on this occasion.

No sooner was it known that Egidius was condemned, than a flight of hungry applicants gathered round the fat benefice of Tortosa like crows round carrion. The holy fathers assembled at Trent were not so intently occupied in watching over the interests of the catholic church as not to have one eye turned to Spain, and ready to discern what might happen there to their advantage. While the trial of the bishop elect was in dependence, cardinal Granville, then bishop of Arras and prime minister of Spain, had his table covered with applications, in which the incense of adulation was thickly sprinkled on rancid avarice. In a letter, dated from Trent on the 19th of November 1551, the titular bishop

Jubin, in partibus Infidelium, writes: "We have received intelligence here, that the bishop elect of Tortosa has been condemned to perpetual imprisonment. I shall be infinitely obliged to you to think of me—the least of your servants—provided his lordship of Elna shall be translated to the bishopric of Tortosa, now vacant by this means." On the preceding day, the bishop of Elna had addressed a letter to the same quarter, in which, without giving the least hint of the object he had in view, he begs the premier to command him "as the meanest domestic of his household," calls himself "his slave," and assures him that the rare qualities of his eminence, his native goodness, and the favours he had conferred, were so deeply seated in the heart of his servant that he remembered him without ceasing, especially "in his poor sacrifices, the fittest time to make mention of one's masters." Two days after, the modest bishop has acquired as much courage as to name his request: he acknowledges that the bishopric of Tortosa was "too weighty a burden for his weak shoulders," but urges that he could discharge his episcopal functions better in such a tranquil spot than in the frontier province of Roussillon, where his pious exercises were interrupted by the noise of warlike instruments, and that he "felt a strong desire to end his days in tending his infirm sheep in the peace of God." The bishop of Algeri was equally disinterested as his brethren in seeking promotion. "It was not avarice that induced him to ask the favour" to be translated from the Island of Sardinia; he only wished to "have his residence on terra firma," that his spirit being relieved from the continual agitation in which it was kept by the restless waves which surrounded him, he might be "at more liberty to serve God, and pray for the life of the king and his minister." The bishop of Elna having been unsuccessful in his application, renewed it in the course of the following year, when he had recourse to a new line of argument in its support. After telling the premier "that his hands had made him," he requests him to remember, "if he pleased," that his majesty had certain rights in Valencia called les bayles de Morella, of which large sums were due to the treasury, as would appear from the lists which he had procured and took the liberty to transmit to his eminence! that most luckily the diocess of Tortosa included that district, though the episcopal seat was in his native country of Catalonia; and that, if it should please his majesty to gratify him with that bishopric, he could see to the payment of these dues without leaving his diocess, and "thus would have it in his power to serve God and the king at the same time."

O the duplicity, the selfishness, the servility of the clergy! What good cause but one would they not have ruined? And how deeply has that been marred by them! Boccaccio relates, (it is a tale, but deserves to be repeated for the sake of the moral it teaches,) that two persons, a Christian layman and a Jew, lived together in a retired spot on the northern boundary of Italy. The Christian had long piously laboured to convert his neighbour, and had succeeded so far as to be in daily expectation of his submitting to baptism, when all at once the idea struck the latter that he would previously visit the capital of Christendom. Dreading the effects of his journey, the Christian endeavoured to divert him from it; but in vain. After an absence of some weeks the Jew returned, and repairing to the house of the Christian, who had given up his convert for lost, surprised him with the intimation that he was now ready to be baptized; "for (added he) I have been at Rome, and have seen the pope and his clergy, and I am convinced that if Christianity had not been divine, it would have been ruined long ago under the care of such guardians."

All the applicants for the bishopric of Tortosa took care to urge the services which they had done to the emperor at the council of Trent. Several authors have spoken in high terms of the liberal views and independent spirit displayed by the Spanish divines who sat at that council; and Father Simon, in particular, asserts that they were ready, upon the refusal of the ecclesiastical reforms which they sought, to join with the French church in throwing off the authority of the court of Rome, if Charles V. had not, from political motives, discouraged them by withdrawing his support. A perusal of their correspondence and that of the imperial embassy serves to abate, in no small degree, the high opinion which these commendations are calculated to produce. If the Italian bishops were passive tools in the hands of the papal legates, their brethren of Spain were not less under the influence of the imperial ambassadors; and it is quite as clear that their zeal for the reformation of abuses was at first excited, as that it was afterwards restrained, by the policy of the emperor. Several of the reforms which they demanded were in favour of their own order, and would have added to their power and wealth in proportion as they diminished those of the papal see; a circumstance which did not escape the observation of the court of Spain. At the same time they satisfied themselves with murmuring in private at the shameful arts by which the council was managed, and had not the courage to resent the attacks made on its freedom, or the insults openly offered to their colleagues. The bishop of Verdun happening to apply the term pretended reformation to some of the plans proposed in the council, the papal legate, cardinal Crescentio, assailed him publicly with invective, calling him a thoughtless young man, and a fool, and ordering him to be silent. "Is this a free council?" said the elector of Cologne to the Spanish bishop of Orense, who sat next him. "It ought to be free," replied the bishop, with a caution which would not have disgraced an Italian. "But tell me your opinion candidly. Is the synod free?" "Do not press me at present, my lord," rejoined the prudent bishop; "that's a difficult question; I will answer it at home." It has been alleged that the papal influence over the council was confined to matters of discipline and ecclesiastical polity, and did not extend to points of faith, in the decision of which all the members were of one accord. But this is contradicted by unquestionable documents. Some of the most learned divines who were at Trent were dissatisfied with certain parts of the doctrine of the council, and with the confused and hurried manner in which this important part of the business was transacted. After the article concering the sacraments of penance and extreme unction had received the formal sanction of the holy and universal council, the divines of Louvain succeeded in convincing the leaders that it was erroneous. What was to be done? They agreed in a private conclave to alter it, after taking precautions to have the whole affair buried in silence, lest they should incur the ridicule of the Lutherans. "A great misfortune!" says the archbishop of Cologne; "but the least of two evils." The reflections of the counsellor of the imperial embassy are more unceremonious. "I believe (says he) that God has permitted this occurrence to cover them with shame and confusion. Surely, after this, they will open their eyes, according to the saying of the psalmist, Fill their faces with shame, that they may seek thy name. God grant they may comprehend this; but I dare not hope for so much, and have always said that nothing short of a miracle will work a change." It is impossible to conceive any thing more deplorable than the picture of the council drawn in the confidential correspondence of Vargas, who was attached, as a legal adviser, to the embassy sent by Charles V. to Trent. "The legate is always the same," says he in a letter to the cardinal-bishop of Arras; "he is a man lost to all shame. Believe me, Sir, I have not words to express the pride and effrontery which he displays in the affairs of the council. Perceiving that we are timid, and that his majesty is unwilling to hurt or offend the pope, he endeavours to terrify us by assuming stately airs and a haughty tone. He treats the bishops as slaves; threatens and swears that he will depart. It is useless for his majesty to continue longer to urge the pope and his ministers. It is speaking to the deaf, and trying to soften the stones. It serves only to make us a laughing-stock to the world, and to furnish the heretics with subjects for pasquinades. We must delay till the time when God will purify the sons of Levi. That time must soon come; and, in my opinion, this purification will not be accomplished without some extraordinary chastisement. Things cannot remain long in their present state: the evils are too great. All the nerves of ecclesiastical discipline are broken. The traffic in things sacred is shameful. The prediction of St. Paul is about to be accomplished in the church of Rome, That day cannot come, unless there come a falling away first. As to the manner of treating doctrines, I have already written you, that they precipitate every thing, examine few questions, and do not submit them to the judgment of the learned divines who are here in attendance. Many of the bishops give their vote, and say placet, on points which they do not understand and are incapable of understanding. There is no one here who appears on the side of God, or dares to speak. We are all dumb dogs that cannot bark." Notwithstanding all this, and much more to the same purpose, Vargas adds, like a true son of the church: "As for myself, I obey implicitly, and will submit without resistance to whatever shall be determined in matters of faith. God grant that all may do this."

These facts are not irrelative to the subject. The secrets of the council of Trent soon transpired; and several individuals, who were afterwards brought to the stake in Spain, acknowledged that their eyes were first opened to the radical corruptions of the church of Rome by the accounts they received from some of the members of that synod as to the scandalous manner in which its decisions were influenced.

Egidius appeared among the criminals condemned to penance, in an auto-de-fe celebrated at Seville in 1552. The term of his imprisonment having expired in 1555, he, in the course of the following year, paid a visit to Valladolid, where he found a number of converts to the reformed doctrine. His wounded spirit was refreshed by what he saw of the grace of God in that city, and after spending a short time in the company of his brethren, and exhorting them to constancy in the faith, he returned to Seville. But the fatigue of travelling, to which he had been unaccustomed for some years, brought on a fever, which cut him off in a few days. He left behind him a number of writings in his native tongue, none of which appears to have been printed. His bones were afterwards taken from their grave, and committed to the flames, his property confiscated, and his memory declared infamous, by a sentence of the inquisitors, finding that he had died in the Lutheran faith.

The first introduction of the reformed doctrine into Valladolid was attended with circumstances nearly as extraordinary as those which had led to its reception in Seville. Francisco San-Roman, a native of Burgos, and son of the alcayde mayor of Bribiesca, having engaged in mercantile pursuits, went to the Low Countries. In the year 1540 his employers sent him from Antwerp to Bremen, to settle some accounts due to them in that city. The reformed religion had been introduced into Bremen; and the young Spaniard, curious to become acquainted with that doctrine which was so much condemned in his native country, went to one of the churches, where he heard James Spreng, formerly prior of the Augustinian monastery at Antwerp, and one of the first persons of note who embraced the opinions of Luther in the Netherlands. The sermon made so deep an impression on the mind of San-Roman, that he could not refrain from calling on the preacher, who, pleased with his candour and thirst for knowledge, introduced him to the acquaintance of some of his pious and learned friends. Among them was our countryman Doctor Maccabeus, then at Bremen, by whose conversation he profited greatly. Like some young converts he flattered himself that he could easily persuade others to embrace those truths which appeared to his own mind as clear as the light of day; and he burned with the desire of returning home and imparting the knowledge which he had received to his relations and countrymen. In vain did Spreng endeavour to restrain an enthusiasm from which he had himself suffered at an earlier period of his life. In the letters which he wrote to his employers at Antwerp, San-Roman could not help alluding to the change which his religious sentiments had undergone, and lamenting the blindness of his countrymen. The consequence was, that on his return to that city he was immediately seized by certain friars, to whom the contents of his letters had been communicated; and a number of Lutheran books and satirical prints against the church of Rome being found in his possession, he was thrown into prison. After a rigorous confinement of eight months, he was released at the solicitation of his friends, who represented that his zeal was now cooled, and that he would be duly watched in his native country. Going to Louvain, he met with Francisco Enzinas, one of his fellow-citizens, of whom we shall afterwards speak, who urged him not to rush upon certain danger by an indiscreet or unnecessary avowal of his sentiments, and to confine himself to the sphere of his proper calling, within which he might do much good, instead of assuming the office of a public teacher, or talking on religious subjects with every person who fell in his way. San-Roman promised to regulate his conduct by this prudential advice; but having gone to Ratisbon, where a diet of the empire was then sitting, and being elated at hearing of the favour which the emperor showed to the protestants, with the view of securing their assistance against the Turks, he forgot his prudent resolutions. Obtaining an introduction to Charles, he deplored the state of religion in his native country, and begged him to use his royal power in restraining the inquisitors and priests, who sought, by every species of violence and cruelty, to prevent the entrance of the only true and saving doctrine of Jesus Christ into Spain. By the mild answer which he received from the emperor, he was emboldened to renew his application, at which some of the Spanish attendants were so incensed that they would have thrown him instantly into the Danube, had not their master interposed, by ordering him to be reserved for trial before the proper judges. He was accordingly cast into chains, and conveyed, in the retinue of the emperor, from Germany to Italy, and from Italy to Africa. After the failure of the expedition against Algiers, he was landed in Spain, and delivered to the Inquisition at Valladolid. His process was short. When brought before the inquisitors, he frankly professed his belief in the cardinal doctrine of the Reformation, that salvation comes to no man by his own works, merit or strength, but solely from the mercy of God through the sacrifice of the one Mediator; and he pronounced the mass, auricular confession, purgatory, the invocation of saints, and the worshipping of images, to be blasphemy against the living God. If his zeal was impetuous, it supported him to the last. He endured the horrors of a protracted imprisonment with the utmost fortitude and patience. He resisted all the importunities used by the friars to induce him to recant. He refused, at the place of execution, to purchase a mitigation of punishment by making confession to a priest, or bowing to a crucifix which was placed before him. When the flames first reached him on his being fastened to the stake, he made an involuntary motion with his head, upon which the friars in attendance exclaimed that he was become penitent, and ordered him to be brought from the fire. On recovering his breath, he looked them calmly in the face, and said, "Did you envy my happiness?" at which words he was thrust back into the flames, and almost instantly suffocated. Among a great number of prisoners brought out in this public spectacle, he was the only individual who suffered death. The novelty of the crimes with which he was charged, joined to the resolution which he displayed on the scaffold and at the stake, produced a sensible impression on the spectators. A proclamation was issued by the inquisitors, forbidding any to pray for his soul, or to express a favourable opinion of such an obstinate heretic. Notwithstanding this, some of the emperor's body-guards collected his ashes as those of a martyr; and the English ambassador, who happened to be at Valladolid at that time, used means to procure a part of his bones as a relic. The guards were thrown into prison, and the ambassador was prohibited from appearing at court for some time. It is not unworthy of observation, that the sermon at this auto-de-fe was preached by the well-known Carranza, who was afterwards tried by the Inquisition, and died in a prison after a confinement of seventeen years.

This event took place in the year 1544. The reformed doctrine had previously been introduced into Valladolid, but its disciples contented themselves with retaining it in their own breasts, or talking of it in the most cautious way to their confidential friends. The speculation excited by the martyrdom of San-Roman took off this restraint. Expressions of sympathy for his fate, or of astonishment at his opinions, led to conversations, in the course of which the favourers of the new faith, as it was called, were easily able to recognise one another. The zeal, and even magnanimity, which he evinced in encountering public odium, and braving so horrible a death, for the sake of the truth, provoked to emulation the most timid among them; and within a few years after his martyrdom, they formed themselves into a church, which met regularly in private for the purposes of religious instruction and worship.

CHAPTER V.

Causes of the Progress of the Reformed Doctrine in Spain.

Before proceeding farther with the narrative of the religious movement in Spain, it may be proper to give an account of some facts which happened without the kingdom. This will furnish the reader with interesting information respecting Spaniards who embraced the Reformation abroad, and whose pious and enlightened exertions, in publishing the scriptures and other books in their native tongue, had great influence in disseminating the knowledge of the truth among their countrymen at home.

About the year 1540, three brothers, Jayme, Francisco, and Juan, sons of a respectable citizen of Burgos in Old Castile, were sent to study at Louvain, a celebrated seat of education, to which the Spanish youth had long been accustomed to resort. The family name of the young men was Enzinas, though they were better known among the learned in Germany by their assumed name of Dryander. Polite letters had been for some time cultivated in the university of Louvain, and the students indulged in a freedom of opinion, which was not tolerated at Paris and other places where the old scholastic ideas and modes of teaching were rigidly preserved. Along with a taste for elegant literature, the young Spaniards acquired the knowledge of the reformed doctrines. They lived in terms of great intimacy with the celebrated George Cassander, who corresponded with the leading protestant divines, and afterwards distinguished himself by a fruitless attempt to reconcile the popish and reformed churches. Dissatisfied with the temporizing principles of this learned man, and the partial reforms in which he was disposed to rest, the three brothers entered with the most cordial zeal into the views of those who had formally separated from the church of Rome.

Juan Enzinas, or Dryander, the younger brother, chose the medical profession, and having settled in Germany, became a professor in the university of Marburg. He was the author of several works on medicine and astronomy, and acquired reputation by the ingenuity which he displayed in the invention and improvement of instruments for advancing these sciences.

Jayme Enzinas, the elder brother, removed in 1541, by the direction of his father, to Paris. During his residence in that city he became confirmed in his attachment to the Reformation, and was successful in communicating his impressions to some of his countrymen who were prosecuting their studies along with him. The expectations which he had formed from the far-famed university of the French metropolis were miserably disappointed. He found the professors to be generally pedants and bigots, and the students equally destitute of good manners and a love for liberal pursuits. It was with the deepest emotion that he beheld the Christian heroism shown by the protestant martyrs under the cruel treatment to which they were exposed. There was something solemn, though appalling, in the composure with which a Spanish assembly witnessed the barbarous spectacle of an auto-de-fe; but the wanton ferocity with which a Parisian mob shouted, when the executioner, with his pincers, tore the tongue from the mouth of his victim, and struck him with it repeatedly in the face, before binding his body to the stake, was disgustingly horrible and fiendish. Unable to remain in a place where he could find neither learning nor humanity, Jayme Enzinas left Paris and returned to Louvain. Thence he went to Antwerp to superintend the printing of a catechism which he had drawn up in his native language for the benefit of his countrymen. Soon after this he received orders from his father, who entertained sanguine hopes of his advancement in the church, to visit Italy, and spend some time in the capital of Christendom. Nothing could be more contrary to his inclinations; but yielding to the dictates of filial duty, he set out leaving his heart with his brothers and other friends in the Netherlands. To a delicate taste and generous independence of spirit, Jayme Enzinas added a tenderness of conscience and candour of disposition which exposed him to peculiar danger in Italy, at a time when the jealousy of the priests was roused by the recent discovery that the reformed tenets had spread extensively in that country. After spending several years in great uneasiness of mind, without being able to procure liberty from his father to return, he resolved at last, in compliance with the urgent request of his brothers, to repair to Germany, and was preparing to quit Rome, when he was betrayed by one of his countrymen, who denounced him as a heretic to the Inquisition. The circumstance of a Spaniard being accused of Lutheranism, together with the character which he bore for learning, attracted much interest in Rome; and his examination was attended by the principal bishops and cardinals. Undaunted by the solemnity of the court, he avowed his sentiments, and defended them with such spirit that his judges, irritated at his boldness, condemned him instantly to the flames; a sentence which was loudly called for by such of his countrymen as were present. Attempts were afterwards made to induce him to recant, by the offer of reconciliation to the church upon his appearing publicly with the sanbenito, according to the custom of his native country. But he refused to purchase his life on such conditions, and died at the stake with the utmost constancy and courage. His martyrdom happened in the year 1546.

About the same time that Enzinas suffered, one of his countrymen and intimate friends met with a still more tragical fate in Germany. Juan Diaz, a native of Cuenca, after he had studied for several years at Paris, was converted to the protestant religion by the private instructions of Jayme Enzinas. Being liberally educated, he had, previously to that event, conceived a disgust at the scholastic theology, and made himself master of the Hebrew language, that he might study the Bible in the original. With the view of enjoying the freedom of professing the faith which he had embraced, he left Paris in company with Matthew Budé and John Crespin, and went to Geneva, where he resided for some time in the house of his countryman, Pedro Gales. Having removed to Strasburg in the beginning of the year 1546, his talents and suavity of manners recommended him so strongly to the celebrated Bucer, that he prevailed on the senate to join the Spanish stranger with himself in a deputation which they were about to send to a conference on the disputed points of religion to be held at Ratisbon. On going thither Diaz met with his countryman Pedro Malvenda, whom he had known at Paris, and was now to confront as an antagonist at the conference. To the pride and religious prejudices of his countrymen, Malvenda added the rudeness of a doctor of the Sorbonne, and the insolence of a minion of the court. When informed by Diaz of the change which had taken place in his sentiments, he expressed the utmost horror; saying, that the heretics would boast more of making a convert of a single Spaniard than of ten thousand Germans. Having laboured in vain, at different interviews, to reclaim him to the catholic faith, he laid the matter before the emperor's confessor. It is not known what consultations they had; but a Spaniard, named Marquina, who had transactions with them, repaired soon after to Rome, and communicated the facts to a brother of Diaz, Doctor Alfonzo, who had long held the office of advocate in the sacred Rota. The pride and bigotry of Alfonso were inflamed to the highest degree by the intelligence of his brother's defection; and taking along with him a suspicious attendant, he set out instantly for Germany, determined, in one way or other, to wipe off the infamy which had fallen on the hitherto spotless honour of his family. In the mean time, alarmed at some expressions of Malvenda, and knowing the inveteracy with which the Spaniards hated such of their countrymen as had become protestants, Bucer and the other friends of Juan Diaz had prevailed upon him to retire for a season to Neuburg, a small town in Bavaria situated on the Danube. On arriving at Ratisbon, Alfonzo succeeded in discovering the place of his brother's retreat, and after consulting with Malvenda, repaired to Neuburg. By every art of persuasion he sought during several days to bring back his brother to the church of Rome. Disappointed in this, he altered his method,—professed that the arguments which he had heard had shaken his confidence, and listened with apparent eagerness and satisfaction to his brother while he explained to him the protestant doctrines, and the passages of scripture on which they rested. Finding Juan delighted with this unexpected change, he proposed that he should accompany him to Italy, where there was a greater field of usefulness in disseminating the doctrines of the gospel than in Germany, which was already provided with an abundance of labourers. The guileless Juan promised to think seriously on this proposal, which he submitted to the judgment of his protestant friends. They were unanimously of opinion that he should reject it; and in particular Ochino, who had lately fled from Italy, and was then at Augsburg, pointed out the danger and hopeless nature of the project. Alfonso did not yet desist. He insisted that his brother should accompany him at least as far as Augsburg, promising to acquiesce in the decision which Ochino should pronounce after they had conversed with him on the subject. His request appeared so reasonable that Juan agreed to it; but he was prevented from going by the arrival of Bucer and two other friends, who, having finished their business at Ratisbon, and fearing that Juan Diaz might be induced to act contrary to their late advice, had agreed to pay him a visit. Concealing the chagrin which he felt at this unexpected obstacle, Alfonso took an affectionate leave of his brother, after he had, in a private interview, forced a sum of money upon him, expressed warm gratitude for the spiritual benefit he had received from his conversation, and warned him to be on his guard against Malvenda. He proceeded to Augsburg on the road to Italy; but next day, after using various precautions to conceal his route, he returned, along with the man whom he had brought from Rome, and spent the night in a village at a small distance from Neuburg. Early next morning, being the 27th of March 1546, they came to the house where his brother lodged. Alfonso stood at the gate, while his attendant, knocking at the door and announcing that he was the bearer of a letter to Juan Diaz from his brother, was shown up stairs to an apartment. On hearing of a letter from his brother, Juan sprang from his bed, hastened to the apartment in an undress, took the letter from the hand of the bearer, and as it was still dark, went to the window to read it, when the ruffian, stepping softly behind him, despatched his unsuspecting victim with one stroke of an axe which he had concealed under his cloak. He then joined the more guilty murderer, who now stood at the stair-foot to prevent interruption, and ready, if necessary, to give assistance to the assassin whom he had hired to execute his purpose.

Alarmed by the noise which the assassin's spurs made on the steps as he descended, the person who slept with Juan Diaz rose hastily, and going into the adjoining apartment beheld, with unutterable feelings, his friend stretched on the floor, and weltering in his blood, with his hands clasped, and the instrument of death fixed in his head. The murderers were fled, and had provided a relay of horses to convey them quickly out of Germany; but the pursuit after them, which commenced as soon as the alarm could be given, was so hot, that they were overtaken at Inspruck, and secured in prison. Otho Henry, count palatine of the Rhine and duke of Bavaria, within whose territories the crime was perpetrated, lost no time in taking the necessary measures for having it judicially tried. Lawyers were sent from Neuburg with the night-cap of the deceased, the bloody-axe, the letter of Alfonso, and other documents; but though the prisoners were arraigned before the criminal court at Inspruck, the trial was suspended through the influence of the cardinals of Trent and Augsburg, to whom the fratricide obtained liberty to write at the beginning of his imprisonment. When his plea for the benefit of the clergy was set aside as contrary to the laws of Germany, various legal quirks were resorted to; and, at last, the judges produced an order from the emperor, prohibiting them from proceeding with the trial, and reserving the cause for the judgment of his brother Ferdinand, king of the Romans. When the protestant princes, at the subsequent diet of Ratisbon, demanded, first of the emperor, and afterwards of his brother, that the murderers should be punished, their requests were evaded; and, in the issue, the murderers were allowed to escape untried and with impunity, to the outraging of humanity and justice, and the disgrace of the church of Rome, whose authorities were bound to see that the most rigorous scrutiny was made into the horrid deed, under the pain of being held responsible for it to heaven and to posterity. The liberated fratricide appeared openly at Trent, along with his bloody accomplice, without exciting a shudder in the breasts of the holy fathers met in council; he was welcomed back to Rome; and finally returned to his native country, where he was admitted to the society of men of rank and education, who listened to him while he coolly related the circumstances of his sanctified crime. Different persons published accounts, agreeing in every material point, of a murder which, all circumstances considered, has scarcely a parallel in the annals of blood since the time of the first fratricide, and affords a striking proof of the degree in which fanatical zeal will stifle the tenderest affections of the human breast, and stimulate to the perpetration of crimes the most atrocious and unnatural.

The narrative which I have followed was drawn up and published at the time by Claude Senarcle, a noble young Savoyard, who was strongly attached to Juan Diaz, had accompanied him from the time he left Paris, and slept in the same bed with him on the night before his murder. Its accuracy is confirmed by the attestation of Bucer, who was personally acquainted with many of the facts, as well as with the character of the author. But indeed so far were the Roman catholics from denying the facts, that many of them, and especially the countrymen of Diaz, justified and even applauded the deed. Juan Ginez de Sepulveda, who professes to have received the facts from the mouth of the terrible hero of the tragedy, has given an account of them so completely in accordance with Senarcle's, that we might suppose he had abridged that work, in the way of substituting the atrocious moral of fanaticism for the touching sentiments of friendship, charity, and piety, which pervade the whole narrative of the protestant historian. It is humbling to think that Sepulveda was one of the most elegant prose writers who flourished at that time in Spain.

Francisco Enzinas continued, after his brother's departure to Italy, to reside at Louvain. But though he lived on good terms with the professors of the university, he found his situation becoming daily more irksome and painful. Among the learned protestants in the neighbourhood with whom he carried on a confidential correspondence, were Albert Hardenberg, preacher to the Cistercian monastery of Adwert, which, since the days of John Wessel, the Dutch Wicliffe, had resembled an academy more than a convent; and the celebrated Polish nobleman, John a Lasco, who had left his native country from attachment to the reformed faith, and was eminently successful in diffusing the knowledge of the truth in East Friesland. It would appear that the parents of Enzinas had intended him for the army, to which he was now decidedly averse. In a letter to A. Lasco, accompanying the present of an ancient and richly-mounted sword, which he had received from a nobleman, he says: "All the world will, I know, be in arms against me on account of the resolution which, in opposition to the advice of some worthy men, I have now formed to devote myself to literary pursuits. But I will not suffer myself, from respect to the favour of men, to hold the truth in unrighteousness, or to treat unbecomingly those gifts which God in his free mercy has been pleased to confer on me, unworthy as I am. On the contrary, it shall be my endeavour, according to my ability, to propagate divine truth. That I may do this by the grace of God, I find that it will be necessary for me, in the first place, to fly from the Babylonian captivity, and to retire to a place in which I shall be at liberty to cultivate undefiled religion and true Christianity, along with liberal studies. It is therefore my purpose to repair to Wittenberg, because that city contains an abundance of learned professors in all the sciences, and I entertain so high an esteem for the learning, judgment, and dexterity in teaching possessed by Philip Melancthon in particular, that I would go to the end of the world to enjoy the company and instruction of such men. I therefore earnestly beg that, as your name has great weight, you will have the goodness to favour me with letters of introduction to Luther, Philip, and other learned men in that city." He accordingly paid a visit to Wittenberg, where he was warmly received by all, and especially by the individual for whom he had expressed so high a veneration. But he returned to the Low Countries, probably by the advice of Melanchthon, to labour in a work which promised to be of the greatest benefit to his native country. This was the translation of the New Testament into the Spanish language.

Though Spain was the only nation which at that time did not possess the scriptures in the vulgar language, it had not always laboured under that deficiency. In the year 1233, Juan I. of Aragon, by a public edict, prohibited the use of any part of the Old or New Testament in the vernacular tongue, and commanded all, whether laity or clergy, who possessed such books, to deliver them to their ordinaries to be burnt, on the pain of being held suspected of heresy. On the other hand, Alfonso X. of Castile caused the sacred scriptures to be translated into Castilian, with the view of improving the native language of his people; and a copy of that translation, executed in the year 1260, is still preserved in manuscript. Other ancient versions of the scriptures into the Limosin, or Catalonian, and Castillian dialects, are still to be seen, in whole or in part, among the manuscripts in the public libraries of Spain and France. Bonifacio Ferrer, brother of St. Vincente Ferrer, and prior of the Carthusian monastery of Portaceli in Valencia, who died in the year 1417, translated the whole scriptures into the Valencian or Catalonian dialect of Spain. His translation was printed at Valencia in the year 1478, at the expense of Philip Vizlant, a merchant of Isny in Germany, by Alfonso Fernandez, a Spaniard of Cordova, and Lambert Philomar, a German. But, although it was the production of a catholic author, and underwent the examination and correction of the inquisitor James Borrell, it had scarcely made its appearance when it was suppressed by the Inquisition, who ordered the whole impression to be devoured by the flames. So strictly was this order carried into execution, that scarcely a single copy appears to have escaped. Long after the era of the Reformation, it was taken for granted by all true Spaniards, that their language had never been made the unhallowed instrument of exposing the Bible to vulgar eyes; and with the exception of two incidental allusions, the translation of Ferrer remained unnoticed for nearly two hundred years after its publication. At length, in 1645, the last four leaves of a copy of this edition were discovered in the library belonging to the monastery of Portaceli. The number was reduced within a short time to one leaf; but happily this contained the imprint, or final epigraph, indicating the names of the translator and printers, together with the place and year of the impression. According to some authors, the version of Ferrer underwent, about the year 1515, a second impression, which shared the same fate as its predecessor; but of this statement the evidence is less complete and satisfactory.

Apparently ignorant that his native country had once possessed such a treasure, and anxious that they should be supplied with it, Francisco de Enzinas undertook a translation of the New Testament into the Castilian tongue. Having finished his task, he submitted the work to the judgment of the divines of Louvain. They allowed that there was no law of the state prohibiting the printing of translations of the Scriptures, but expressed their fears that such works would lead to the spread of heresy and disturbance of the peace of the church, and excused themselves from either sanctioning or censuring the undertaking, on the ground of their ignorance of the Spanish tongue. The private friends of the translator, who were acquainted with both languages, gave it as their opinion, after examining the work, that it would be a great honour as well as benefit to Spain. It was accordingly printed at Antwerp in the year 1543, under the title of "The New Testament, that is, the New Covenant of our only Redeemer and Saviour Jesus Christ, translated from the Greek into the Castilian language." The purblind monks, to whom it was submitted before publication, could not proceed farther than the title-page. One of them, whose pretentions to learning were not the least amongst those of his order, smelled Lutheranism in "the new covenant." The leaf was cancelled, and the suspicious phrase struck out. He next pointed out a palpable heresy in the expression "our only Redeemer." Recourse was again had to the operation of cancelling, and the obnoxious particle expelled. But his success in discovery only serve to quicken the censorial organ of the monk; so that the author, despairing to see an end of the process, gave directions for putting the work into the hands of the booksellers.

The emperor having soon after arrived at Brussels, the author presented a copy of the work to him, and requested his permission to circulate it among his countrymen. Charles received it graciously, and promising his patronage, if it were found to contain nothing contrary to the faith, gave it to his confessor Pedro de Soto to examine. After various delays, Enzinas, having waited on the confessor, was upbraided by him as an enemy to religion, who had tarnished the honour of his native country; and refusing to acknowledge a fault, was seized by the officers of justice and thrown into prison. Besides the crime of translating the Scriptures, he was charged with having made a translation of a work of Luther, and visiting Melancthon. To add to his distress, his father and uncles, hearing of his imprisonment, paid him a visit, and participating in the common prejudices of their countrymen, reproached him for bringing calamity on himself, and dishonour on his kindred. He continued however to possess his soul in patience, employed his time in translating the Psalms, and received many marks of sympathy from the citizens of Brussels, of whom he knew more than four hundred warmly attached to the protestant faith. After a confinement of fifteen months, he one day found his prison doors open, and walking out without the slightest opposition, escaped from Brussels and arrived safely at Wittenberg; an escape the more remarkable that a hot persecution raged at that time throughout the Netherlands, and the portraits of the protestant preachers, accompanied with the offer of a reward for their apprehension, were to be seen affixed to the gates of all the principal cities. The following extract shows the steps taken against him after his flight. "The inquisitors in Belgium have summoned my guest, the wise, upright and pious Spaniard, in his absence; and from the day fixed for his appearance, we conclude that sentence has already been pronounced against him. He sets out for your town to ascertain the fact, and to learn if there are any letters for him from that quarter. I have given him a letter to you, both that I may acquaint you with the cause of his journey, and because I know you feel for the calamities of all good men. He evinces great fortitude, though he evidently sees that his return to his parents and native country is now cut off. The thought of the anguish which this will give to his parents distresses him. These inquisitors are as cruel to us as the thirty tyrants were of old to their fellow-citizens at Athens; but God will preserve the remnant of his church, and provide an asylum for the truth somewhere." In another letter, written in 1546, the same individual says, "Franciscus the Spaniard has resolved to go to Italy, that he may assuage the grief of his mother." Whether he accomplished that journey or not, is uncertain; but in 1548 he went to England, on which occasion he was warmly recommended by Melancthon to Edward VI. and archbishop Cranmer, as a person of excellent endowments and learning, averse to all fanatical and seditious tenets, and distinguished by his piety and grave manners. He obtained a situation at Oxford; but returning soon after to the continent, he resided sometimes at Strasburg and sometimes at Basle, where he spent his time in literary pursuits, and in the society of the wise and good.

In the same year in which the New Testament of Enzinas came from the press, a Spanish translation of the seven penitential Psalms, the song of Solomon, and the lamentations of Jeremiah, was printed at Antwerp by Ferdinand Jarava, who, three years before, had printed the Book of Job, and the Psalms for the office of the dead, in the same language and at the same place. There exists also a copy of a Spanish psalter in Gothic letter, without date, but apparently ancient.

The Jews appear to have early had translations of the Old Testament, or parts of it, in Spanish. In 1497, only five years after their expulsion from the peninsula, they printed the Pentateuch in that language at Venice. In 1547, this work was printed at Constantinople in Hebrew characters, and in 1552 it was reprinted at the same place in Roman characters. In 1553 they printed at Ferrara two editions of the Old Testament in Spanish; the one edited by Abraham Usque, and the other by Duarte Pinel. Bibliographers have generally held that the first of these was intended for the use of Jews, and the last for the use of Christians; an opinion which does not seem to rest on good grounds.

At the time that Egidius was thrown into prison, several of his religious friends became alarmed for their safety, and took refuge in Germany and Switzerland. Among these were Juan Perez, Cassiodoro de Reyna, and Cypriano de Valera, who were industriously employed during their exile, in providing the means of religious instruction for their countrymen. Juan Perez was born at Montilla, a town of Andalusia. He was sent to Rome in 1527, as charge d'affaires of Charles V., and procured from the pope a suspension of the decree by which the Spanish divines had condemned the writings of Erasmus. Subsequently he was placed at the head of the College of Doctrine, an endowed school at Seville, where he contracted an intimacy with Egidius and other favourers of the reformed opinions. He received the degree of doctor of divinity in his native country; and his talents and probity secured him a high place in the esteem of the foreigners among whom he resided, first at Geneva and afterwards in France. The works which he composed in his native tongue were of the most valuable kind. His version of the New Testament came from the press in 1556; his version of the Book of Psalms followed in the course of the subsequent year; and his Catechism, and Summary of Christian doctrine, appeared about the same time. They were all printed at Venice. Besides these, he published in Spanish several of the works of his countryman Juan Valdez. Being called from Geneva, and having officiated as a preacher at Blois, and as chaplain to Renée, duchess of Ferrara, in the castle of Montargis, he died of the stone at Paris, after he had bequeathed all his fortune to the printing of the Bible in his native tongue. The task which he left unfinished was continued by Cassiodoro de Reyna, who, after ten years' labour, produced a translation of the whole Bible, which was printed in 1569 at Basle. It was revised and corrected by Cypriano de Valera, who published the New Testament in 1596 at London, and both Testaments in 1602 at Amsterdam. It is no slight proof of the zeal with which the Spanish protestants sought to disseminate the Scriptures among their countrymen, that Juan Lizzarago published, in 1571, a translation of the New Testament into Basque, or the language of Biscay, which differs widely from the other dialects spoken in the peninsula. The versions of the three writers last mentioned did not appear until the Reformation was suppressed in Spain; but they were of great utility to many individuals, and the reprinting of De Valera's translation at a recent period was the means of provoking the Spanish clergy to make the dangerous experiment of translating the Scriptures into their native tongue.

All these versions were accompanied with vindications of the practice of translating the scriptures into vernacular languages, and the right of the people to read them. This formed one of the points most warmly contested between the Romanists and reformers. The Spanish divines distinguished themselves by their intemperate support of the illiberal side of the question; and the determination of Alfonso de Castro, "that the translation of the scriptures into the vernacular tongues, with the reading of them by the vulgar, is the true fountain of all heresies," continued long to be the standard of orthodoxy in Spain. There was, however, one honourable exception. Frederico Furio, a learned native of Valencia, defended the cause of biblical translation intrepidly and ably, first, in an academical dispute with John de Bononima, rector of the university of Louvain, and afterwards from the press. This raised against him a host of enemies, and his book was strictly prohibited; but he was protected by Charles V., and what is singular, continued during life about the person of Philip II., that most determined patron of ignorance and the Inquisition.

The versions of the scriptures by which the reformation was promoted in Spain, were those of Enzinas and Perez. In spite of the suppression of the former in the Low Countries, copies of it were conveyed to the Peninsula. Accordingly pope Julius III. states in a bill addressed to the inquisitors in 1550, that he was informed that there were in the possession of booksellers and private persons a great number of heretical books, including Spanish Bibles, marked in the catalogue of prohibited books which the university of Louvain, at the desire of the emperor, had drawn up in the preceding year. And at a period somewhat later, Philip, who governed Spain during the absence of his father, ordered an examination of certain Bibles introduced into the kingdom, but not mentioned in the late index; and the council of the Supreme, having pronounced them dangerous, gave instructions to the provincial inquisitors to seize all the copies, and proceed with the utmost rigor against those who should retain them, without excepting members of universities, colleges or monasteries.

At the same time the strictest precautions were adopted to prevent the importation of such books by placing officers at all the sea-ports and land-passes, with authority to search every package, and the person of every traveller that should enter the kingdom. It might be supposed that these measures would have reared an insuperable barrier to the progress of illumination in Spain. But the thirst for knowledge, when once excited, is irresistible; and tyranny, when it goes beyond a certain point, inspires its victims at once with daring and ingenuity. The books provided by the Spanish refugees remained for some time locked up in Geneva, none choosing to engage in a hazardous and almost desperate attempt to convey them across the Pyrenees. But at last an humble individual had the courage to undertake, and the address to execute the task. This was Julian Hernandez, a native of Villaverda in the district of Campos, who on account of his small stature was commonly called Julian the Little. Having imbibed the reformed doctrine in Germany, he had come to Geneva and entered into the service of Juan Perez as amanuensis and corrector of the press. Two large casks, filled with translations of the scriptures and other protestant books in Spanish, were in 1557 committed to his trust, which he undertook to convey by land; and having eluded the vigilant eyes of the inquisitorial familiars, he lodged his precious charge safely in the house of one of the chief protestants of Seville, by whom the contents were quickly dispersed among his friends in different parts of the country.

CHAPTER VI.

Progress of the Reformation in Spain.

The circumstances attending the condemnation of Egidius inflicted a severe shock on the infant church of Seville. While the enemies of the truth triumphed in his fall, its friends felt "as when a standard-bearer fainteth." His release from imprisonment, and the proofs which he gave of unabated attachment to the doctrine which he had formerly taught, were consolatory to them; but the obstinacy with which he continued to the last to upbraid himself for his imbecility, together with the restraints under which he was laid, threw a melancholy air over his instructions, which had a tendency to discourage those who needed to be animated by the countenance and advice of a person of unbroken courage and high reputation. Providence furnished them with such a head, a little before the death of Egidius, by the return of the individual who had been his associate in his early labours, and who was unquestionably the greatest ornament of the reformed cause in Spain.

Constantine Ponce de la Fuente was a native of San Clemente de la Mancha, in the diocese of Cuença. Possessing a good taste and a love of genuine knowledge, he evinced an early disgust for the barbarous pedantry of the schools, and attachment to such of his countrymen as sought to revive the study of polite letters. Being intended for the church, he made himself master of Greek and Hebrew, to qualify him for interpreting the scriptures. At the same time he spoke and wrote his native language with uncommon purity and elegance. Like Erasmus, with whose writings he was first captivated, he was distinguished for his lively wit, which he took pleasure in indulging at the expense of foolish preachers and hypocritical monks. But he was endowed with greater firmness and decision of character than the philosopher of Rotterdam. During his attendance at the university, his youthful spirit had betrayed him into irregularities, of which his enemies afterwards took an ungenerous advantage; but these were succeeded by the utmost decorum and correctness of manners, though he always retained his gay temper, and could never deny himself his jest. One of his contemporaries has remarked, "that he never knew any man who loved or hated Constantine moderately;" a treatment which is experienced by every person who possesses superior talents and poignancy of wit combined with generosity and benevolence. His knowledge of mankind made him scrupulous in forming intimate friendships, but he treated all his acquaintance with a cordial and easy familiarity. Notwithstanding the opportunities he had of enriching himself, he was so exempt from avarice that his library, which he valued above all his property, was never large. His eloquence caused his services in the pulpit to be much sought after; but he was free from vanity, the besetting sin of orators, and scorned to prostitute his talents at the shrine of popularity. He declined the situation of preacher in the cathedral of Cuença, which was offered him by the unanimous vote of the chapter. When the more honourable and lucrative office of preacher to the metropolitan church of Toledo was afterwards put in his offer, after thanking the chapter for their good opinion of him he declined it, alleging as a reason, "that he would not disturb the bones of their ancestors;" alluding to a dispute between them and the archbishop Siliceo, who had insisted that his clergy should prove the purity of their descent. Whether it was predilection for the reformed opinions that induced him at first to fix his residence at Seville, is uncertain; but we have seen that he co-operated with Egidius in his plans for disseminating scriptural knowledge. The emperor having heard him preach during a visit to that city, was so much pleased with the sermon, that he immediately named him one of his chaplains, to which he added the office of almoner; and he soon after appointed him to accompany his son Philip to Flanders, "to let the Flemings see that Spain was not destitute of polite scholars and orators." Constantine made it a point of duty to obey the orders of his sovereign, and reluctantly quitted his residence in Seville, for which he had hitherto rejected the most tempting offers. His journey gave him the opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with some of the reformers. Among these was James Schopper, a learned man of Biberach in Suabia, by whose conversation his views of evangelical doctrine were greatly enlarged and confirmed. In 1555 he returned to Seville, and his presence imparted a new impulse to the protestant cause in that city. A benevolent and enlightened individual having founded a professorship of divinity in the College of Doctrine, Constantine was appointed to the chair; and by means of the lectures which he read on the scriptures, together with the instructions of Fernando de St. Juan, provost of the institution, the minds of many of the young men were opened to the truth. On the first Lent after his return to Seville, he was chosen by the chapter to preach every alternate day in the cathedral church. So great was his popularity, that though the public service did not begin till eight o'clock in the morning, yet when he preached, the church was filled by four and even by three o'clock. Being newly recovered from a fever when he commenced his labours, he felt so weak that it was necessary for him repeatedly to pause during the sermon, on which occasions he was allowed to recruit his strength by taking a draught of wine in the pulpit; a permission which had never been granted to any other preacher.

While Constantine was pursuing this career of honour and usefulness, he involved himself in difficulties by coming forward as a candidate for the place of canon magistral in the cathedral of Seville. There are three canonries in every episcopal church in Spain, which must be obtained by comparative trials. These are chiefly filled by fellows belonging to the six Collegios Mayores, who form a kind of learned aristocracy, which has long possessed great influence in that country. No place of honour or emolument in the church or the departments of law is left unoccupied by these collegians. Fellows in orders, who possess abilities, are kept in reserve for the literary competitions; such as cannot appear to advantage in these trials, are provided through court-favour to stalls in the wealthier cathedrals; while the absolutely dull and ignorant are placed in the tribunal of the Inquisition, where, passing judgment in their secret halls, they may not by their blunders disgrace the college to which they belonged. The place of canon magistral in Seville having become vacant by the death of Egidius, the chapter, in accordance with the general wish of the city, fixed their eyes upon Constantine, as the person most fitted by his talents for filling that important office. Egidius had been introduced into it without engaging in the literary competition; but, in consequence of his unpopularity when he first ascended the pulpit, the canons had entered on their records a resolution that the usual trials should take place in all future elections. Constantine had uniformly ridiculed these literary jousts, as resembling the exercises of schoolboys and the tricks of jugglers. Finding him obstinate in refusing to enter the lists, the chapter were inclined to dispense with their resolution, when Fernando Valdes, the archbishop of Seville and inquisitor general, who had conceived a strong dislike to Constantine on account of a supposed injury which he had received from him when he was preacher to the emperor, interposed his authority to prevent the suspension of the law. A day was accordingly fixed for the trial, and edicts were published in all the principal cities, requiring candidates to make their appearance. The friends of Constantine now pressed him to lay aside his scruples; and an individual, who had great influence over his mind, represented so strongly the services which he would be able to render to the cause of truth in so influential a situation, and the hurtful effects which would result from its being occupied by some noisy and ignorant declaimer, that he consented at last to offer himself as a candidate. The knowledge of this fact prevented others from appearing, with the exception of two individuals who came from a distant part of the country. One of them declined the contest as soon as he became acquainted with the circumstances; but the other, a canon of Malaga, instigated by the archbishop, who wished to mortify his competitor, descended into the arena. Despairing, however, of being able to succeed by polemical skill, or by interest with the chapter, he had recourse to personal charges and insinuations, in which he was supported by all those who envied the fame of Constantine, had felt the sting of his satire, or hated him for his friendship with Egidius. He was accused of having contracted a marriage before he entered into holy orders; it was alleged that there were irregularities in his ordination and the manner in which he obtained his degree of doctor of divinity; and an attempt was made to fasten on him the charge of heresy. In spite of these accusations he carried his election, was installed in his new office, and commenced his duty as preacher in the cathedral with high acceptance. But this contest arrayed a party against him, which sought in every way to twhart his measures, and afterwards found an opportunity to make him feel the weight of its vengeance.

Constantine, while he instructed the people of Seville from the pulpit, was exerting himself to diffuse religious knowledge through the nation at large by means of the press. In the character of his writings, we have one of the clearest indications of the excellence of his heart. They were of that kind which was adapted to the spiritual wants of his countrymen, and not calculated to display his own talents, or to acquire for himself a name in the learned world. They were composed in his native tongue, and in a style level to the lowest capacity. Abstruse speculations and rhetorical ornaments, in which he was qualified both by nature and education to excel, were rigidly sacrificed to the one object of being understood by all, and useful to all. Among his works were a Catechism, whose highest recommendation is its artless and infantine simplicity; a small treatise on the doctrine of Christianity, drawn up in the familiar form of a Dialogue between a master and his pupil; an Exposition of the first Psalm in four sermons, which show that his pulpit eloquence, exempt from the common extremes, was neither degraded by vulgarity, nor rendered disgusting by affectation and effort at display; and the Confession of a Sinner, in which the doctrines of the gospel, poured from a contrite and humbled spirit, assume the form of the most edifying and devotional piety. His Summary of Christian Doctrine, without being deficient in simplicity, is more calculated to interest persons of learning and advanced knowledge. In this work he proposed to treat first of the articles of faith; and secondly, of good works and the sacrament. The first part only came from the press; the second being kept back until such time as it could be printed with greater safety, a period which never arrived. It was not the author's object to lay down or defend the protestant doctrines, but to exhibit from the scriptures, and without intermeddling with modern disputes, the great truths of the gospel. The work was translated into Italian, and has been highly praised by some Roman catholic writers. But it was viewed with great suspicion by the ruling clergy, who took occasion from it to circulate reports unfavourable to the author's orthodoxy, and held secret consultations on the propriety of denouncing him to the Inquisition. They complained that he had not condemned the Lutheran errors, nor vindicated the supremacy of the bishop of Rome; and that, if at any time he mentioned indulgences, purgatory and human merit, instead of extolling, he derogated from these authorised doctrines of the church, by warning his readers not to risk their salvation on them. When these charges came to the ears of Constantine, he contented himself with saying, that these topics did not properly belong to the first part of his treatise, but that he would explain his views respecting them in his second volume, which he was preparing for the press. This reply, backed by the popularity of which he was in possession, silenced his adversaries for that time.

Previously to the period of which we have been speaking, an occurrence took place which had nearly proved fatal to the disciples of the reformed faith in Seville. Francisco Zafra, a doctor of laws, and vicar of the parish church of San Vincente, had long cherished a secret predilection for the Lutheran sentiments. Being a man of learning, he was frequently called, in the character of qualificator, to pronounce judgment on the articles laid to the charge of persons denounced to the Holy Office, and had been instrumental in saving the lives of many individuals, who otherwise would have been condemned as heretics. He had received into his house Maria Gomez, a widow, who was a zealous and constant attendant on the private meetings of the protestants, and consequently well acquainted with all the persons of that persuasion in the city. In the year 1555 she became deranged in her intellect, and having conceived, as is not unusual with persons in that unhappy state of mind, a violent antipathy to her former friends, she talked of nothing but vengeance on heretics. It was found necessary to lay her under an easy restraint; but, escaping from her domestic confinement, she went straight to the castle of Triana, in which the inquisitors held their sittings, and, having obtained an audience, told them that the city was full of Lutherans, while they, whose duty it was to guard against the entrance and spread of this plague, were slumbering at their post. She ran over the names of those whom she accused, amounting to the number of more than three hundred. The inquisitors had no apprehension of the extent to which the reformed doctrines had been embraced in Seville, and could not but perceive marks of derangement in the appearance and incoherent talk of the informer; but, acting according to the maxim of their tribunal, that no accusation is to be disregarded, they resolved to make inquiry, and ordered the instant attendance of Zafra. Had he yielded to the sudden impressions of fear, and attempted to make his escape, the consequences would have been fatal to himself and his religious connexions. Instead of this, he, with great presence of mind, repaired on the first notice to the Holy Office, treated the accusation with indifference, stated the symptoms of the woman's distemper, with the reason which induced him to confine her, and referred to the members of his family and the neighbours for the truth of the facts. His statement, together with the character which he bore, succeeded in removing the suspicions of the inquisitors, who were persuaded that Maria laboured under a confirmed lunacy, and that her representations had no other foundation than the visionary workings of a disordered brain. Accordingly they requested Zafra to take the unfortunate woman along with him, and to keep her under a stricter confinement than that from which she had escaped. Thus did this dark cloud pass away, by the kindness of Providence, which watched over a tender flock, not yet sufficiently prepared for encountering the storm of persecution.

In the mean time the protestant church in Seville was regularly organized, and placed under the pastoral inspection of Christobal Losada, a doctor of medicine. He had paid his addresses to the daughter of a respectable member of that society, and was rejected on a religious ground; but having afterwards become acquainted with Egidius, he embraced the reformed opinions, and recommended himself so strongly to those of the same faith by his knowledge of the scriptures, and other gifts, that they unanimously chose him as their pastor. His future conduct did not disgrace their choice. He was assisted by a friar named Cassiodoro, whose ministry was uncommonly successful. The church met ordinarily in the house of Isabella de Baena, a lady not less distinguished for her piety than for her rank and opulence. Among the nobility who attached themselves to it, the two most distinguished were Don Juan Ponce de Leon, and Domingo de Guzman. The former was a younger son of Don Rodrigo, count de Baylen, cousin german of the duke D'Arcos, and allied to the principal grandees of Spain. So unbounded was this nobleman in charity to the poor, that, by distributing to their necessities, he encumbered his patrimonial estate, and reduced himself to those straits in which others of his rank involve themselves by prodigality and dissipation. He was equally unsparing in his personal exertions to promote the reformed cause. Domingo de Guzman was a son of the duke de Medina Sidonia, and being destined for the church, had entered the order of St. Dominic. His extensive library contained the principal Lutheran publications, which he lent and recommended with uncommon industry.

Most of the religious institutions in Seville and the neighbourhood were leavened with the new doctrines. The preacher of the Dominican monastery of St. Paul's was zealous in propagating them. They had disciples in the convent of St. Elizabeth, a nunnery established according to the rule of St. Francis d'Assisa. But they made the greatest progress in the Hieronymite convent of San Isidro del Campo, situated within two miles of Seville. This was owing in a great degree to a person whose singular character merits examination.

Garcia de Arias, commonly called Doctor Blanco, on account of the extreme whiteness of his hair, possessed an acute mind and extensive information; but he was undecided and vacillating in his conduct, partly from timidity and partly from caution and excess of refinement. He belonged to that class of subtle politicians, who, without being destitute of conscience, are wary in committing themselves, forfeit the good opinion of both parties by failing to yield a consistent support to either, and trusting to their address and dexterity to extricate themselves from difficulties, are sometimes caught in the toils of their own intricate management. There is no reason to question the sincerity of his attachment to the reformed tenets, but his adoption of them was known only to the leaders of the Sevillian church, with whom he was secretly in correspondence. By the ruling clergy, he was regarded not only as strictly orthodox, but as the ablest champion of their cause, and accordingly was consulted by them on every important question relative to the established faith. An anecdote which has been preserved is strikingly illustrative of his character and mode of acting. Gregorio Ruiz, in a sermon preached by him in the cathedral of Seville, employed expressions favourable to the protestant doctrine concerning justificaton and the merit of Christ's death, in consequence of which he was denounced to the Iuquisition, and had a day fixed for answering the charges brought against him. In the prospect of this, he took the advice of Arias, with whose real sentiments he was perfecty acquainted, and to whom he confidentially communicated the line of defence which he meant to adopt. But on the day of his appearance, and after he had pleaded for himself, what was his surprise to find the man whom he had trusted rise, at the request of the inquisitors, and in an elaborate speech refute all the arguments which he had produced! When his friends remonstrated with Arias on the impropriety of his conduct, he vindicated himself by alleging that he had adopted the course which was safest for Ruiz and them; but, galled by the censures which they pronounced on the duplicity and baseness with which he had acted, he began to threaten that he would inform against them to the Holy Office. "And if we shall be forced to descend into the arena," said Constantine to him, "do you expect to be permitted to sit among the spectators?"

Yet this was the man who was made the instrument of conveying the light of divine truth into the convent of San Isidro, when it was immersed in the most profound ignorance and superstition. Without laying aside his characteristic caution, he taught his brethren, that true religion was something very different from what it was vulgarly supposed to be; that it did not consist in chanting matins and vespers, or performing any of those acts of bodily service, in which their time was consumed; and that if they expected to obtain the approbation of God, it behoved them to have recourse to the scriptures to know his mind. By inculcating these things in his sermons and in private conversation, he produced in the breasts of the monks a feeling of dissatisfaction with the circular and monotonous devotions of the cloister, and a spirit of inquiry after a purer and more edifying piety. But from versatility, or with the view of providing for his future safety, he all at once altered his plans, and began to recommend, by doctrine and example, austerities and bodily mortifications more rigid than those which were enjoined by the monastic rules of his order. During Lent he urged his brethen to remove every article of furniture from their cells, to lie on the bare earth, or sleep standing, and to wear shirts of haircloth, with iron girdles, next their bodies. The monastery was for a time thrown into confusion, and some individuals were reduced to a state of mind bordering on distraction. But this attempt to revive superstition produced a reaction which led to the happiest consequences. Suspecting the judgment or the honesty of the individual to whom they had hitherto looked up as an oracle, some of the more intelligent resolved to take the advive of Egidius and his friends at Seville; and, having received instructions from them, began to teach the doctrines of the gospel to their brethren in a plain and undisguised manner; so that, within a few years, the whole convent was leavened with the new opinions. The person who had the greatest influence in affecting this change was Cassiodoro de Reyna, afterwards celebrated as the translator of the Bible into the language of his country.

A more decided change on the internal state of this monastery took place in the course of the year 1557. An ample supply of copies of the scriptures and protestant books, in the Spanish language, having been received, they were read with avidity by the monks, and contributed at once to confirm those who had been enlightened, and to extricate others from the prejudices by which they were enthralled. In consequence of this, the prior and other official persons, in concurrence with the fraternity, agreed to reform their religious institute. Their hours of prayer, as they were called, which had been spent in solemn mummeriês, were appointed for hearing prelections on the scriptures; prayers for the dead were omitted, or converted into lessons for the living; papal indulgences and pardons, which had formed a lucrative and engrossing traffic, were entirely abolished; images were allowed to remain, without receiving homage; habitual temperance was substituted in the room of superstitious fasting; and novices were instructed in the principles of true piety, instead of being initiated into the idle and debasing habits of monachism. Nothing remained of the old system but the monastic garb and the external ceremony of the mass, which they could not lay aside without exposing themselves to imminent and inevitable danger.

The good effects of this change were felt without the monastery of San Isidro del Campo. By their conversation, and by the circulation of books, these zealous monks diffused the knowledge of the truth through the adjacent country, and imparted it to many individuals who resided in towns at a considerable distance from Seville. In particular, their exertions were successful in religious houses of the Hieronymite order; and the prior and many of the brotherhood of the Valle de Ecija, situated on the banks of the Xenil, were among the converts to the reformed faith. Individuals of the highest reputation belonging to that order incurred the suspicion of heresy. Juan de Regla, prior of Santa Fé, and provincial of the Hieronymites in Spain, was a divine greatly celebrated for his talents and learning, and had assisted at the council of Trent during its second convocation. Being denounced to the inquisition of Saragossa, he was condemned to penance, and the abjuration of eighteen propositions savouring of Lutheranism. After his recantation, he verified the maxim respecting apostates, by his bitter persecution of those who were suspected of holding the new opinions, and was advanced to the office of confessor, first to Charles V. and afterwards to Philip II. Francisco de Villalba, a Hieronymite monk of Montamarta, sat in the council of Trent along with Regla, and was preacher to Charles and Philip. He waited on the former in his last moments, and pronounced his funeral oration with such appalling eloquence, that several of his hearers declared that he made their hair stand erect. After the emperor's death, a process was commenced against Villalba before the inquisition of Toledo, in which he was accused of having taught certain Lutheran errors. At the same time an attempt was made, in a chapter of the monks of St. Jerome, to attaint his blood, by showing that he was of Jewish extraction. This charge was refuted. But it was not so easy to put a stop to his trial before the inquisitors; all that he could obtain, through the intervention of the court, was, that his incarceration should be delayed until additional witnesses should be found; and while matters remained in this state, he was released from persecution by the hand of death.

While the reformed doctrine was advancing in Seville and its vicinity, it was not stationary at Valladolid. The protestants in this city had for their first pastor Domingo de Roxas, a young man of good talents, and allied to some of the principal grandees of Spain. His father was Don Juan, first Marquis de Poza; his mother was a daughter of the Conde de Salinas, and descended from the family of the Marquis de la Mota. Being destined for the church, Domingo de Roxas had entered into the order of Dominicans. He was educated under Bartolomé de Carranza, from whom he imbibed opinions more liberal than those which were common either in the colleges or convents of Spain. But the disciple did not confine himself to the timid course pursued by the master. The latter made use of the same language with the reformers respecting justification, and some other articles of faith; but he cautiously accompanied it with explications intended to secure him against the charge of heterodoxy. The former was bolder in his speculations, and less reserved in avowing them. Notwithstanding the warnings which he received from Carranza to be diffident of his own judgment, and submissive to the decisions of the church, De Roxas repudiated as unscriptural the doctrine of purgatory, the mass, and other articles of the established faith. Beside the books of the German reformers, with which he was familiar, he circulated certain writings of his own, and particularly a treatise, entitled, Explication of the Articles of Faith; containing a brief statement and defence of the new opinions. By his zealous exertions, many were induced to join themselves to the reformed church in Valladolid, among whom were several individuals belonging to his own family, as well as that of the Marquis of Alcagnizes, and other noble houses of Castille.

The protestants at Valladolid obtained an instructor of greater talents and reputation, though of inferior courage, in doctor Augustin Cazalla. This learned man was the son of Pedro Cazalla, chief officer of the royal finances, and of Leanor de Vibero; both of them descended from Jewish ancestors. In 1526 a process was commenced before the Inquisition against Constanza Ortiz, the mother of Leanor de Vibero, as having died in a state of relapse to Judaism; but her son-in-law, by his influence with the inquisitor Moriz, prevented her bones from being disturbed, and averted the infamy which otherwise would have been entailed on his family. His son, Augustin Cazalla, was born 1510, and at seventeen years of age had Bartolomé Carranza for his confessor. After attending the college of San Gregorio at Valladolid, he finished his studies at Alcala de Henares, and was admitted a canon of Salamanca. The interest possessed by his father, together with his own talents, opened up to him the most flattering prospects of advancement in the church. Being esteemed one of the first pulpit orators in Spain, he was in 1545, chosen preacher and almoner to the emperor, whom he accompanied in the course of the following year to Germany. During his residence in that country, he was engaged in opposing the Lutherans, by preaching and private disputation.

Spanish writers impute the extensive spread of the protestant opinions in the Peninsula, in a great degree, to the circumstance that their learned countrymen, being sent into foreign parts to confute the Lutherans, returned with their minds infected with heresy; an acknowledgment not very honourable to the cause which they maintain, as it implies that their national creed owes its support chiefly to ignorance, and that, when brought to the light of scripture and argument, its ablest defenders were convinced of its weakness and falsehood. "Formerly," says the author of the Pontifical History, "such Lutheran heretics as were now and then apprehended and committed to the flames, were almost all either strangers, Germans, Flemings and English, or, if Spaniards, they were mean people and of a bad race; but in these late years, we have seen the prisons, scaffolds, and stakes, crowded with persons of noble birth, and, what is still more to be deplored, with persons illustrious, in the opinion of the world, for letters and piety. The cause of this, and many other evils, was the affection which our catholic princes cherished for Germany, England, and other countries without the pale of the church, which induced them to send learned men and preachers from Spain to these places, in the hopes that, by their sermons, they would be brought back to the path of truth. But unhappily, this measure was productive of little good fruit; for of those who went abroad to give light to others, some returned home blind themselves, and being deceived, or puffed up with ambition, or a desire to be thought vastly learned, and improved by their residence in foreign countries, they followed the example of the heretics with whom they had disputed." This important fact is confirmed by the testimony of contemporary protestant writers, with a particular reference to those divines whom Philip II. brought along with him into England, on his marriage with queen Mary. "It is much more notable," says the venerable Pilkington, "that we have seen come to pass in our days, that the Spaniards sent for into the realm on purpose to suppress the gospel, as soon as they were returned home, replenished many parts of their country with the same truth of religion to the which before they were utter enemies." It is probable that these authors include in their statement those divines who were accused to the Inquisition, and thrown into prison, on suspicion of heresy, though they were averse to Lutheranism, or, at most, favourably inclined to it in some points connected with the doctrine of justification. But there are at least two striking instances of the truth of their remark. It was during his attendance on the emperor in Germany, as we have already seen, that Constantine Ponce de la Fuente decidedly embraced the reformed faith; and Augustin de Cazalla became a convert to it in the same circumstances.

On returning to Spain in 1552, Cazalla took up his residence at Salamanca, where he remained for three years. But he kept up an epistolary correspondence with the protestants of Seville; and his office of royal chaplain leading him occasionally to visit Valladolid, he was induced by Domingo de Roxas to fix his abode in this city. He still continued, however, to be regarded as a patron of the established faith, and was consulted on the most important questions of an ecclesiastical kind. Soon after his return to Spain he was nominated by the emperor as a member of a junta of divines and lawyers, who were called to give their opinion on the conduct of Julius III. in transferring the general council from Trent to Bologna; on which occasion he joined with his colleagues in declaring that the pope was actuated in that measure more by personal considerations than regard to the good of the church. He also preached at different times before Charles V. after his retirement into the convent of St. Juste, when he had for hearers the princess Joanna, who governed Spain in the absence of her brother Philip II., together with other members of the royal family. In spite of the caution which he used on these occasions, his real sentiments were discovered by the more intelligent of those who frequented the court; but they were unwilling to fix the stigma of heresy on a person of so great reputation, and could not permit themselves to believe that he would rush upon certain danger by transgressing the line of prudence which he appeared to have prescribed to himself. In this opinion, however, they were deceived. After his settlement at Valladolid his mother's house became the ordinary place in which the protestant church assembled for worship. The greater part of his relations were among its members. He could not resist the pressing requests which were made to him to take the charge of its spiritual interests; and favoured with his talents and the authority of his name, it increased daily in numbers and respectability.

At Valladolid, as at Seville, the reformed doctrine penetrated into the monasteries. It was embraced by a great portion of the nuns of Santa Clara, and of the Cistercian order of San Belen; and had its converts among the class of devout women, called in Spain, beatas, who are bound by no particular rule, but addict themselves to works of charity.

The protestant opinions spread in every direction round Valladolid. They had converts in almost all the towns, and in many of the villages, of the ancient kingdom of Leon. In the town of Toro they were embraced by the licentiate Antonio Herezuelo, an advocate of great spirit, and by individuals belonging to the houses of the Marquises de la Mota and d'Alcagnizes. In the city of Zamora the protestants were headed by Don Christobal de Padilla, a cavalier who had undertaken the task of tutor to a noble family of that place, that he might have the better opportunity of propagating the knowledge of the truth. The reformed opinions were also introduced into Aldea del Palo and Pedroso, in the diocese of Zamora. In the last of these villages they had numerous converts, who enjoyed the instructions of Pedro de Cazalla, their parish priest. Their spread was equally extensive in the diocese of Palencia. In the episcopal city they were taught by Doctor Alfonso Perez, a priest, and patronised by Don Pedro Sarmiento, a cavalier of the order of Santiago, commander of Quintana, and a son of the Marquis de Roxas. The parish priest of the neighbouring villages of Hormigos belonged to the family of Cazalla, which was wholly protestant. From Valladolid the new opinions were diffused through Old Castile to Soria in the diocese of Osma, and to Logrono on the borders of Navarre. In the last named town they were embraced by numbers, including the individual who was at the head of the custom-house, and the parish priest of Villamediana, in the neighbourhood Logrono.

The propagation of the reformed doctrine in all these places was owing in a great degree to Don Carlos de Seso. This distinguished nobleman was born at Verona in Italy. Having performed important services for Charles V., he was held in great honour by that monarch, through whose influence he obtained in marriage Donna Isabella de Castilla, a descendant of the royal family of Castile and Leon. De Seso was not less elevated by dignity of character, mental accomplishments and decorum of manners, than by his birth and connexions. While he resided at Valladolid he connected himself with the protestants in that city. At Toro, of which he was corregidor, or mayor, at Zamora, and at Palencia, he zealously promoted the cause of reformation, by the circulation of books and by personal instructions. After his marriage he settled at Villamediana, and was most successful in diffusing religious knowledge in the city of Logrono, and in all the surrounding country.

The reformed cause did not make so great progress in New Castile, but it was embraced by many in different parts of that country, and particularly in the city of Toledo. It had also adherents in the provinces of Granada, of Murcia, and of Valencia. But, with the exception of the places round Seville and Valadolid, nowhere were they more numerous than in Aragon. They had formed settlements in Sarragossa, Huesca, Balbastro, and many other towns. This being the case, it may appear singular that we have no particular account of the protestants in the eastern part of Spain. But one reason serves to account for both facts. The inhabitants of Bearn were generally protestants; and many of them crossing the Pyrenees, spread themselves over Aragon, and, at the same time that they carried on trade, found the opportunity of circulating their religious books and tenets among the natives. When violent measures were adopted for crushing the Reformation in Spain, the greater part of them made good their retreat, without difficulty and without noise, to their native country, where the proselytes they had made found an asylum along with them; whereas their brethren who were situated in the interior of the kingdom, either fell into the hands of their prosecutors, or, escaping with great difficulty, were dispersed over all parts of Europe; and thus the tragical fate of the one class, and the narrow and next to miraculous escape of the other, by exciting deep interest in the public mind, caused their names and their history to be inquired after and recorded.

By the facts which have been brought forward, the reader will be enabled to form an estimate of the extent to which the reformed doctrine was propagated in Spain, and of the respectability as well as number of its disciples. Perhaps there never was in any other country so large a proportion of persons, illustrious either from their rank or their learning, among the converts to a new and proscribed religion. This circumstance helps to account for the singular fact, that a body of dissidents, who could not amount to fewer than two thousand persons, scattered over an extensive country, and loosely connected with one another, should have been able to communicate their sentiments, and hold their private meetings, for a number of years, without being detected by a court so jealous and vigilant as that of the Inquisition. In forming a judgment of the tendency which existed at this time in the minds of Spaniards towards the reformed doctrine, we must take into account, not only the numbers who embraced it, but also the peculiar and almost unprecedented difficulties which resisted its progress. At the beginning of Christianity, the apostles had for some time the external liberty of preaching the gospel; and when persecution forced them to flee from one city, they found "an effectual door" opened to them in another. Luther, and his co-adjutors in Germany, were enabled to proclaim their doctrine from the pulpit and the press, under the protection of princes and free cities, possessing an authority within their own territories which was independent of the emperor. The reformers of Scotland enjoyed a similar advantage under their feudal chiefs. The breach of Henry VIII. with the pope, on a domestic ground, gave to the people of England the Bible in their own language, which they were at least permitted to hear read from the pulpits, to which it was chained. In France, a Hugonot could not be seized without the concurrence and orders of the magistrates, who sometimes proved reluctant and dilatory. And the same check was imposed on the violence of a persecuting priesthood, in many of the Italian states. But not one of these advantages was enjoyed by the friends of the Reformation in Spain, where the slightest expression of public opinion in favour of the truth was prevented or instantly put down by a terrific tribunal, armed with both swords, and present at once in every part of the kingdom. That flame must have been intense, and supplied with ample materials of combustion, which could continue to burn and to spread in all directions, though it was closely pent up, and the greatest care was taken to search out and secure every aperture and crevice by which it might find a vent, or come into communication with the external atmosphere. Had these obstructions to the progress of the reformed doctrine in Spain been removed, though only in part and for a short time, it would have burst into a flame, which resistance would only have increased, and which, spreading over the Peninsula, would have consumed the Inquisition, the hierarchy, the papacy, and the despotism by which they had been reared and were upheld. These were not the sanguine anticipations of enthusiastic friends to the Reformation, but the deliberately-expressed sentiments of its decided enemies. "Had not the Inquisition taken care in time," says one of them, "to put a stop to these preachers, the protestant religion would have run through Spain like wildfire; people of all ranks, and of both sexes, having been wonderfully disposed to receive it." The testimony of another popish writer is equally strong. "All the prisoners in the inquisitions of Valladolid, Seville, and Toledo, were persons abundantly well-qualified. I shall here pass over their names in silence, that I may not, by their bad frame, stain the honour of their ancestors, and the nobility of the several illustrious families which were infected with this poison. And as these prisoners were persons thus qualified, so their number was so great, that had the stop put to that evil been delayed two or three months longer, I am persuaded all Spain would have been set in a flame by them." I subjoin the reflection of a protestant author, who resided for a considerable time in Spain, and, feeling a deep interest in this portion of its history, drew up a short account of its protestant martyrs. "So powerful (says he) were the doctrines of the Reformation in those days, that no prejudices nor interests were any where strong enough to hinder piously-disposed minds, after they came thoroughly to understand them, from embracing them. And that the same doctrines have not still the same divine force, is neither owing to their being grown older, nor to popery's not being so gross, nor to any change in people's natural dispositions, but is owing purely to the want of the same zeal for those doctrines in their professors, and especially for the three great doctrines of the Reformation, which the following martyrs sealed with their blood: which were, that the pope is antichrist; that the worship of the church of Rome is idolatrous; and that a sinner is justified in the sight of God by faith and through Christ's and not through his own merits."

CHAPTER VII.

Suppression of the Reformation in Spain.

We cannot condemn, either upon the principles of nature or revelation, those individuals who, finding themselves in the utmost peril of their lives, chose to forsake their native country, and to seek abroad for a place in which they were at liberty to worship God according to their consciences. Yet it was this step on the part of some of the Spanish protestants which led to the discovery of their brethren who remained behind. Their sudden disappearance led to inquiries as to the cause, and the knowledge of this excited suspicions that they were not the only persons who were disaffected to the religion of their country. The divines attached to the court of Philip II. at Brussels kept a strict watch upon the refugees from Spain who had settled in Geneva and different places of Germany; and, having got possession of their secrets by means of spies, conveyed information to the inquisitors, that a large quantity of heretical books had been sent to Spain, and that the protestant doctrine was spreading rapidly in the kingdom. This intelligence was recieved in the close of the year 1557.

Roused from their security, the inquisitors instantly put their extensive police in motion, and were not long in discovering the individual who had been active in introducing the heretical books. Juan Hernandez, in consequence of information received from a smith, to whom he had shown a copy of the New Testament, was apprehended and thrown into prison. He did not seek to conceal his sentiments, and gloried in the fact that he had contributed to the illumination of his countrymen by furnishing them with the scriptures in their native tongue. But the inquisitors were disappointed in the expectations they had formed from his apprehension. His life indeed was in their hands, and they could dispose of it according to their pleasure; but the blood of an obscure individual appeared, in their eyes, altogether inadequate to wash away the disgrace which they had incurred by their failure in point of vigilance, or to expiate the enormous crime which had defiled the land. What they aimed at was, to obtain from the prisoner such information respecting his associates as would enable them "at once to crush the viper's nest," (to use their own words) and set them at ease for the future. But they found themselves mortifyingly baffled in all their attempts to accomplish this object. In vain they had recourse to those arts of deceit in which they were so deeply practised, in order to draw from Hernandez his secret. In vain they employed promises and threats, examinations and cross-examinations, sometimes in the hall of audience, and at other times in his cell, into which they sent alternately their avowed agents, and persons who "feigned themselves just men," and friendly to the reformed doctrine. When questioned concerning his own faith; he answered frankly; and though destitute of the advantages of a liberal education, he defended himself with boldness, silencing, by his knowledge of the scriptures alone, his judges, together with the learned men whom they brought to confute him. But when asked to declare who were his religious instructors and companions, he refused to utter a word. Nor were they more successful when they had recourse to that horrid engine which had often wrung secrets from the stoutest hearts, and made them betray their nearest and best-beloved friends. Hernandez displayed a firmness and heroism altogether above his physical strength and his station in life. During the three years complete that he was kept in prison, he was frequently put to the torture, in every form and with all the aggravations of cruelty which his persecutors, incensed at his obstinacy, could inflict or devise; but, on every fresh occasion, he appeared before them with unsubdued fortitude; and when led, or rather dragged, from the place of torment to his cell, he returned with an air of triumph, chanting this refran, in his native tongue:

> Vencidos van los frayles, vencidos van:
> Corridos van los lobos, corridos van.
>
> Conquered return the friars, conquered return:
> Scattered return the wolves, scattered return.

At length the inquisitors got possession of the secret which they were so eager to know. This was obtained at Seville, by means of the superstitious fears of one member of the protestant church, and the treachery of another, who had for some time acted as a concealed emissary of the inquisition. At Valladolid, it was obtained by one of those infernal arts, which that tribunal, whenever it served its purposes, has never scrupled to employ. Juan Garcia, a goldsmith, had been in the habit of summoning the protestants to sermons; and aware of the influence which superstition exerted over the mind of his wife, he concealed from her the place and times of their assembling. Being gained by her confessor, this demon in woman's shape dogged her husband one night, and having ascertained the place of meeting, communicated the fact to the Inquisition. The traitress received her earthly reward in an annuity for life, paid from the public funds!

Having made these important discoveries, the council of the Supreme despatched messengers to the several tribunals of inquisition through the kingdom, directing them to make inquiries with all secrecy within their respective jurisdictions, and to be prepared, on receiving further instructions, to act in concert. The familiars were employed in tracing out the remoter ramifications of heresy; and guards were planted at convenient places, to intercept and seize such persons as might attempt to escape. These precautions having been taken, orders were issued to the proper agents; and by a simultaneous movement, the protestants were seized at the same time in Seville, in Valladolid, and in all the surrounding country. In Seville and its neighbourhood two hundred persons were apprehended in one day; and, in consequence of information resulting from their examinations, the number soon increased to eight hundred. The castle of Triana, the common prisons, the convents, and even private houses, were crowded with the victims. Eighty persons were committed to prison in Valladolid, and the number of individuals seized by the other tribunals was in proportion. When the alarm was first given, many were so thunderstruck and appalled as to be unable to take the least step for securing their safety. Some ran to the house of the Inquisition, and informed against themselves, without knowing what they were doing; like persons who, rushing out of a house which has taken fire in the night-time, precipitate themselves into a devouring flood. Others, in attempting to make their escape, were pursued and overtaken; and some, who had reached a protestant country, becoming secure, fell into the snares laid for them by the spies of the Holy Office, were forcibly carried off, and brought back to Spain. Among those who made good their retreat, was the licentiate Zafra, formerly mentioned, who was peculiarly obnoxious to the inquisitors. He was apprehended among the first, but, during the confusion caused by want of room to contain the prisoners, contrived to make his escape, and to conceal himself, until he found a favourable opportunity of retiring into Germany.

The reader will recollect the reform which the monks of San Isidro had introduced into their convent. Desirable as this change was in itself, and commendable as was their conduct in adopting it, it brought them into a situation both delicate and painful. They could not throw off the monastic forms entirely, without exposing themselves to the fury of their enemies; nor yet could they retain them, without being conscious of acting to a certain degree hypocritically, and giving countenance to a pernicious system of superstition, by which their country was at once deluded and oppressed. In this dilemma, they held a consultation on the propriety of deserting the convent, and retiring to some foreign land, in which, at the expense of sacrificing their worldly emoluments and spending their lives in poverty, they might enjoy peace of mind and the freedom of religious worship. The attempt was of the most hazardous kind, and difficulties presented themselves to any plan which could be suggested for carrying it into execution. How could so many persons, well known in Seville and all around it, after having left one of the most celebrated monasteries in Spain deserted, expect to accomplish so long a journey, without being discovered? If, on the other hand, a few of them should make the attempt and succeed, would not this step bring the lives of the remainder into the greatest jeopardy; especially as the suspicions of the inquisitors, which had for a considerable time been laid asleep, had been lately aroused? This last consideration appeared so strong, that they unanimously resolved to remain where they were, and commit themselves to the disposal of an all-powerful and gracious providence. But the aspect of matters becoming hourly darker and more alarming, another chapter was held, at which it was agreed that it would be tempting instead of trusting providence to adhere to their former resolution, and that therefore every one should be left at liberty to adopt that course which in the emergency appeared to his own mind best and most advisable. Accordingly, twelve of their number left the monastery, and taking different routes, got safely out of Spain, and at the end of twelve months met in Geneva, which they had previously agreed upon as the place of their rendezvous. They were gone only a few days when the storm of persecution burst on the heads not only of their brethren who remained in San Isidro, but of all their religious connexions in Spain.

It was in the beginning of the year 1558 that this calamitous event befell Spain. Previously to that period Charles V., having relinquished his schemes of worldly ambition, and resigned the empire in favour of his brother Ferdinand, and his hereditary dominions to his son Philip, had retired into the convent of St. Juste, situated in the province of Estremadura, where he spent the remainder of his days in the society and devotional exercises of monks. Several historians of no inconsiderable reputation have asserted, that Charles, during his retreat, became favourable to the sentiments of the protestants of Germany, that he died in their faith, that Philip charged the Holy Office to investigate the truth of this report, and that he had at one time serious thoughts of disinterring the bones of his father as those of a heretic. Various causes may be assigned for the currency of these rumours. Charles had three years before been involved in a dispute with Paul IV., who had threatened him with excommunication; Constantine Ponce and Augustin Cazalla, two of his chaplains, had embraced the protestant opinions; his confessor De Regla had been forced to abjure them; and Carranza and Villalba, who exhorted him on his death-bed, were soon after denounced to the Inquisition. To these presumptions it may be added, that the manner in which Philip treated his son Don Carlos, and the known fact that he never scrupled to employ the Inquisition as an engine for accomplishing purposes purely political, if not domestic also, have induced historians, from supposing him capable of any crime, to impute to him those of which he was never guilty. There is the best reason for believing that Charles, instead of being more favourably disposed, became more averse to the protestants in his latter days, and that, so far from repenting of the conduct which he had pursued towards them, his only regret was that he had not treated them with greater severity. When informed that Lutheranism was spreading in Spain, and that a number of persons had been apprehended under suspicion of being infected with it, he wrote letters, from the monastery of St. Juste, to his daughter Joanna, governess of Spain, to Juan de Vega, president of the council of Castile, and to the inquisitor general, charging them to exert their respective powers with all possible vigour "in seizing the whole party, and causing them all to be burnt, after using every means to make them Christians before their punishment; for he was persuaded that none of them would become sincere catholics, so irresistible was their propensity to dogmatize." He afterwards sent Luis Quixada, his major-domo, to urge the execution of these measures. In conversation with the prior and monks of the convent, he took great credit to himself for having resisted the pressing solicitations of the protestant princes to read their books and admit their divines to an audience; although they promised on that condition to march with all their forces, at one time against the king of France, and at another against the Turk. The only thing for which he blamed himself was his leniency to them, and particularly keeping faith with the heresiarch. Speaking of the charge he had given to the inquisitors respecting the heretics in Spain, "If they do not condemn them to the fire," said he, "they will commit a great fault, as I did in permitting Luther to live. Though I spared him solely on the ground of the safe-conduct I had sent him, and the promise I made at a time when I expected to suppress the heretics by other means, I confess nevertheless that I did wrong in this, because I was not bound to keep my promise to that heretic, as he had offended a master greater than I, even God himself. I was at liberty then, yea I ought, to have forgotten my word, and avenged the injury he had done to God. If he had injured me only, I should have kept my promise faithful; but, in consequence of my not having taken away his life, heresy continued to make progress, whereas his death, I am persuaded, would have stifled it in its birth." Nor does this rest merely on the evidence of reported conversations. In his testament, made in the Low Countries, he charged his son "to be obedient to the commandments of holy mother church, and especially to favour and countenance the holy office of the Inquisition against heretical pravity and apostasy." And in a codicil to it, executed in the convent of St. Juste a few weeks before his death, after mentioning the instructions he had formerly given on this subject, and the confidence which he placed in his son for carrying them into execution, he adds: "Therefore I entreat him and recommend to him with all possible and due earnestness, and moreover command him as a father, and by the obedience which he owes me, carefully to attend to this, as an object which is essential and nearly concerns him, that heretics be pursued and punished as their crime deserves, without excepting any who are guilty, and without showing any regard to entreaties, or to rank or quality. And that my intentions may be carried into full effect, I charge him to favour and cause to be favoured the holy Inquisition, which is the means of preventing and correcting so many evils, as I have enjoined in my testament; that so he may fulfil his duty as a prince, and that our Lord may prosper him in his reign, and protect him against his enemies, to my great peace and contentment."

But though it appears from these facts that the imprisoned protestants had nothing to hope from Charles V., yet their calamities were aggravated by his retirement and the succession of Philip II. That bigotry which in the father was paralysed by the incipient dotage which had inflamed it, was combined in the son with all the vigour of youth, and with a temper naturally gloomy and unrelenting. Other circumstances conspired to seal the doom of the reformers in Spain. The wars which had so long raged between that country and France were terminated by the treaty of Chateau Cambresis, and the peace between the rival kingdoms was ratified by the marriage of Philip to the eldest daughter of the French king. Previously to that event the dissension between the Spanish monarch and the court of Rome had been amicably adjusted. The papal throne was filled at this time by Paul IV., a furious persecutor, and determined supporter of the Inquisition. And the office of inquisitor general in Spain was held by Francisco Valdes, a prelate who had already distinguished himself from his two immediate predecessors by the severity of his administration, and whose worldly passions were unmitigated by the advanced age to which he had arrived. The supreme pontiff, the inquisitor general, and the monarch, were alike disposed to adopt the most illegal and sanguinary measures for extinguishing heresy in the Peninsula.

When only sixteen years of age, Philip gave a proof of his extreme devotion to the inquisition, and of the principles on which his future reign was to be conducted. In the year 1543 the marquis de Terranova, viceroy of Sicily, ordered two familiars of the Holy Office to be brought before the ordinary tribunals, for certain crimes of which they were guilty. Though this was in perfect accordance with a law which, at the request of the inhabitants, Charles V. had promulgated, suspending for ten years the powers of the inquisitors to judge in such causes within the island, yet a complaint was made, on the part of the familiars, to Philip, then acting as regent of the Spanish dominions, who addressed a letter to the viceroy, exhorting him, as an obedient son of the church, to give satisfaction to the holy fathers whom he had offended. The consequence was, that the marquis, who was grand constable and admiral of Naples, one of the first peers of Spain, and sprung from the royal stock of Aragon, felt himself obliged to do penance in the church of the Dominican monastery, and to pay a hundred ducats to the catchpolls of the Inquisition, whose vices he had presumed to correct. During the regency of the prince, the Spanish inquisitors in more than one instance obtained the revival of those powers which had been supended, as at once injurious to the civil judicatures and to the liberties of the subject.

During the negociation in 1557 between the court of Spain and the Roman see, which ended so disgracefully to the former, Philip wrote to his general, the duke of Alva, "that Rome was a prey to great calamities at the time of his birth, and it would be wrong in him to subject it to similar evils at the commencement of his reign; it was therefore his will that peace should be speedily concluded on terms no way dishonourable to his holiness; for he would rather part with the rights of his crown than touch in the slightest degree those of the holy see." In pursuance of these instructions, Alva, as viceroy of Naples, was obliged to fall on his knees, and, in his own name, as well as that of his master and the emperor, to beg pardon of the pope for all the offences specified in the treaty of peace; upon which they were absolved from the censures which they had respectively incurred. After this ceremony was over, the haughty and gratified pontiff, turning to the cardinals, told them "that he had now rendered to the holy see the most important service it would ever receive; and that the example which the Spanish monarch had just given would teach popes henceforth how to abase the pride of kings, who knew not the extent of that obeisance which they legitimately owed to the heads of the church." With good reason might Charles V. say in his testament, when leaving his dying charge to extirpate heresy, "that he was persuaded the king his son would use every possible effort to crush so great an evil with all the severity and promptitude which it required.

Paul IV. acceded with the utmost readiness to the applications which were now addressed to him by Philip, in concurrence with Valdes, the inquisitor general, for such enlargements of the authority of the Holy Office as would enable it to compass the condemnation of the heretics who were in prison, and to seize and convict others. On the 15th of February 1558 he issued a summary brief, renewing all the decisions of councils and sovereign pontiffs against heretics and schismatics; declaring that this measure was rendered necessary by the information he had received of the daily and increasing progress of heresy; and charging Valdes to persecute the guilty, and inflict upon them the punishments decreed by the constitutions, particularly that which deprived them of all their dignities and functions, "whether they were bishops, archbishops, patriarchs, cardinals or legates,—barons, counts, marquises, dukes, princes, kings or emperors. This sweeping brief, from whose operation none was exempted but his holiness, was made public in Spain with the approbation of the monarch, soon after he himself and his father had been threatened with excommunication and dethronement. Valdes, in concurrence with the council of the Supreme, prepared instructions to all the tribunals of the Inquisition, directing them, among other things, to search for heretical books, and to make a public auto-de-fe of such as they should discover, including many works not mentioned in any former prohibitory index. This was also the epoch of that terrible law of Philip which ordained the punishment of death, with confiscation of goods, against all who sold, bought, read, or possessed, any book that was forbidden by the Holy Office. To ferret the poor heretics from their lurking-places, and to drive them into the toils of this bloody statute, Paul IV., on the 6th of January 1559, issued a bull, enjoining all confessors strictly to examine their penitents of whatever rank, from the lowest to that of cardinal or king, and to charge them to denounce all whom they knew to be guilty of this offence, under the pain of the greater excommunication, from which none but the pope or the inquisitor general could release them; and subjecting such confessors as neglected this duty to the same punishment that was threatened against their penitents. On the following day the pope declared, in full consistory, that the heresy of Luther and other innovators being propagated in Spain, he had reasons to suspect that it had been embraced by some bishops; on which account he authorized the grand inquisitor, during two years from that day, to hold an inquest on all bishops, archbishops, patriarchs, and primates of that kingdom, to commence their processes, and, in case he had grounds to suspect that they intended to make their escape, to seize and detain them, on condition of his giving notice of this immediately to the sovereign pontiff, and conveying the prisoners, as soon as possible, to Rome.

As if these measures had not been calculated sufficiently to multiply denunciations, Philip seconded them by an edict renewing a royal ordinance, which had fallen into desuetude or been suspended, and which entitled informers to the fourth part of the property of those found guilty of heresy. But the existing code of laws, even after those which had been long disabled or forgotten were revived, was too mild for the rulers of this period. Statutes still more barbarous and unjust were enacted. At the request of Philip and Valdes, the pope, on the 4th of February 1559, gave forth a brief, authorizing the council of the Supreme, in derogation of the standing laws of the Inquisition, to deliver over to the secular arm those who were convicted of having taught the Lutheran opinions, even though they had not relapsed, and were willing to recant. It has been justly observed, that though history had had nothing else with which to reproach Philip II. and the inquisitor general, Valdes, than their having solicited this bull, it would have been sufficient to consign their names to infamy. Neither Ferdinand V. and Torquemada, nor Charles V. and Manriquez, had pushed matters to this length. They never thought of burning alive, or subjecting to capital punishment, persons who were convicted of falling into heresy for the first time, and who confessed their errors; nor did they think themselves warranted to proceed to this extremity by the suspicion that such confessions were dictated by the fear of death. This was the last invention of tyranny, inflamed into madness by hatred and dread of the truth. Were it necessary to point out aggravations of this iniquity, we might state that the punishment was to be inflicted for actions done before the law was enacted; and that it was unblushingly applied to those who had been long immured in the cells of the Inquisition.

The next object was to find fit agents for carrying these sanguinary statutes into execution. It is one of the wise arrangements of a merciful providence for thwarting designs hurtful to human society, and for inspiring their authors with the dread of ultimate discomfiture, that wicked men and tyrants are disposed to suspect the most slavish and devoted instruments of their will. The individuals at the head of the inquisitorial tribunals of Seville and Valladolid had incurred the suspicions of Valdes, as guilty of culpable negligence, if not of connivance at the protestants, who had held their conventicles in the two principal cities of the kingdom, almost with open doors. To guard against any thing of this kind for the future, and to provide for the multiplicity of business which the late disclosures had created, he delegated his powers of inquisitor general to two individuals, in whom he could place entire confidence, Gonzales Munebrega, archbishop of Tarragona, and Pedro de la Gasca, archbishop of Palencia, who fixed their residence, the former at Seville, and the latter at Valladolid, in the character of vice-inquisitors general. Both substitutes proved themselves worthy of the trust reposed in them; but the conduct of Munebrega gratified the highest expectations of Valdes and Philip. When engaged in superintending the examinations of the prisoners, and giving directions as to the torture to which they should be put, he was accustomed to indulge in the most profane and cruel raillery, saying that these heretics had the commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," so deeply seated in their hearts, that it was necessary to tear the flesh from their bones, to make them inform against their brethren. During the intervals of business, he was to be seen sailing in his barge on the river, or walking in the gardens of the Triana, dressed in purple and silk, accompanied with a train of servants, surrounded by wretched poetasters, and followed by hired crowds, who at one time saluted him with their huzzas, and at another insulted the protestants, whom they descried through the grated windows of the castle. An anecdote which is told of him, though trifling compared with the horrors of that time, deserves to be repeated as a proof of the insolence of office, and one among many instances of the shameless manner in which the inquisitors converted their authority into an instrument of gratifying their meanest passions. A servant of the vice-inquisitor general snatched a stick one day from the gardener's son, who was amusing himself in one of the avenues. The father, attracted by the cries of his child, came to the spot, and having in vain desired the servant to restore the stick, wrested it from his hand, which was slightly injured in the struggle. A complaint was instantly made to Munebrega; and the conduct of the gardener being found sufficient to fasten on him a suspicion of heresy de levi, he was thrown into prison, where he lay nine months heavily ironed.

The reader will mistake very much, if he suppose that the holy fathers undertook all these extraordinary services from pure zeal for the truth, or under the idea that their superabundant and supererogatory labours would secure to them an unseen and future recompense. If heretics were visited in this life with exemplary punishment for the sins of which they had been guilty, why should not the defenders of the faith have "their good things" in this life? To meet the expenses of this domestic crusade, the pope, at the request of the inquisitors, authorized them to appropriate to their use certain ecclesiastical revenues, and granted them, in addition, an extraordinary subsidy of a hundred thousand ducats of gold, to be raised by the clergy. The bull issued for that purpose stated, that the heresy of Luther had made an alarming progress in Spain, where it was embraced by many rich and powerful individuals; that, with a view of putting a stop to it, the inquisitor general had been obliged to commit to prison a multitude of suspected persons, to increase the number of judges in the provincial tribunals, to employ supernumerary familiars, and to purchase and keep in readiness a supply of horses in different parts of the kingdom for the pursuit of fugitives; and that the ordinary revenue of the Holy Office was quite insufficient to defray the expenses of so enlarged an establishment, and at the same time to maintain such of the prisoners as were destitute of means to support themselves. Zealous as the clergy in general were against heresy, they fretted exceedingly against this tax on their income; and after the Inquisition had succeeded in exterminating the Lutherans, it needed to direct its thunders, and even to call in the assistance of the secular arm, against certain refractory canons, who resisted the payment of the sums in which they had been assessed.

While these preparations were going on, it is not easy to conceive, but easier to conceive than describe, the situation and feelings of the captive protestants. To have had the prospect of an open trial, though accompanied with the certainty of being convicted and doomed to an ignominious death, would have been relief to their minds. But, instead of this, they were condemned to a protracted confinement, during which their melancholy solitude was only broken in upon by attempts to bereave them of their best consolation; distracted, on the one hand, by the entreaties of their disconsolate friends, who besought them to purchase their lives by an early recantation, and harassed, on the other, by the endless examinations to which they were subjected by their persecutors; assured to-day that they would escape provided they made an ingenuous confession of all they knew, and told to-morrow that the confessions which they had made in confidence had only served to confirm the suspicions entertained of their sincerity; hearing, at one time, of some unhappy individual who was added to their number, and receiving, at another time, the still more distressing intelligence that a fellow-prisoner, entangled by sophistry, or overcome by torments, had consented to abjure the truth. A milder tribunal would have been satisfied with making an example of the ringleaders, or would have brought out the guilty for execution as soon as their trials could be overtaken. The policy of Philip

II. and his inquisitors was different. They wished to strike terror into the minds of the whole nation, and exhibit to Europe a grand spectacle of zeal for the catholic faith, and vengeance against heresy. Filled with those fears which ever haunt the minds of tyrants, they imagined that heresy had spread more extensively than was really the case, and therefore sought to extort from their prisoners such confessions as would lead to the discovery of those who still remained concealed, or who might be in the slightest degree infected with the new opinions. While they had not the most distant intention of extending mercy to those who professed themselves penitent, and had already procured a law which warranted them to withhold it, they were nevertheless anxious to secure a triumph to the catholic faith, by having it in their power to read, in the public auto-de-fe, the forced retractions of those who had embraced the truth. With this view, the greater part of the protestants were detained in prison for two, and some of them for three years, during which their bodily health was broken, or their spirit subdued, by the rigour of confinement and the severity of torture. The consequence of this treatment was, that the constancy of some of them was shaken, while others ended their days by a lingering and secret martyrdom.

Among those of the last class was Constantine Ponce de la Fuente. Exposed as he was to the hatred of those who envied his popularity, and the jealousy of those who looked upon him as the ablest supporter of the new opinions, it is not to be supposed that this learned man could escape the storm that overwhelmed the reformed church in Spain. He was among the first who were apprehended, when the familiars were let loose on the protestants of Seville. When information was conveyed to Charles V. in the monastery of St. Juste, that his favourite chaplain was thrown into prison, he exclaimed, "If Constantine be a heretic, he is a great one!" and when assured, at a subsequent period, by one of the inquisitors, that he had been found guilty, he replied with a sigh, "You cannot condemn a greater!"

The joy which the inquisitors felt at obtaining possession of the person of a man whom they had long eyed with jealousy, was in no small degree abated by the difficulties which they found in the way of procuring his conviction. Knowing the perilous circumstances in which he was placed, he had for some time back exercised the utmost circumspection over his words and actions. His confidential friends, as we have already stated, were always few and select. His penetration enabled him with a single glance to detect the traitor under his mask; and his knowledge of human nature kept him from committing himself to the weak though honest partisans of the reformed faith. The veneration and esteem in which he was held by his friends was so great, that they would have died sooner than compromise his safety by their confessions. When brought before his judges, he maintained his innocence, challenged the public prosecutor to show that he had done any thing criminal, and repelled the charges brought against him with such ability and success as threw his adversaries into the greatest perplexity. There was every probability that he would finally baffle their efforts to convict him of heresy, when an unforeseen occurrence obliged him to abandon the line of defence which he had hitherto pursued. Dona Isabella Martinia, a widow lady of respectability and opulence, had been thrown into prison as a suspected heretic, and her property confiscated. The inquisitors being informed, by the treachery of a servant in the family, that her son, Francisco Bertran, had contrived, before the inventory was taken, to secrete certain coffers contained valuable effects, sent their alguazil, Luis Sotelo, to demand them. As soon as the alguazil entered the house, Bertran, in great trepidation, told him he knew his errand, and would deliver up what he wanted, on condition that he screened him from the vengeance of the Inquisition. Conducting the alguazil to a retired part of the building, and breaking down a thin partition-wall, he disclosed a quantity of books which Constantine Ponce had deposited with his mother for the purpose of security, some time before his imprisonment. Sotelo signified that these were not exactly what he was in search of, but that he would take charge of them, along with the coffers which he was instructed to carry to the Holy Office. Dazzling as were the jewels of Isabella Martinia, the eyes of the inquisitors glistened still more at the sight of the books of Constantine. On examining them, they found, beside various heretical works, a volume of his own handwriting, in which the points of controversy between the church of Rome and the protestants were discussed at considerable length. In it the author treated of the true church according to the principles of Luther and Calvin, and, by an application of the different marks which the scriptures gave for discriminating it, showed that the papal church had no claim to the title. In a similar way he decided the questions respecting justification, the merit of good works, the sacraments, indulgences, and purgatory; calling this last the wolf's head, and an invention of the monks to feed idle bellies. When the volume was shown to Constantine, he acknowledged at once that it was in his handwriting, and contained his sentiments. "It is unnecessary for you (added he) to produce further evidence: you have there a candid and full confession of my belief. I am in your hands; do with me as seemeth to you good."

No arts or threatnings could prevail on him to give any information respecting his associates. With the view of inducing the other prisoners to plead guilty, the agents of the Holy Office circulated the report that he had informed against them when put to the question; and they even suborned witnesses to depone that they had heard his cries on the rack, though he never endured that inhuman mode of examination. By what motives the judges were restrained from subjecting him to it, is uncertain. I can only conjecture that it proceeded from respect to the feelings of the emperor; for, soon after his death, Constantine was removed from the apartment which he had hitherto occupied, and thrust into a low, damp, and noisome vault, where he endured more than his brethren did from the application of the engines of torture. Oppressed and worn out with a mode of living so different from what he had been used to, he was heard to exclaim, "O my God, were there no Scythians, or cannibals, or pagans still more savage, that thou hast permitted me to fall into the hands of these baptized fiends?" He could not remain long in such a situation. Putrid air and unwholesome diet, together with grief for the ruin of the reformed cause in his native country, brought on a dysentery, which put an end to his days, after he had been nearly two years in confinement.

Not satisfied with wreaking their vengeance on him when alive, his adversaries circulated the report that he had put an end to his own life by opening a vein with a piece of broken glass; and ballads grounded on this fabricated story, and containing other slanders, were indecently hawked through the streets of Seville. Had there been the least foundation for this report, we may be sure the inquisitors would have taken care to verify it, by ordering an inquest to be held on the dead body. But the calumny was refuted by the testimony of a young monk of San Isidro, named Fernando, who being providentially confined in the same cell with Constantine, ministered to him during his sickness, and closed his eyes in peace.

The slanders which were at this time so industriously propagated against him, only serve to show the anxiety of the inquisitors to blast his fame and the dread which they felt lest the reformed opinions should gain credit from the circumstance of their having been embraced by a person of so great eminence and popularity. In this object, however, they did not succeed altogether to their wish. This appeared when his effigy and bones were brought out in the public auto-de-fe celebrated at Seville on the 22d of December 1560. The effigies of such heretics as had escaped from justice, by flight or by death, usually consisted of a shapeless piece of patch-work surmounted by a head; that of Constantine Ponce consisted of a regular human figure, complete in all its parts, dressed after the manner in which he appeared in public, and representing him in his most common attitude of preaching, with one arm resting on the pulpit and the other elevated. The production of this figure in the spectacle, when his sentence was about to be read, excited a lively recollection of a preacher so popular, and drew from the spectators an expression of feeling by no means pleasing to the inquisitors. In consequence of this they caused it to be withdrawn from the prominent situation which it occupied, and to be brought near to their own platform, where they commenced the reading of the articles of the libel on which Constantine had been condemned. The people, displeased at this step, and not hearing what was read, began to murmur; upon which Calderon, who, as mayor of the city, presided on the occasion, desired the acting secretary to go to the pulpit provided for that part of the ceremony. This intimation being disregarded, the murmurs were renewed, and the mayor, raising his voice, ordered the service to be suspended. The inquisitors were obliged to restore the effigy to its former place, and to recommence the reading of the sentence in the audience of the people; but the secretary was instructed, after naming a few of the errors into which the deceased had fallen, to conclude by saying, that he had vented others so horrible and impious that they could not be heard without pollution by vulgar ears. After this the effigy was sent to the house of the Inquisition, and another of ordinary construction was conveyed to the stake to be burnt along with the bones of Constantine. The inquisitors were not a little puzzled how to act respecting his works, which had already been printed by their approbation; but they at last agreed to prohibit them, "not because they had found any thing in them worthy of condemnation," as their sentence runs, "but because it was not fit that any honourable memorial of a man doomed to infamy should be transmitted to posterity." But they had a still more delicate task to perform. The history of a voyage to Flanders by Philip II. when prince of Asturias, had been printed at Madrid by royal authority, in which his chaplain Constantine was described as "the greatest philosopher, the profoundest divine, and the most eloquent preacher, who has been in Spain for many ages." Whether Philip himself gave information of this work, we know not; but there can be no doubt that he would have run the risk of excommunication by retaining it in his library, after it was stigmatized by the inquisitorial censors of the press. They ordered all the copies of the book to be delivered to them, that they might delete the obnoxious panegyric; "and on this passage," says one who afterwards procured a copy of the History in Spain, "the expurgator of the book, which is in my hands, was so liberal of his ink, that I had much ado to read it."

Constantine Ponce was not the only protestant who fell a sacrifice to the noxious vapours and ordure of the inquisitorial prisons. This was also the fate of Olmedo, a man distinguished for his learning and piety, who fell into the hands of the inquisitors of Seville, and was often heard to exclaim, that there was no species of torture which he would not endure in preference to the horrors of his present situation. Considering the treatment which the prisoners received, it is wonderful that many of them were not driven to distraction. One individual only, a female, had recourse to the desperate remedy of shortening her days. Juana Sanchez, a beata, after having been long kept in prison at Valladolid, was found guilty of heresy. Coming to the knowledge of her sentence before it was formally intimated to her, she cut her throat with a pair of scissors, and died of the wound in the course of a few days. During the interval every effort was employed by the friars to induce her, not to repent of the suicide, but to recant the errors which she had cherished. She repulsed them with indignation, as monsters equally devoid of humanity and religion.

I must again refer my readers to the common histories of the Inquisition, for information as to the modes of torture and other cruel devices used for procuring evidence to convict those who were imprisoned on a charge of heresy. One or two instances, however, are of such a character that it would be unpardonable to omit them in this place. Among the protestants seized in Seville was the widow of Fernando Nugnez, a native of the town of Lepe, with three of her daughters and a married sister. As there was no evidence against them, they were put to the torture, but refused to inform against one another. Upon this the presiding inquisitor called one of the young women into the audience-chamber, and after conversing with her for some time, professed an attachment to her person. Having repeated this at another interview, he told her, that he could be of no service to her unless she imparted to him the whole facts of her case; but if she entrusted him with these, he would manage the affair in such a way as that she and all her friends should be set at liberty. Falling into the snare, the unsuspecting girl confessed to him that she had at different times conversed with her mother, sisters, and aunt, on the Lutheran doctrines. The wretch immediately brought her into court, and obliged her to declare judicially what she had owned to him in private. Nor was this all: under the pretence that her confession was not sufficiently ample and ingenuous, she was put to the torture by the most excruciating engines, the pulley and the wooden horse; by which means evidence was extorted from her, which led, not only to the condemnation of herself and her relations, but also to the seizure and conviction of others who afterwards perished in the flames. Another instance relates to a young countryman of our own. An English vessel, which had entered the port of St. Lucar, was visited by the familiars of the Inquisition, and several of the crew, who, with the frankness of British seamen, avowed themselves protestants, were seized before they came on shore. Along with them the familiars conveyed to prison a boy of twelve years of age, the son of a respectable merchant to whom the principal part of the cargo belonged. The pretext for his apprehension was, that an English psalm-book was found in his portmanteau; but there is reason to believe that the real ground was the hope of extorting from the father a rich ransom for his son's liberation. Having been piously educated, the youth was observed to be regular in his devotions, and to relieve the irksomeness of his confinement by occasionally singing one of the psalms which he had committed to memory. Both of these were high offences; for every piece of devotion not conducted under the direction of its ghostly agents, and even every mark of cheerfulness on the part of the prisoners, is strictly prohibited within the gloomy walls of the Holy Office. On the report of the jailer, the boy's confinement was rendered more severe; in consequence of which he lost the use of both his limbs, and it was found necessary, for the preservation of his life, to remove him to the public hospital.

So shameful were the measures taken for procuring the conviction of the prisoners at this time, that a legal investigation of the procedure in the inquisitorial tribunals was afterwards demanded by persons of great respectability in the church. In 1560, Senor Enriquez, an ecclesiastic of rank in the collegiate church of Valladolid, presented to Philip a remonstrance against the inquisition of that city, in which he charged it with tyranny and avarice. Among other things he asserted, that in the cause of Cazalla the officers had allowed the nuns, who like him were imprisoned for Lutheranism, to converse together, that, by confirming one another in their errors, the judges might have it in their power to condemn them, and thus to confiscate their property. Having accomplished the object which they had in view, they changed their measures, kept the prisoners apart, and, by examinations and visits, promises and threatenings, tried every method to induce them to recant and die in the bosom of the church.

Nearly two years having been spent in the previous steps, the time was considered as come, according to Spanish ideas of unity of action, for the exhibition of the last scene of the horrible tragedy. Orders were accordingly issued by the council of the Supreme for the celebration of public autos-de-fe, under the direction of the several tribunals of inquisition through the kingdom. Those which took place at Seville and Valladolid were the most noted for the pomp with which they were solemnized, and for the number and rank of the victims. Before describing these, it may be proper to give the reader a general idea of the nature of these exhibitions, and the order in which they were usually conducted.

An auto-de-fe, or act of faith, was either particular or general. In the particular auto, or autillo, as it is called, the offender appeared before the inquisitors in their hall, either alone or in the presence of a select number of witnesses, and had his sentence intimated to him. A general auto, in which a number of heretics were brought out, was performed with the most imposing solemnity, and formed an imitation of an ancient Roman triumph, combined with the last judgment.* It was always celebrated on Sunday or holyday, in the largest church, but more frequently in the most spacious square, of the town in which it happened to be held. Intimation of it was publicly made beforehand in all the churches and religious houses in the neighbourhood. The attendance of the civil authorities, as well as of the clergy, secular and regular, was required; and, with the view of attracting the multitude, an indulgence of forty days was proclaimed to all who should witness the ceremonies of the act.

On the evening preceding the auto, such of the prisoners as were penitent, and were to suffer a punishment milder than death, were assembled, the males in one apartment of the prison, and the females in another, when they had their respective sentences intimated to them. At midnight a confessor entered the cell of the prisoners who were sentenced to the stake, and intimated to them for the first time the fate which awaited them, accompanying the intimation with earnest exhortations to recant their errors, and die reconciled to the church; in which case they obtained the favour of being strangled before their bodies were committed to the flames. On such occasions the most heart-rending scenes sometimes took place.

* The last mentioned resemblance is noticed in a letter written by a Moor in Spain to a friend in Africa, giving him an account of the sufferings of his countrymen from the Inquisition: "After this they meet in the square of Hatabin, and there having erected a large stage, they make all resemble the day of judgment; and he that reconciles himself to them is clothed in a yellow mantle, and the rest are carried to the flames with effigies and horrible figures." (Marmol, Historia del Rebelion del Reyno de Granada, lib. iii. cap. 5.)

Early on the following morning the bells of all the churches began to toll, when the officials of the Inquisition repaired to the prison, and having assembled the prisoners, clothed them in the several dresses in which they were to make their appearance at the spectacle. Those who were found suspected of having erred in a slight degree were simply clothed in black. The other prisoners wore a sanbenito, or species of loose vest of yellow cloth, called zamarra in Spanish. On the sanbenito of those who were to be strangled were painted flames burning downwards, which the Spaniards call fuego revolto, to intimate that they had escaped the fire. The sanbenito of those who were doomed to be burnt alive was covered with figures of flames burning upwards, around which were painted devils, carrying faggots, or fanning the fire. Similar marks of infamy appeared on the pasteboard cap, called coroza, which was put on their heads. After this ceremony was over, they were desired to partake of a sumptuous breakfast, which, on their refusal, was devoured by the menials of the office.

The persons who were to take part in the ceremony being all assembled in the court of the prison, the procession moved on, generally in the following order. Preceded by a band of soldiers to clear the way, came a certain number of priests in their surplices, attended by a company of young persons, such as the boys of the college of Doctrine in Seville, who chanted the liturgy in alternate choruses. They were followed by the prisoners, arranged in different classes according to the degrees of their supposed delinquencies, the most guilty being placed last, having either extinguished torches or else crosses in their hands, and halters suspended from their necks. Every prisoner was guarded by two familiars, and, in addition to this, those who were condemned to die were attended each by two friars. After the prisoners came the local magistrates, the judges, and officers of state, accompanied by a train of nobility on horseback. They were succeeded by the secular and monastic clergy. At some distance from these were to be seen moving forward, in slow and solemn pomp, the members of the Holy Office, the persons who principally shared the triumph of the day, preceded by their fiscal, bearing the standard of the Inquisition, composed of red silk damask, on which the names and insignia of pope Sixtus IV. and Ferdinand the Catholic, the founders of the tribunal, were conspicuous, and surmounted by a crucifix of massive silver, overlaid with gold, which was held in the highest veneration by the populace. They were followed by the familiars on horseback, forming their body guard, and including many of the principal gentry of the country as honorary members. The procession was closed by an immense concourse of the common people, who advanced without any regular order.

Having arrived at the place of the auto, the inquisitors ascended the platform erected for their reception, and the prisoners were conducted to another which was placed opposite to it. The service commenced with a sermon, usually preached by some distinguished prelate; after which the clerk of the tribunal read the sentences of the penitents, who, on their knees, and with hands laid on the missal, repeated their confessions. The presiding inquisitor then descended from the throne on which he sat, and advancing to the altar, absolved the penitents a culpa, leaving them under the obligation to bear the several punishments to which they had been adjudged, whether these consisted of penances, banishment, whipping, hard labour, or imprisonment. He then administered an oath to all who were present at the spectacle, binding them to live and die in the communion of the Roman church, and to uphold and defend, against all its adversaries, the tribunal of the Holy Inquisition; during which ceremony the people were to be seen all at once on their knees in the streets. The more tragical part of the scene now followed. The sentences of those who were doomed to die having been publicly read, such of them as were in holy orders were publicly degraded, by being stripped, piece by piece, of their priestly vestments; a ceremony which was performed with every circumstance calculated to expose them to ignominy and execration in the eyes of the superstitious beholders. After this they were formally delivered over to the secular judges, to suffer the punishment awarded to heretics by the civil law. It was on this occasion that the inquisitors performed that impious farce which has excited the indignation of all in whose breasts fanaticism, or some worse principle, has not extinguished every sentiment of common feeling. When they delivered the prisoner into the hands of the secular judges whom they had summoned to receive him, they besought them to treat him with clemency and compassion.* This they did to escape falling under the censure of irregularity, which the canons of the church had denounced against ecclesiastics who should be accessory to the inflicting of any bodily injury. Yet they not only knew what would be the consequence of their act, but had taken all the precautions necessary for securing it. Five days before the auto-de-fe, they acquainted the ordinary royal judge with the number of prisoners to be delivered over to him, in order that the proper quantity of stakes, wood, and every thing else requisite for the execution, might be in readiness. The prisoners once declared by the inquisitors to be impenitent or relapsed heretics, nothing was competent to the magistrate but to pronounce the sentence adjudging them to the flames; and had he presumed in any instance to change the sentence of death into perpetual imprisonment, though it were in one of the remotest forts of Asia, Africa, or America, he would soon have felt the vengeance of the Holy Office. Besides, the statutes adjudging heretics to the fire had been confirmed by numerous bulls of popes, which commanded the inquisitors to watch over their exact observance. And in accordance with this, they, at every auto-de-fe, required the magistrates to swear that they would faithfully execute the sentences against the persons of heretics, without delay, "in the way and manner prescribed by the sacred canons, and the laws which treated on the subject." Were it necessary to say more on this topic, we might add that the very appearance of the prisoners, when brought out in the public spectacle, proclaimed the unblushing hypocrisy of the inquisitors. They implored the secular judge to treat with lenity and compassion persons whom they themselves had worn to skeletons by a cruel incarceration,—not to shed the blood of him from whose body they had often made the blood to spring, nor to break a bone of her whose tender limbs were already distorted and mangled by their hellish tortures!

The penitents having been remanded to their several prisons, the other prisoners were led away to execution. Some writers have spoken as if they were executed on the spot where their sentence was read, and in the presence of all who had witnessed the preceding parts of the spectacle. This, however, is a mistake. The stakes were erected without the walls of the town in which the auto-de-fe was celebrated; but though the last act was deemed too horrid to be exhibited on the same stage with those which we have described, yet it was performed publicly, and was witnessed, not only by the mob, but by persons who from their rank and station might have been expected to turn with disgust from so revolting a spectacle.

Seville contained by far the greatest number of protestants under confinement; and the long period during which its prisons had been crowded gave it a claim to the benefit of the first jail-delivery. Valladolid, however, was preferred; for no other reason, apparently, than that it afforded the Inquisition the opportunity of exhibiting the greatest proportion of criminals of whom it could boast as converts from heresy.

The first public auto-de-fe of protestants was accordingly celebrated in Valladolid on the 21st of May 1559, being Trinity Sunday, in the presence of Don Carlos, the heir apparent to the crown, and his aunt Joana, queen dowager of Portugal and governess of the kingdom during the absence of her brother Philip II.; attended by a great concourse of persons of all ranks. It was performed in the grand square, between the church of St. Francis and the house of the Consistory. In the front of the town-house, and by the side of the platform occupied by the inquisitors, a box was erected, which the royal family could enter without interruption from the crowd, and in which they had a full view of the prisoners. The spectacle continued from six o'clock in the morning till two in the afternoon, during which the people exhibited no symptoms of impatience, nor did the queen retire until the whole was concluded. The sermon was preached by the celebrated Melchior Cano, bishop of the Canaries; the bishop of Palencia, to whose diocese Valladolid at that time belonged, performed the ceremony of degrading such of the victims as were in holy orders. When the company were assembled and had taken their places, Francisco Baca, the presiding inquisitor, advancing to the bed of state on which the prince and his aunt were seated, administered to them the oath to support the Holy Office, and to reveal to it every thing contrary to the faith which might come to their knowledge, without respect of persons. This was the first time that such an oath had been exacted from any of the royal family; and Don Carlos, who was then only fourteen years of age, is said from that moment to have vowed an implacable hatred to the Inquisition.

* The protestant historian of the Inquisition, de Montes, states the matter thus:—When the person who is relaxed has confessed, the inquisitors, on delivering him to the secular judges, "beseech them to treat him with much commiseration, and not to break a bone of his body, nor shed his blood;" but when he is obstinate, they "beseech them, if he shall show any symptoms of true repentance, to treat him with much commiseration," &c. (Montanus, p. 148.) I do not observe any such distinction in the accounts of the popish historians. (Llorente, ii. 250–253. Puiglanch, i. 279–281.)

The prisoners brought forth on this occasion amounted to thirty, of whom sixteen were reconciled, and fourteen were "relaxed," or delivered over to the secular arm. Of the last class, two were thrown alive into the flames, while the remainder were previously strangled.

The greater part of the first class were persons distinguished by their rank and connexions. Don Pedro Sarmiento de Roxas, son of the first marquis de Poza, and of a daughter of the conde de Salinas y Ribadeo, was stripped of his ornaments as chevalier of St. James, deprived of his office as commander of Quintana, and commanded to wear a perpetual sanbenito, to be imprisoned for life, and to have his memory declared infamous. His wife Dona Mercia de Figueroa, dame of honour to the queen, was sentenced to wear the coat of infamy, and to be confined during the remainder of her life. His nephew Don Luis de Roxas, eldest son of the second marquis de Poza, and grandson of the marquis d'Alcagnizes, was exiled from the cities of Madrid, Valladolid, and Palencia, forbidden to leave the kingdom, and declared incapable of succeeding to the honours or estates of his father. Dona Ana Henriquez de Roxas, daughter of the marquis d'Alcagnizes, and wife of Don Juan Alonso de Fonseca Mexia, was a lady of great accomplishments, understood the Latin language perfectly, and though only twenty-four years of age, was familiar with the writings of the reformers, particularly those of Calvin. She appeared in the sanbenito, and was condemned to be separated from her husband and spend her days in a monastery. Her aunt Dona Maria de Roxas, a nun of St. Catherine in Valladolid, and forty years of age, received sentence of perpetual penance and imprisonment, from which, however, she was released by an influence which the inquisitors did not choose to resist. Don Juan de Ulloa Pereira, brother to the marquis de la Mota, was subjected to the same punishment as the first-mentioned nobleman. This brave chevalier had distinguished himself in many engagements against the Turks both by sea and land, and performed so great feats of valour in the expeditions to Algiers, Bugia, and other parts of Africa, that Charles the Fifth had advanced him to the rank of first captain, and afterwards of general. Having appealed to Rome against the sentence of the inquisitors, and represented the services which he had done to Christendom, De Ulloa was eventually restored to his rank as commander of the order of St. John of Jerusalem. Juan de Vibero Cazalla, his wife Dona Silva de Ribera, his sister Dona Constanza, Dona Francisca Zunega de Baeza, Marina de Saavedra the widow of a hidalgo named Juan Cisneros de Soto, and Leanor de Cisneros (whose husband Antonio Herezuelo was doomed to a severer punishment), with four others of inferior condition, were condemned to wear the sanbenito, and be imprisoned for life. The imprisonment of Anthony Wasor, an Englishman, and servant to Don Luis de Roxas, was restricted to one year's confinement in a convent. Confiscation of property was an article in the sentence of all these persons.

Among those who were delivered over to the secular arm, one of the most celebrated was Doctor Augustin Cazalla. His reputation, and the office he had held as chaplain to the late emperor, made him an object of particular attention to the inquisitors. During his confinement he underwent frequent examinations, with the view of establishing the charges against himself and his fellow-prisoners. Cazalla was deficient in the courage which was requisite for the situation into which he had brought himself. On the 4th of March 1559 he was conducted into the place of torture, when he shrunk from the trial, and promising to submit to his judges, made a declaration, in which he confessed that he had embraced the Lutheran doctrine, but denied that he had ever taught it, except to those who were of the same sentiments with himself. This answered all the wishes of the inquisitors, who were determined that he should expiate his offence by death, at the same time that they kept him in suspense as to his fate, with the view of procuring from him additional information. On the evening before the auto-de-fe, Antonio de Carrera, a monk of St. Jerome, being sent to acquaint him with his sentence, Cazalla begged earnestly to know, if he might entertain hopes of escaping capital punishment; to which Carrera replied, that the inquisitors could not rely on his declarations, but that, if he would confess all that the witnesses had deponed against him, mercy might perhaps be extended to him. This cautious reply convinced Cazalla that his doom was fixed. "Well, then," said he, "I must prepare to die in the grace of God; for it is impossible for me to add to what I have said, without falsehood." He confessed himself to Carrera that night, and next morning. On the scaffold, seeing his sister Constanza passing among those who were sentenced to perpetual imprisonment, he pointed to her, and said to the princess Joana, "I beseech your highness, have compassion on this unfortunate woman, who has thirteen orphan children!" At the place of execution, he addressed a few words to his fellow-prisoners in the character of a penitent, in virtue of which he obtained the poor favour of being strangled before his body was committed to the fire. His confessor was so pleased with his behaviour as to say, he had no doubt Cazalla was in heaven. His sister Dona Beatriz de Vibero, Doctor Alonso Perez, a priest of Palencia, Don Christobal de Ocampo, chevalier of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, and almoner to the grand prior of Castile, Don Christobal de Padilla, and seven others, shared the same fate as Cazalla. Among these were the husband of the woman who had informed against the protestant conventicle in Valladolid, and four females, one of whom, Dona Catalina de Ortega, was daughter-in-law to the fiscal of the royal council of Castile. They were all protestants, except Gonzales Baez, a Portuguese, who was condemned as a relapsed Jew.

The two individuals who on this occasion had the honour to endure the flames were Francisco de Vibero Cazalla, parish priest of Hormigos, and Antonio Herezuelo, an advocate of Toro. Some writers say that the former begged, when under the torture, to be admitted to reconciliation; but it is certain that he gave no sign of weakness or a wish to recant on the day of the auto-de-fe. Seeing his brother Augustin Cazalla, not at the stake, but on the adjoining scaffold among the penitents, and being prevented from speaking by the gag, he signified his sorrow by an expressive motion of his hands; after which he bore the fire without shrinking. Herezuelo conducted himself with surpassing intrepidity. From the moment of his apprehension to that of his death, he never exhibited the least symptom of a wish to save his life, or to mitigate his sufferings, by compromising his principles. His courage remained unshaken amidst the horrors of the torture, the ignominy of the public spectacle, and the terrors of the stake. The only thing that moved him, on the day of the auto-de-fe, was the sight of his wife in the garb of a penitent; and the look which he gave (for he could not speak), as he passed her to go to the place of execution, seemed to say, "This is hard to bear!" He listened without emotion to the friars who teazed him with their importunate exhortations to repent, as they conducted him to the stake; but when, at their instigation, his former associate and instructor, Doctor Cazalla, began to address him in the same strain, he threw upon him a glance of disdain, which froze the words on his recreant lips. "The bachelor Herezuelo (says the popish author of the Pontifical History) suffered himself to be burnt alive with unparalleled hardihood. I stood so near him that I had a complete view of his person, and observed all his motions and gestures. He could not speak, for his mouth was gagged on account of the blasphemies which he had uttered; but his whole behaviour showed him to be a most resolute and hardened person, who, rather than yield to believe with his companions, was determined to die in the flames. Though I marked him narrowly, I could not observe the least symptom of fear, or expression of pain; only, there was a sadness in his countenance beyond any thing I had ever seen. It was frightful to look in his face, when one considered that in a moment he would be in hell with his associate and master, Luther." Enraged to see such courage in a heretic, one of the guards plunged his lance into the body of Herezuelo, whose blood was licked up by the flames with which he was already enveloped.

Herezuelo and his wife, Leanor de Cisneros, were divided in their death, but it was in the time of it only, not the kind or manner; and their memory must not be divided in our pages. Leanor was only twenty-two years of age when she was thrown into the Inquisition; and when we consider that, during her imprisonment, she was precluded from all intercourse with her husband, kept in ignorance of his resolutions, and perhaps deceived into the belief that she would find him among the class of penitents in the auto, we need not wonder that one of her tender sex and age should have fainted in the day of trial, suffered herself to be overcome by the persuasions of the monks, or, yielding to the feelings of nature, consented to renounce with the hand that truth which she continued to believe with the heart. Such assaults have shaken, and threatened to throw to the ground, pillars in the church. But Leanor was not long in recovering from the shock. The parting look of her husband never departed from her eyes; the reflection that she had inflicted a pang on his heart, during the arduous conflict which he had to maintain, fanned the flame of attachment to the reformed religion which secretly burned in her breast; and having resolved, in dependence on that strength which is made perfect in weakness, to emulate the example of constancy set by one in every respect so dear to her, she resolutely broke off the course of penance on which she had entered. The consequence of this was, that she was again thrown into the secret prisons. During eight years that she was kept in confinement, every effort was made in vain to induce her to renew her recantation. At last she was brought out in a public auto-de-fe celebrated at Valladolid; and we have the account of her behaviour from the same pen which so graphically described that of her husband. "In the year 1568, on the 26th of September, justice was executed on Leanor de Cisneros, widow of the bachelor Herezuelo. She suffered herself to be burnt alive, notwithstanding the great and repeated exertions made to bring her to a conviction of her errors. Finally, she resisted, what was sufficient to melt a stone, an admirable sermon preached, at the auto of that day, by his excellency Don Juan Manuel, bishop of Zamora, a man no less learned and eloquent in the pulpit than illustrious in blood. But nothing could move the impenetrable heart of that obstinate woman."

One part of the solemnities in the first auto at Valladolid, though not so shocking to the feelings as some others which have been related, was nevertheless a flagrant violation both of justice and humanity. Dona Leanor de Vibero, the mother of Doctor Cazalla and of four other children who appeared as criminals in this auto-de-fe, had died some years before, and was buried in a sepulchral chapel of which she was the proprietress. No suspicion of heresy attached to her at the time of her death; but, on the imprisonment of her children, the fiscal of the inquisition at Valladolid commenced a process against her; and certain witnesses under the torture having deponed that her house was used as a temple for the Lutherans, sentence was passed, declaring her to have died in a state of heresy, her memory to be infamous, and her property confiscated; and ordering her bones to be dug up, and, together with her effigy, publicly committed to the flames; her house to be razed, the ground on which it stood to be sown with salt, and a pillar, with an inscription stating the cause of its demolition, to be erected on the spot. All this was done, and the last-mentioned monument of fanaticism and ferocity against the dead was to be seen until the year 1809, when it was removed during the occupation of Spain by the French.

There were still a great number of protestant prisoners in Valladolid; but though the processes of most of them were terminated, they were kept in confinement, to afford a gratifying spectacle to the monarch on his arrival from the Low Countries. The second auto-de fe in this city was celebrated on the 8th of October 1559. Philip II. appeared at it, attended by his son, his sister, the prince of Parma, three ambassabors from France, with a numerous assemblage of prelates, and nobility of both sexes. The inquisitor general Valdes administered the oath to the king; on which occasion Philip, rising from his seat, and drawing his sword in token of his readiness to use it in support of the Holy Office, swore and subscribed the oath, which was afterwards read aloud to the people by one of the officers of the Inquisition.

Twenty-nine prisoners appeared on the scaffold, of whom sixteen wore the garb of penitents, while the flames painted on the sanbenitos and corozas of the remainder marked them out for the stake. Among the former were Dona Isabella de Castilla, wife of Don Carlos de Seso, her niece Dona Catalina, and three nuns of St. Belen. The first two were condemned to lose all their property, to wear the sanbenito, and be imprisoned during life. To the Lutherans subjected to penances were added two men, one of whom was convicted of having sworn falsely that a child had been circumcised, with the view of bringing the father to the stake; the other of having personated an alguazil of the Holy Office. The former was sentenced to receive two hundred lashes, to lose the half of his property, and to work in the galleys for five years; the latter to receive four hundred lashes, to lose the whole of his property, and to work in the galleys for life; a striking specimen of the comparative estimate which the Inquisition forms of meditated murder, and an insult on its own prerogatives.

At the head of those devoted to death was Don Carlos de Seso, with whose name the reader is already acquainted. Arrested at Logrono, he was thrown into the secret prisons of the inquisition of Valladolid; and, on the 28th of June 1558, answered the interrogatories of the fiscal. His conduct during the whole of his imprisonment, and in the formidable scene by which it terminated, was worthy of his noble character, and the active part he had taken in the cause of religious reform. In the examinations which he underwent, he never varied, nor sought to excuse himself by affixing blame to those whom he knew his judges were anxious to condemn. When informed of his sentence on the night before his execution, he called for pen, ink, and paper, and having written a confession of his faith, gave it to the officer, saying, "This is the true faith of the gospel, as opposed to that of the church of Rome which has been corrupted for ages; in this faith I wish to die, and in the remembrance and lively belief of the passion of Jesus Christ, to offer to God my body now reduced so low." "It would be difficult (says one who read this document in the archives of the Inquisition) to convey an idea of the uncommon vigour of sentiment with which he filled two sheets of paper, though he was then in the presence of death." The whole of that night and next morning was spent by the friars in ineffectual attempts to induce him to recant. He appeared in the procession with a gag in his mouth, which remained while he was in the auto-de-fe, and on the way to the place of execution. It was removed after he was bound to the stake, and the friars began again to exhort him to confess. He replied, in a loud voice, and with great firmness, "I could demonstrate to you that you ruin yourselves by not imitating my example; but there is no time. Executioners, light the pile which is to consume me." They obeyed, and De Seso expired in the flames without a struggle or a groan. He died in the forty-third year of his age.

Pedro de Cazalla, parish priest of Pedrosa, when arrested on the 25th of April 1558, confessed that he had embraced the protestant doctrines. Having afterwards supplicated reconciliation, he could obtain only two votes in the court of Inquisition for a punishment milder than death, and the decision of the majority was confirmed by the council of the Supreme. He refused to make confession to the priest sent to intimate his sentence, and appeared in the auto with the gag; but after he was bound to the stake, having asked, or the attendant monks having represented him as asking a confessor, he was strangled and then cast into the fire. He was only in the thirty-fourth year of his age.

Domingo de Roxas, son of the marquis de Poza, two of whose children appeared in the former auto, was seized, in the garb of a laic, at Calahorra, where he had stopped, in his flight to the Low Countries, in order to have an interview with his friend De Seso. Subsequently to the 13th of May 1558, when he made his first appearance before the Inquisition, he underwent frequent examinations. The inquisitors having ordered the torture to be administered with the view of extorting from him certain facts which they were anxious to possess, he promised to tell all he knew, provided they would spare him the horrors of the question, which he dreaded more than death. Deluded by the prospect of a merciful sentence which was held out to him, he was induced to make certain professions of sorrow, and to throw out insinuations unfavourable to the cause of archbishop Carranza; but as soon as he was undeceived, he craved an audience of the inquisitors, at which he did ample justice to that prelate, without asking any mitigation of his own punishment. On the night before his execution he refused the services of the priest appointed to wait on him. When the ceremonies of the auto were finished, and the secular judge had pronounced sentence on the prisoners delivered over him, De Roxas, in passing the royal box, made an appeal to the mercy of the king. "Canst thou, Sire, thus witness the torments of thy innocent subjects? Save us from so cruel a death." "No," replied Philip sternly; "I would myself carry wood to burn my own son, where he such a wretch as thou." De Roxas was about to say something in defence of himself and his fellow-sufferers, when, the unrelenting despot waving his hand, the officers instantly thrust the gag into the martyr's mouth. It remained, contrary to the usual custom, after he was bound to the stake; so much were his judges irritated at his boldness, or afraid of the liberties he would use. Yet we are told, that when the fire was about to be applied to the pile, his courage failed, he begged a confessor, and having received absolution, was strangled. Such appears to be the account of his last moments inserted in the records of the Inquisition; but private letters, written from Spain at the time, give a different representation: "They carried him from the scaffold accompanied with a number of monks, about a hundred, flocking about him, railing and making exclamations against him, and some of them urging him to recant; but he, notwithstanding, answered them with a bold spirit, that he would never renounce the doctrine of Christ."

Juan Sanchez, at the commencement of the persecution of the protestants in Valladolid, had made his escape to the Low Countries, under the assumed name of Juan de Vibar. Thinking himself safe, he wrote letters, dated from Castrourdiales in the month of May 1558, and addressed to Dona Catalina Hortega, in whose family he had formerly resided. That lady having been seized as a suspected Lutheran, the letters fell into the hands of the inquisitors, who sent information to Philip, then at Brussels. Sanchez was apprehended at Turlingen, conveyed to Valladolid, and delivered over to the secular magistrate as a dogmatising and impenitent heretic. The gag was taken from his mouth at the place of execution, but as he did not ask for a confessor, the pile was kindled. When the fire had consumed the ropes by which he was bound, he darted from the stake, and unconsciously leaped on the scaffold used for receiving the confessinos of those who recanted in their last moments. The friars instantly collected to the spot, and urged him to retract his errors. Recovering from his momentary delirium, and looking around him, he saw on one side some of his fellow-prisoners on their knees doing penance, and on the other Don Carlos de Seso standing unmoved in the midst of the flames, upon which he walked deliberately back to the stake, and calling for more fuel, said, "I will die like De Seso." Incensed at what they considered as a proof of audacious impiety, the archers and executioners strove who should first comply with his request. He died in the thirty-third year of his age.

The case of Dona Marina Guevara, a nun of St. Belen, presents some singular features which are worthy of observation. When first denounced to the Inquisition, she owned that she had given entertainment to certan Lutheran opinions, but with hesitation, and in ignorance of their import and tendency. Her petition to be reconciled to the church was refused, because she would not acknowledge some things which the witnesses had deponed against her, and because she presisted in her assertion, that she had not yielded a cordial and complete assent to the heresies with which her mind had been tainted. When the depositions were communicated to her by order of the inquisitors, she replied, that it seemed as if they wished to instil into her mind errors of which she was ignorant, rather than induce her to abandon those to which she had incautiously given ear; and that the oath she had taken would not permit her to add to her confession, or to acknowledge crimes of which she was not conscious, and facts which she did not recollect. The whole of the proceedings, while they display the honourable feelings of Marina, and the firmness of her character, depict, in strong colours, the sternness with which the Holy Office adhered to its tyrannical principles. She was connected with persons of high rank, including Valdes the grand inquisitor, who used every means for her deliverance. But the ordinary judges lent a deaf ear to the applications made by their superior in her behalf, which they resisted as an interference with their jurisdiction, and a proof of partiality and weakness, unworthy of one whose office required him to be insensible to the calls of nature and friendship. Valdes was obliged to procure an order from the council of the Supreme, authorizing Don Tellez Giron de Montalban, the cousin of the prisoner, to have a final interview with her, in the presence of the leading members of the tribunal, with a view of inducing her to yield to their demands. But the attempt was unsuccessful. Dona Marina resisted all the entreaties of her noble relative, and refused to purchase her life by telling a falsehood. The inquisitors, inflexible to their former purpose, proceeded to pronounce sentence against her; and on the day of the auto she was delivered to the secular arm, and being strangled at the place of execution, her body was given to the flames. This act proclaimed, more decidedly than even the reply made by Philip to the son of the marquis de Poza, that there was no safety in Spain for any one who harboured a thought at variance with the Roman faith, or who was not prepared to yield the most implicit and absolute obedience to the dictates of the Inquisition.

The autos-de-fe celebrated at Seville were still more memorable than those at Valladolid, if not for the rank of the spectators, at least for the number of prisoners exhibited on the scaffold. The first of these was solemnized on the 24th of September 1559, in the square of St. Francis. It was attended by four bishops, the members of the royal court of justice, the chapter of the cathedral, and a great assemblage of nobility and gentry. Twenty-one persons were delivered over to the secular arm, and eighty were condemned to lesser punishments.

The most distinguished individual, in point of rank, who suffered death on the present occasion, was Don Juan Ponce de Leon, son of the count de Baylen, and a near relation of the duchess de Bejar, who was present at the spectacle. None had given more decided proofs of attachment to the reformed cause, and none had more diligently prepared himself for suffering martyrdom for it than this nobleman. For years he had avoided giving countenance to the superstitions of his country, and had made it a practice to visit the spot where the confessors of the truth suffered, with the view of habituating his mind to its horrors, and abating the terror which it was calculated to inspire. But the stoutest heart will sometimes faint in the hour of trial. The rank of Don Juan inspired the inquisitors with a strong desire to triumph over his constancy. After extorting from him, by means of the rack, a confession of some of the articles laid to his charge, they employed their secret emissaries to pursuade him that he would consult his own safety, and that of his brethren, by confessing the whole. He had scarcely given his consent to this when he repented. On the night before his execution he complained bitterly of the deceit which had been practised towards him, and having made an undisguised profession of his faith, rejected the services of the priest appointed to wait upon him. De Montes asserts that he preserved his constancy to the last, and, in support of this statement, appeals to the official account of the auto, and to his sanbenito which was hung up in one of the churches, with the inscription "Juan Ponce de Leon, burnt as an obstinate Lutheran heretic." But Llorente says, that this epithet was applied to all who were sentenced to capital punishment, and that Don Juan, after he was bound to the stake and saw the fire about to be kindled, confessed himself to one of the attendant priests, and was strangled. His doom entailed infamy, and the forfeiture of every civil right, on his posterity; but the issue of his elder brother failing, Don Pedro, his son, after great opposition, obtained a decision from the royal chancery of Granada in favour of his claims, and was restored by letters from Philip III., to the earldom of Baylen.

No such doubt hangs over the constancy of the persons to be named. Doctor Juan Gonzalez was descended of Moorish ancestors, and at twelve years of age had been imprisoned on suspicion of Mahometanism. He afterwards became one of the most celebrated preachers in Andalusia, and a protestant. In the midst of the torture, which he bore with unshrinking fortitude, he told the inquisitors, that his sentiments, though opposite to those of the church of Rome, rested on plain and express declarations of the word of God, and that nothing would induce him to inform against his brethren. When brought out on the morning of the auto, he appeared with a cheerful and undaunted air, though he had left his mother and two brothers behind him in prison, and was accompanied by two sisters, who, like himself, were doomed to the flames. At the door of the Triana he began to sing the hundred and ninth psalm; and on the scaffold he addressed a few words of consolation to one of his sisters, who seemed to him to wear a look of dejection; upon which the gag was instantly thrust into his mouth. With unaltered mein he listened to the sentence adjudging him to the flames, and submitted to the humiliating ceremonies by which he was degraded from the priesthood. When they were brought to the place of execution, the friars urged the females, in repeating the creed, to insert the word Roman in the clause relating to the catholic church. Wishing to procure liberty to him to bear his dying testimony, they said they would do as their brother did. The gag being removed, Juan Gonzalez exhorted them to add nothing to the good confession which they had already made. Instantly the executioners were ordered to strangle them, and one of the friars, turning to the crowd, exclaimed that they had died in the Roman faith; a falsehood which the inquisitors did not choose to repeat in their narrative of the proceedings.

The same constancy was evinced by four monks of the convent of San Isidro. Among these was the celebrated Garcia de Arias, whose character had undergone a complete revolution. From the moment of his imprisonment he renounced that system of cautiousness and tergiversation on which he had formerly acted. He made an explicit profession of his faith, agreeing, in every point, with the sentiments of the reformers; expressed his sorrow that he had concealed it so long; and offered to prove that the opposite opinions were grossly erroneous and superstitious. On his trial he mocked the inquisitors, as persons who presumed to give judgment on matters of which they were utterly ignorant, and reminded them of instances in which they, as well as the qualificators whom they called to their assistance, were forced to confess their incapacity to interpret the scriptures. The priests, as a necessary point of form, visited his cell, but none of them durst enter the lists in argument with him. Being advanced in years, he ascended the scaffold, on the day of the auto, leaning on his staff, but went to the stake with a countenance expressive of joy and readiness to meet the flames.

Christobal d'Arellano, a member of the same convent, was distinguished by his learning, the inquisitors themselves being judges. Among the articles in his process, read in the auto, he was charged with having said, "that the mother of God was no more a virgin than he was." At hearing this, d'Arellano, rising from his seat, exclaimed, "It is a falsehood; I never advanced such a blasphemy; I have always maintained to the contrary, and at this moment am ready to prove, with the gospel in my hand, the virginity of Mary." The inquisitors were so confounded at this public contradiction, and the tone in which it was uttered, that they did not even order him to be gagged. On arriving at the stake, he was thrown into some degree of perturbation at seeing one of the monks of his convent who had come there to insult over his fate; but he soon recovered his former serenity of mind, and expired amidst the flames, encouraging Juan Chrisostomo, who had been his pupil and was now his fellow-sufferer.

The fate of Juan de Leon was peculiarly hard. He had resided for some time as an artisan at Mexico, and on his retrun to Spain was led, under the influence of a superstitious feeling general among his countrymen, to take the vow in the convent of San Isidro, near Seville. This happened about the time that the knowledge of the truth began to be introduced into that monastery. Having imbibed the protestant doctrine, Juan lost his relish for the monastic life, and quitted the convent on the pretext of bad health; but the regret which he felt at losing the religious instructions of the good fathers determined him to rejoin their society. On his return to San Isidro he found it deserted by its principle inhabitants, whom he followed to Geneva. During his residence in this city, intelligence came that Elizabeth had succeeded to the throne of England; and Juan de Leon, with some of his countrymen, resolved to accompany the English exiles who were preparing to return home. The Spanish court, in concert with the Inquisition, had planted spies on the road from Milan to Geneva, and at Frankfort, Cologne, and Antwerp, to waylay such Italians or Spaniards as left their native country for the sake of religion. Aware of this fact, Juan de Leon and another Spaniard took a different road, but at Strasburg they were betrayed to a spy, who pursued their route to a port in Zealand, and having procured a warrant, seized them as they were stepping on board a vessel for England. As soon as the officers presented themselves, Juan, aware of their intentions, turned to his companion, and said, "Let us go; God will be with us." After being severely tortured to make them discover their fellow-exiles, they were sent to Spain. During the voyage and the journey by land, they were not only heavily chained like felons, but each of them had his head and face covered with a species of helmet, made of iron, having a piece of the same metal, shapen like a tongue, which was inserted into his mouth, to prevent him from speaking. While his companion was sent to Valladolid, Juan was delivered to the inquisitors at Seville. The sufferings which he endured from torture and imprisonment, had brought on a consumption; and his appearance, on the day of the auto, was such as would have melted the heart of any humam being but an inquisitor. He was attended at the stake by a monk who had passed his noviciate along with him, and who disturbed his last moments, by reminding him of those things of which he was now ashamed. His mouth being relieved from the gag, he, with much composure and graveness, made a declaration of his faith in few but emphatic words, and then welcomed the flames which were to put an end to his sufferings, and to convey him to the spirits of just men made perfect.

Fernando de San Juan, master of the college of Doctrine, and Doctor Christobal Losada, pastor to the protestant church in Seville, suffered with the same fortitude and constancy. The latter, after he had reached the place of burning, was engaged in a theological dispute by the importunity of the friars, who flattered themselves with being able to convince him of his errors; but perceiving that the people listened eagerly to what was said, they began to speak in Latin, and were followed by Losada, who continued for a considerable time to carry on the conversation with propriety and elegance in a foreign tongue, at the foot of that stake which was about to consume him to ashes.

This auto-de-fe furnished examples of Christian heroism, equally noble, in those of the tender sex, several of whom "were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection." Among these were Dona Isabel de Baena, Maria de Virves, Maria de Cornel, and Maria de Bohorques. The first was a rich matron of Seville, who had permitted the protestants to meet for worship in her house, which on that account was laid under the same sentence of execration as that of Leanor de Vibero at Valladolid. The rest were young ladies, and connected with the most distinguished families in Spain. The story of Maria de Bohorques became celebrated, both from its interesting circumstances, and from its having been made the foundation of an historical novel by a Spanish writer. She was a natural daughter of Don Pedro Garcia de Xeres y Bohorques, a Spanish grandee of the first class, and had not completed her twenty-first year when she fell into the hands of the Inquisition. Great care had been bestowed on her education, and being able to read the Bible, and expositions of it, in the Latin tongue, she acquired a knowledge of the scriptures which was possessed by few men, or even clergymen, in her native country. Egidio, whose pupil she was, used to say he always felt himself wiser from an interview with Maria de Bohorques. When brought before the inquisitors she avowed her faith; defended it as the ancient truth, which Luther and his associates had recovered from the rubbish by which it had been hid for ages; and told her judges, that it was their duty to embrace it, instead of punishing her and others for maintaining it. She was severely tortured, in consequence of her refusal to answer certain questions calculated to implicate her friends. From deference to the intercession of her relations, or from the desire of making a convert of one so accomplished, the inquisitors, contrary to their usual custom, sent first two Jesuits, and afterwards two Dominicans, to her cell, to persuade her to relinquish her heretical opinions. They returned full of chagrin at their ill success, but of admiration at the dexterity with which she repelled their arguments. On the night before the auto at which she was to suffer, they repeated their visit, in company with two other priests. She received them with great politeness, but at the same time told them very plainly, that they might have saved themselves the trouble which they had taken, for she felt more concern about her salvation than they could possibly feel; she would have renounced her sentiments if she had entertained any doubt of their truth, but was more confirmed in them than she was when first thrown into prison, inasmuch as the popish divines, after many attempts, had opposed nothing to them but what she had anticipated, and to which she was able to return an easy and satisfactory answer. On the morning of the auto-de-fe she made her appearance with a cheerful countenance. During the time that the line of the procession was forming, she comforted her female companions, and engaged them to join with her in singing a psalm suitable to the occasion, upon which the gag was put into her mouth. It was taken out after her sentence was read, and she was asked, if she would now confess those errors to which she had hitherto adhered with such obstinacy. She replied with a distinct and audible voice, "I neither can nor will recant." When the prisoners arrived at the place of execution, Don Juan Ponce, who began to waver at the sight of the preparations for the fiery trial, admonished her not to be too confident in the new doctrines, but to weigh the arguments of those who attended to give them advice. Dona Maria upbraided him for his irresolution and cowardice; adding that it was not a time for reasoning, but that all of them ought to employ their few remaining moments in meditating on the death of that Redeemer for whom they were about to suffer. Her constancy was yet put to a further trial. After she was bound to the stake, the attending priests, having prevailed on the presiding magistrate to delay the lighting of the pile, and professing to feel for her youth and talents, requested her merely to repeat the creed. This she did not refuse, but immediately began to explain some of its articles in the Lutheran sense. She was not permitted to finish her commentary; and the executioner having received orders to strangle her, she was consumed in the fire.

The effigy of the licentiate Zafra, whose providential escape has been mentioned, was burnt at this auto-de-fe. Among the penitents who appeared on the present occasion, one deserves to be mentioned as a specimen of the lenity with which the inquisitors punished a crime which, in Spain, ought to have been visited with the most exemplary vengeance. The servant of a gentleman in Puerto de Santa Maria having fastened a rope to a crucifix, concealed it, along with a whip, in the bottom of a chest, and going to the Triana, informed the holy fathers that his master was in the habit of scourging the image every-day. The crucifix was found in the place and situation described by the informer, and the gentleman was thrown into the secret prisons. Happily for him, he recollected a quarrel which he had had with his servant, and succeeded in proving that the accusation had its origin in personal revenge. According to the regulations of the Holy Office the servant ought to have suffered death; but he was merely sentenced to receive four hundred strokes with the whip, and to be confined six years in the galleys. The execution appears to have been confined to the first part of the sentence, which, upon a principle of retaliation worthy of the ingenuity of the Inquisition, was considered as expiatory of the supposed indignity done to the crucifix.

The second grand auto-de-fe in Seville took place on the 22d of December 1560, after it had been delayed in the hopes of the arrival of the monarch. It was on this occasion that the effigies of the deceased doctors Egidius and Constantine, together with that of Juan Perez, who had fled, were produced and burnt. Fourteen persons were delivered to the secular arm, and thirty-four were sentenced to inferior punishments.

Julian Hernandez was in the first class, and the closing scene of his life did not disgrace his former daring and fortitude. When brought out to the court of the Triana on the morning of the auto, he said to his fellow-prisoners, "Courage, comrades! This is the hour in which we must show ourselves valiant soldiers of Jesus Christ. Let us now bear faithful testimony to his truth before men, and within a few hours we shall receive the testimony of his approbation before angels, and triumph with him in heaven." He was silenced by the gag, but continued to encourage his companions by his gestures, during the whole of the spectacle. On arriving at the stake he knelt down and kissed the stone on which it was erected; then rising he thrust his naked head once and again among the faggots, in token of his welcoming that death which was so dreadful to others. Being bound to the stake, he composed himself to prayer, when Doctor Fernando Rodriguez, one of the attending priests, interpreting his attitude as a mark of abated courage, prevailed with the judge to remove the gag from his mouth. Having delivered a succinct confession of his belief, Julian began to accuse Rodriguez, with whom he had been formerly acquainted, of hypocrisy in concealing his real sentiments through fear of man. The galled priest exclaimed, "Shall Spain, the conqueror and mistress of nations, have her peace disturbed by a dwarf? Executioner, do your office." The pile was instantly kindled; and the guards, envying the unshaken firmness of the martyr, terminated his sufferings by plunging their lances into his body.

No fewer than eight females, of irreproachable character, and some of them distinguished by their rank and education, suffered the most cruel of deaths at this auto-de-fe. Among these was Maria Gomez, who, having recovered from the mental disorder by which she was overtaken, had been received back into the protestant fellowship, and fell into the hands of the Inquisition. She appeared on the scaffold along with her three daughters and a sister. After the reading of the sentence which doomed them to the flames, one of the young women went up to her aunt, from whom she had imbibed the protestant doctrine, and, on her knees, thanked her for all the religious instructions she had received from her, implored her forgiveness for any offence she might have given her, and begged her dying blessing. Raising her up, and assuring her that she had never given her a moment's uneasiness, the old woman proceeded to encourage her dutiful niece, by reminding her of that support which their divine Redeemer had promised them in the hour of trial, and of those joys which awaited them at the termination of their momentary sufferings. The five friends then took leave of one another with tender embraces and words of mutual comfort. The interview between these devoted females was beheld by the members of the Holy Tribunal with a rigid composure of countenance, undisturbed even by a glance of displeasure; and so completely had superstition and habit subdued the strongest emotions of the human breast, that not a single expression of sympathy escaped from the multitude at witnessing a scene which, in other circumstances, would have harrowed up the feelings of the spectators, and driven them into mutiny.

Three foreigners, two of whom were Englishmen, perished in this auto. Nicolas Burton, a merchant of London, having visited Spain with a vessel laden with goods, fell into the hands of the Inquisition, and refusing to abjure the protestant faith, was burnt alive. The remarks of Llorente on this transaction are extremely just. "Let it be granted, if you will have it so, that Burton was guilty of an imprudence, by posting up his religious sentiments at San Lucar de Barrameda, and at Seville, in contempt of the faith of the Spaniards; it is no less true that both charity and justice required, that in the case of a stranger who had not his fixed abode in Spain, they should have contented themselves with warning him to abstain from all marks of disrespect to the religion and laws of the country, and threatening him with punishment if he repeated the offence. The Holy Office had nothing to do with his private sentiments; having been established, not for strangers, but solely for the people of Spain." That the charge against Burton was a mere pretext, if not a fabrication, is evident from the fact, that William Burke, a mariner of Southampton, and a Frenchman of Bayonne, named Fabianne, who had come to Spain in the course of trade, were burnt at the same stake with him, although not accused of any insult on the religion of the country.

Part of the goods in Burton's ship, which was confiscated by the inquisitors, belonged to a merchant in London, who sent John Frampton of Bristol to Seville, with a power of attorney, to reclaim his property. The holy Office had recourse to every obstacle in opposing his claim, and after fruitless labour during four months he found it necessary to repair to England to obtain ampler powers. Upon his landing the second time in Spain, he was seized by two familiars, and conveyed in chains to Seville, where he was thrown into the secret prisons of the Triana. The only pretext for his apprehension was, that a book of Cato in English was found in his portmanteau. Being unable to substantiate a charge on this ground, the inquisitors interrogated him on his religious opinions, and insisted that he should clear himself of the suspicion of heresy by repeating the Ave Maria. In doing this, he omitted the words, "Mother of God, pray for us;" upon which he was put to the torture. After enduring three shocks of the pully, and while he "lay flat on the ground, half-dead and half-alive," he agreed to confess whatever his tormentors chose to dictate. In consequence of this, he was found violently suspected of Lutheranism, and the property which he had come to recover was confiscated. He appeared among the penitents at the auto at which Burton suffered, and after being kept in prison for more than two years was set at liberty.

Among those who appeared as penitents were several ladies of family and monks of different orders. Others were severely punished on the most trivial grounds. Diego de Virves, a member of the municipality of Seville, was fined in a hundred ducats for having said, on occasion of the preparations for Maunday-Thursday, "Would it not be more acceptable to God to expend the money lavished on this ceremony in relieving poor families?" Bartolomé Fuentes having received an injury from a certain priest, exclaimed, "I cannot believe that God will descend from heaven into the hands of such a worthless person;" for which offence he appeared on the scaffold with a gag in his mouth. Two young students were punished for "Lutheran acts," in having copied into their album some anonymous verses, which contained either a eulogium or a satire on Luther, according to the manner in which they were read.

Gasper be Benavides, alcayde, or head jailer, of the inquisition at Seville, was convicted of a course of malversation in his office. There was no species of oppression which this miscreant had not committed in his treatment of the prisoners, before a riot excited by his insufferable cruelties led to a discovery of his guilt. He was merely declared "to have failed in zeal and attention to his charge," and condemned to lose his situation, to appear in the auto with a torch in his hand, and be banished from Seville. Compare this sentence with the punishments inflicted on those who were the means of bringing his knavery to light. For conspiring against him, and inflicting a wound on one of his assistants which proved mortal, Melchior del Salto was burnt alive. A mulatto of fourteen years of age, named Luis, suspected of being an accomplice in the riot, received two hundred lashes, and was condemned to hard labour in the galleys for life; while Maria Gonzalez and Pedro Herrera, servants to the alcayde, were sentenced to the same number of lashes, and confinement in the galleys for ten years, merely because they had treated the prisoners with kindness, and permitted such of them as were relations to see one another occasionally for a few minutes.*

The treatment of one individual, who was pronounced innocent in this auto-de-fe, affords more damning evidence against the inquisitors than that of any whom they devoted quick to the flames. Dona Juana de Bohorques was a daughter of Don Pedro Garcia de Xeres y Bohorques, and the wife of Don Francisco de Vargas, baron of Higuera. She had been apprehended in consequence of a confession extorted by the rack from her sister Maria de Bohorques, who owned that she had conversed with her on the Lutheran tenets, without exciting any marks of disapprobation. Being six months gone in pregnancy, Dona Juana was permitted to occupy one of the public prisons until the time of her delivery; but eight days after that event the child was taken from her, and she was thrust into a secret cell. A young female, who was afterwards brought to the stake as a Lutheran, was confined along with her, and did every thing in her power to promote her recovery. Dona Juana had soon an opportunity of repaying the kind attentions of her fellow-prisoner, who, having been called before the inquisitors, was brought back into her dungeon faint and mangled. Scarcely had the latter acquired sufficient strength to rise from her bed of flags, when Dona Juana was conducted in her turn to the place of torture. Refusing to confess, she was put into the engine del burro, which was applied with such violence, that the cords penetrated to the bone of her arms and legs; and some of the internal vessels being burst, the blood flowed in streams from her mouth and nostrils. She was conveyed to her cell in a state of insensibility, and expired in the course of a few days. The inquisitors would fain have concealed the cause of her death, but it was impossible; and they thought to expiate the crime of this execrable murder, in the eyes of men at least, by pronouncing Juana de Bohorques innocent on the day of the auto-de-fe, vindicating her reputation, and restoring her property to her heirs. "Under what an overwhelming responsibility (exclaims one of their countrymen) must these cannibals appear one day before the tribunal of the Deity!" But may we not hesitate in deciding the question, Whose was the greatest responsibility? that of the cannibals or of those who permitted them thus to gorge themselves with human blood? Surely the spirit of chivalry had fled from the breasts of the Spanish nobility, else they never would have suffered their wives and daughters to be abused in this manner by an ignoble junto of priests and friars, supported by a monarch equally base unprincipled.

Having discharged the painful task of describing the four great autos in Valladolid and Seville, it may be proper, before proceeding with the narrative of the extermination of the protestants, to advert to the severe measures adopted against certain dignified ecclesiastics who fell under the suspicion of favouring heresy.

We have had occasion repeatedly to mention the name, and allude to the trial of Bartolomé de Carranza y Miranda, archbishop of Toledo. After sitting in the council of Trent, and accompanying Philip II. to England, where he took an active part in the examination of the protestants who were led to the stake, this learned man was rewarded in 1558 with the primacy; but he had not been many months in his diocese when he was denounced to the Inquisition and thrown into prison at Valladolid. Some historians have ascribed his prosecution entirely to the envy and personal hatred of his brethren, particularly Melchior Cano, bishop of the Canaries, and the inquisitor general Valdes. It is unquestionable that the proceedings were exasperated by such base motives; but there were grounds of jealousy, distinct from these, which operated against the primate. Several of the leading persons among the Spanish protestants had received their education under Carranza, who continued to maintain a friendly correspondence with them, and, though he signified his disapprobation of their sentiments in private, did not give information against them to the Holy Office. His theological ideas were more enlarged than those of his brethren, and he appears to have agreed with the reformers on justification and several collateral points of doctrine. In these respects his mode of thinking resembled that of Marco Antonio Flaminio, cardinals Pole and Morone, and other learned Italians. Indeed his intimacy with these distinguished individuals formed part of the evidence adduced against him. His Catechism, which was made the primary article of charge against him, besides its presumed leaning on some points to Lutheranism, was offensive to the Inquisition, because it was published in the vulgar tongue, and inculcated the doctrines of the Bible more than the traditions of the church. At the end of seven years the cause was transferred to Rome, whither the primate was conveyed; and after various intrigues and delays, pope Gregory XIII. pronounced a definitive sentence on the 14th of April 1576, finding Carranza violently suspected of heresy, confirming the prohibition of his Catechism, and ordaining him to abjure sixteen Lutheran propositions, and to be suspended for five years from the exercise of his archiepiscopal functions. The sentence had scarcely passed when the primate sickened and died, having been eighteen years under process and in a state of confinement.

The prosecution of the primate gave rise to others. Eight bishops, the most of whom had assisted at the council of Trent, and twenty-five doctors of theology, including the men of greatest learning in Spain, were denounced to the Holy Office; and few of them escaped without making some humiliating acknowledgment or retractation. Mancio de Corpus Christi, professor of theology at Alcala, had given a favourable opinion of the Catechism of Carranza, to which he had procured the subscriptions of the divines of his university; but hearing that a prosecution was commenced against him, he saved himself from being thrown into the secret prisons by transmitting to the inquisitors another opinion, in which he condemned three hundred and thirty-one propositions in the works of that prelate, whom he had a little before pronounced most orthodox. Luis de la Cruz, a favourite disciple of Carranza, was thrown into the secret prisons, in consequence of certain papers of his master being found in his possession, and the intercourse which he had held with Doctor Cazalla and other reformers. Confinement and anxiety produced a tendency of blood to his head, accompanied with fits of delirium, which rendered it necessary, for the preservation of his life, to remove him to the episcopal prison. Notwithstanding this and the failure of the proof brought against him, La Cruz was kept in confinement for five years, in the hopes that he would purchase his liberty by blasting the reputation and betraying the life of his patron. Before Carranza was formally accused, the inquisitors had extracted a number of propositions from his catechism, and without naming the author, submitted them to the judgment of Juan de Pegna, professor at Salamanca, who pronounced them all catholic, or at least susceptible of a good sense. After the primate was laid under arrest, De Pegna became alarmed, and sent an apology to the Holy Office, in which he acknowledged himself guilty of concealing the favourable opinion which Carranza had entertained of Don Carlos de Seso. This did not pacify the holy fathers, who condemned him to undergo different penances for his faults, among which they reckoned the following: that he did not censure the proposition, "that we cannot say that a person falls from a state of grace by committing a mortal sin;" and that he had given it as his private opinion, "that even although the primate was a heretic, the Holy Office should wink at the fact, lest the Lutherans of Germany should canonize him as a martyr, as they had done others who had been punished."

In the mean time the prosecution against the Lutherans in Valladolid and Seville had not relaxed. Every means was used to excite the popular odium against them. The abominable calumnies propagated by the pagans of Rome against the primitive Christians were revived; and it was believed by the credulous vulgar, that the protestants, in their nightly assemblies, extinguished the candles, and abandoned themselves to the grossest vices. On the feast of St. Matthew, in the year 1561, a destructive fire broke out at Valladolid, which consumed upwards of four hundred houses, including some of the richest manufactories and stores in the city. This was ascribed to a conspiracy of the Lutherans; and every year afterwards, on the day of St. Matthew, the inhabitants observed a solemn procession, accompanied with prayers to our Lord, through the intervention of his holy apostle, to preserve them from this plague and calamity. In the course of the same year, the pope sent to Spain a bull, authorizing a jubilee, with plenary indulgences. Among other things, it gave authority to confessors to absolve those who had involved themselves in the Lutheran heresy, upon their professing sorrow for their errors. Though the object of the court of Rome was to amass money, this measure tended to mitigate the persecution which had raged for some years; but the inquisitors, determined that their prey should not escape them, prohibited the bull from being published within the kingdom.

* Montanus, p. 108–114. Llorente, ii. 289, 291–293. Herrera, at the earnest request of a mother and her daughter, who were confined in separate cells, had humanely permitted them to converse together for half an hour. On their being summoned soon after to the torture-room, he became alarmed lest they should mention this indulgence, and going to the inquisitors confessed what he had done. He was instantly ordered into close confinement, which, together with the grief which he conceived, brought on mental derangement. Having recovered, he appeared in the auto with a rope about his neck. Being led out next day to be publicly whipped, he was seized with a fit of insanity, and throwing himself from the ass on which he was borne, wrested a sword from the attending alguazil, and would have killed him, had not the crowd interposed. For this offence, four years were added to his confinement in the galleys. "The holy fathers (says the historian who relates these facts) will not permit people even to be insane with impunity. (Montanus, p. 111.)

The four autos-de-fe which we have already described, although the most celebrated, were not the only spectacles at which the protestants suffered in Valladolid and Seville. It required many years to empty their prisons, from which adherents to the reformed faith continued, at short intervals, to be brought out to the scaffold and to the stake. On the 10th of July 1563, a public auto was celebrated in Seville, at which six persons were committed to the flames as Lutherans. Domingo de Guzman appeared among the penitents on this occasion. The hope of an archbishopric had been held out to induce him to recant; and his brother, the duke of Medina Sidonia, exerted himself to procure his release, upon undergoing such a slight penance as would not interfere with his future prospects. But the inquisitors were resolved to prevent the advancement of one who had embraced the reformed tenets; and after causing his books, which exceeded a thousand volumes, to be burnt before his eyes, they condemned him to perpetual imprisonment.

An occurrence which took place at Seville in 1564, diverted for a little the attention of the public, and even of the inquisitors, from the adherents of the reformed doctrine. In consequence of complaints that the confessional was abused to lewd purposes, edicts were repeatedly procured from Rome to correct the evil. Several scandalous discoveries having been made by private investigation, and the public clamour increasing, the inquisition of Seville came to a resolution, of which they had reason to repent, that an edict of denunciation should be published in all the churches of the province, requiring, under a severe penalty, those who had been solicited by priests in the confessional to criminal intercourse, or who knew of this having been done, to give information to the Holy Office within thirty days. In consequence of this intimation, such numbers flocked to the Triana, that the inquisitors were forced once and again to prolong the period of denunciation, until it extended to a hundred and twenty days. Among the informers were women of illustrious birth and excellent character, who repaired to the inquisitors with their veils, and under disguise, for fear of being met and recognized by their husbands. The priests were thrown into the greatest alarm;* the peace of families was broken; and the whole city rang with scandal. At last, the council of the Supreme, perceiving the odium which it brought on the church, and its tendency to prejudice the people against auricular confession, interposed their authority, by quashing the investigation, and prohibiting the edict of denunciation from being repeated.†

Valladolid and Seville were not the only cities whose prisons were crowded with the friends to the reformed doctrine. From 1560 to 1570, one public auto-de-fe at least was celebrated annually in all the twelve cities in which provincial tribunals of the Inquisition were then established; and at each of these, adherents to the new faith made their appearance. On the 8th of September 1560, the inquisition of Murcia solemnized an auto, at which five persons were sentenced to different punishments for embracing Lutheranism; and three years after, eleven appeared as penitents in that city on the same charge. It was in the last-mentioned auto, that a son of the emperor of Morocco, who had submitted to baptism in his youth, was brought on the scaffold for relapsing to Mahometanism, and was condemned to confinement for three years, and to banishment from the kingdoms of Valencia, Aragon, Murcia, and Granada. On the 25th February 1560, the inquisition of Toledo prepared a grand auto-de-fe for the entertainment of their young queen, Elizabeth de Valois, the daughter of Henry II. of France. To render it the more solemn, a general assembly of the cortes of the kingdom was held there at the same time, to take the oath of fidelity to Don Carlos, the heir apparent to the throne. Several Lutherans appeared among those who were condemned to the flames and to other punishments. On this occasion the duke of Brunswick delivered up one of his retinue to the flames, to testify his hatred of the reformed cause, and to strike terror into the minds of the Germans, Flemings, and French, who were present and were greatly suspected of heresy. At the same place in the subsequent year, four priests, Spanish and French, were burnt alive for Lutheranism, and nineteen persons of the same persuasion were reconciled. Among the latter was one of the royal pages, whose release was granted by Philip and Valdes, at the intercession of the queen. In 1565, the same inquisition celebrated another auto, at which a number of protestants were condemned to the fire and to penances, under the several designations of Lutherans, faithful, and huguenaos, or hugonots. The metropolitan city of Spain was so eager to signalize its zeal against heresy, that in 1571, not to mention other examples, an auto was held in it, at which two persons were burnt alive, and one in effigy, while no fewer than thirty-one were sentenced to different punishments, as Lutherans. One of the two who perished in the flames was Doctor Sigismond Archel, a native of Cagliari in Sardinia. He had been arrested at Madrid in 1562, and after suffering for many years in the prisons of Toledo, had contrived to make his escape; but his portrait having been sent to the principal passes of the frontier, he was seized before he got out of the kingdom, and delivered again into the hands of his judges. When the depositions of the witnesses were communicated to him, Sigismond acknowledged all that was laid to his charge, but pleaded that so far from being a heretic he was a better catholic than the papists; in proof of which he read, to the great mortification of the court, a long apology which he had composed in prison. He derided the ignorance of the priests who were sent to convert him, in consequence of which he was condemned to wear the gag on the scaffold and at the stake; and the guards, envying him the glory of a protracted martyrdom, pierced his body with their lances, while the executioners were kindling the pile, so that he perished at the same time by fire and sword. Though the greater part of the prisoners exhibited in the autos-de-fe of Granada and Valencia were Jews or Mahometans, yet protestants suffered along with them from time to time; among whom our attention is particularly fixed upon Don Miguel de Vera y Santangel, a Carthusian monk of Portaceli, as belonging to the convent in which the first translation of the Bible into the Spanish language was composed.

None of the provincial tribunals was so much occupied in suppressing the Reformation as those of Logrono, Saragossa, and Barcelona. In the numerous autos celebrated in these cities, a great part of those who appeared on the scaffolds were protestants. But the chief employment of the inquisitors in the eastern provinces consisted in searching for and seizing heretical books, which were introduced from the frontiers of France or by sea. In 1568 the council of the Supreme addressed letters to them, communicating alarming information received from England and France. Don Diego de Guzman, the Spanish ambassador at London, had written

* "On the other side it was a joly sport to see the monkes and friers and priestes go up and downe hanging downe theyr heads, all in dumpe and a melancholy, by meanes of theyr guilty consciences, quaking and trembling, and looking every hower when some of the familiars should take them by the sleve, and call them coram for these matters. In so much that a number feared lest as great a plague were come among them as the persecution that was so hote about that time against the Lutherans." (Skinner's translation of Montanus, sig. R. iij.)

† Montanus, p. 104–188. Llorente does not deny the facts stated by the protestant historian, but contents himself with saying that he has mistaken the year 1563 for 1564, and that "the denunciations were much fewer than he pretends." (Tom. iii. p. 29.) The documents which enabled the ex-secretary of the Inquisition to correct the exaggeration, must have put it in his power to state the exact number. There is reason in what he says on this subject, that while in some instances the priests were guilty, in others they might be falsely accused from malice or from mistake on the part of the penitents; but did it not occur to him, that, on either supposition, auricular confession and the celibacy of the clergy are calculated to have the most pernicious influence on public morals?

that the English were boasting of the converts which their doctrine was making in Spain, and particularly in Navarre. At the same time advertisement was given by the ambassador at Vienne, that the Calvinits of France were felicitating themselves on the signing of the treaty of peace between the French and Spanish monarchs, and entertained hopes that their religion would make as great progress in Spain as it had done in Flanders, England and other countries, because the Spaniards, who had already embraced it secretly, would now have an easy communication through Aragon with the protestants of Bearn. From Castres and from Paris the inquisitor general had received certain information that large quantities of books, in the Castilian tongue, were destined for Spain. These were in some instances put into casks of Champagne and Burgundy wine, with such address that they passed through the hands of the custom-house officers without detection. In this way many copies of the Spanish Bible, published by Cassiodoro de Reyna at Basle in 1569, made their way into Spain, notwithstanding the severest denunciations of the Holy Office, and the utmost vigilance of the familiars.

But the Inquisition was not satisfied with preventing heretical men and books from coming into Spain; it exerted itself with equal zeal in preventing orthodox horses from being exported out of the kingdom. Incredible or ludicrous as this may appear to the reader, nothing can be more unquestionable than the fact, and nothing demonstrates more decidedly the unprincipled character of the inquisitors, as well as of those who had recourse to its agency to promote their political schemes. As early as the fourteenth century it had been declared illegal to transport horses from Spain to France. This prohibition originated entirely in views of political economy, and it was the business of the officers of the customs to prevent the contraband trade. But on occasion of the wars which arose between the papists and hugonots of France, and the increase of the latter on the Spanish borders, it occurred to Philip, as an excellent expedient for putting down the prohibited commerce, to commit the task to the inquisition, whose services would be more effective than those of a hundred thousand frontier guards. With this view he procured a bull from the pope, which, with a special reference to the hugonots of France, and the inhabitants of Bearn in particular, declared all to be suspected of heresy who should furnish arms, munitions, or other instruments of war to heretics. In consequence of this, the council of the Supreme in 1596 added to the annual edict of denunciation a clause obliging all, under the pain of excommunication, to inform against any who had bought or transported horses for the use of the French protestants; which was afterwards extended to all who sent them across the Pyrenees. For this offence numbers were fined, whipped, and condemned to the galleys, by the inquisitorial tribunals on the frontiers. Always bent on extending their jurisdiction, the inquisitors sought to bring under their cognizance all questions respecting the contraband trade in saltpetre, sulphur, and powder. Philip, however, diverted their attention from this encroachment on the civil administration, by engaging them in the pursuit of royal game. Ferdinand the catholic, availing himself of favourable circumstances, had added the greater part of the kingdom of Navarre to his dominions; and Charles V., in a fit of devotion, had, by his testament, enjoined his son to examine the claim which the Spanish monarchy had to these territories, and, if it should be found invalid, to restore them to the original proprietor. So far from doing this act of justice, Philip intended to annex the whole of that kingdom to his crown. At his instigation pope Pius IV. in 1563 issued a bull, excommunicating Jeanne d'Albret, the hereditary queen of Navarre, and offering her dominions to the first catholic prince who should undertake to clear them of heresy. With characteristic duplicity Philip professed to the French court his disapprobation of the step taken by his holiness, while, in concert with the inquisitor general Espinosa and the house of Guise, he was concerting measures to seize the person of the queen of Navarre, and of her son, afterwards Henry IV. of France, with the view of carrying them by force into Spain, and delivering them to the Inquisition. This disgraceful conspiracy, formed in 1565, was defeated only by the sudden illness of the officer to whom its execution had been intrusted.

The public is not unacquainted with the cruelties perpetrated by the inquisition of Goa, within the settlements of the Portuguese in the East Indies. Similar atrocities were committed by the Spaniards in the New World, in which the tribunal of the Inquisition was erected at Mexico, Lima, and Carthagena. At Mexico, in the year 1574, an Englishman and a Frenchman were burnt alive as impenitent Lutherans, while others were subjected to penances for embracing the opinions of Luther and Calvin. In the close of the seventeenth century, Louis Rame, a French protestant, was detained as a prisoner for four years by the inquisitors of Mexico; and several natives of England and its colonies were forced to abjure their religion, and submit to rebaptization. A splendid auto-de-fe was celebrated at the same place in 1659, at which William Lamport, an Irishman, was condemned to the flames, "for being infected with the errors of Luther, Calvin, Pelagius, Wicliff, and John Huss; in a word, because he was guilty of all imaginable heresies." He was the author of two writings, in one of which, to use the language of his indictment, "things were said against the Holy Office, its erection, style, mode of process, &c. in such a manner, that in the whole of it not a word was to be found that was not deserving of reprehension, not only as being injurious, but also insulting to our holy catholic faith." Of the other writing the procurator fiscal says, "that it contained detestable bitterness of language, and contumelies so filled with poison, as to manifest the heretical spirit of the author, and his bitter hatred against the Holy Office." On the day of execution, being desirous of testifying the readiness with which he met death, he was no sooner seated at the foot of the stake, and his neck placed in the ring, than he let himself fall and broke his neck. According to the official report of the auto-de-fe, Lamport trusted "that the devil, his familiar, would relieve him," and as he walked through the streets to the place of execution, continued looking up to the clouds to see if the superior power he expected was coming; but finding all his hopes vain, he strangled himself.

The year 1570 may be fixed upon as the period of the suppression of the reformed religion in Spain. After that date, protestants were still discovered at intervals by the Inquisition, and brought out in the autos-de-fe; but they were "as the gleaning grapes when the vintage is done." Several of these were foreigners, and especially Englishmen. The punishment of Burton and others produced remonstrances from foreign powers, which were long disregarded by the Spanish government. All that Mann, the English ambassador at the court of Madrid, could obtain, was a personal protection on the head of religion, while those of his retinue were compelled to go to mass; and having caused the English service to be performed in his house, he was for some time excluded from the court, and obliged to quit Madrid. The circumstances in which Elizabeth was then placed, obliged her to act cautiously; but she wrote to Mann, desiring him to remonstrate with his catholic majesty against treatment so dishonourable to her crown, and so opposite to that which the Spanish ambassador received at London; and intimating that she would recall him, unless the privilege of private worship, according to the rites of their country, were granted to his servants.

At a subsequent period, the injury done to commerce by persecution obliged the government to issue orders, that strangers visiting Spain for the purpose of trade should not be molested on account of their religion. The inquisitors, however, made no scruple of transgressing the ordinances of the court on this point, by proceeding from time to time against foreigners, under the pretext that they propagated heresy by books or conversation. Among many others, William Lithgow, the well-known traveller, was in 1620 imprisoned and put to the torture at Malaga; and in 1714 Isaac Martin was subjected to the same treatment at Granada.

Of fifty-seven persons, whose sentences were read at an auto held in Cuenca in 1654, one only was charged with Lutheranism. In 1680, an auto-de-fe was celebrated at Madrid, in honour of the marriage of the Spanish monarch, Don Carlos II., to Maria Louise de Bourbon, the niece of Louis XIV. of France; and as a proof of the taste of the nation, a minute account of the whole procedure on that occasion was published to the world, with the approbation of all the authorities, civil and ecclesiastical. Among a hundred and eighteen victims produced on the scaffold, we meet with the name of only one protestant, whose effigy and bones were given to the flames. This was Marcos de Segura, a native of Villa de Ubrique, in Granada, whose sentence bears, that he had formerly been 'reconciled' by the inquisition of Llerena, as a heretic who denied purgatory, but who, having relapsed into this and other errors, was again thrown into prison, where he died in a state of impenitence and contumacy.

Although upwards of sixteen hundred victims were burnt alive in the course of the eighteenth century, we do not perceive that any of them were protestants.* But the reformed faith can number among its confessors a Spaniard who suffered in the nineteenth century. Don Miguel Juan Antonio Solano, a native of Verdun in Aragon, was vicar of Esco in the diocese of Jaca. He was educated according to the Aristotelian system of philosophy and scholastic divinity; but the natural strength of his mind enabled him to throw off his early prejudices, and he made great proficiency in mathematics and mechanics. His benevolence led him to employ his inventive powers for the benefit of his parishioners, by improving their implements of husbandry, and fertilizing their soil. A long and severe illness, which made him a cripple for life, withdrew the good vicar of Esco from active pursuits, and induced him to apply himself to theological studies more closely than he had hitherto done. His small library happened to contain a Bible; and by perusing this with impartiality and attention, he gradually formed for himself a system of doctrine, which agreed in the main with the leading doctrines of the protestant churches. The candid and honourable mind of Solano would not permit him either to conceal his sentiments, or to disseminate them covertly among his people. Having drawn up a statement of his new views, he laid it before the bishop of the diocese for his judgment, and receiving no answer from him, submitted it to the theological faculty in the university of Saragossa. The consequence was, that he was seized and thrown into the prison of the holy tribunal at Saragossa, which, in the infirm state of his health, was the same as sending him to the grave. He contrived, however, by the assistance of some kind friends, to make his escape, and to reach Oleron, the nearest French town; but after seriously deliberating on the course which he should pursue, he came to the resolution of asserting the truth in the very face of death, and actually returned of his own accord to the inquisitorial prison. On appearing before the tribunal, he acknowledged the opinions laid to his charge, but pleaded in his defence, that after long meditation, with the most sincere desire to discover the truth, and without any other help than the Bible, he had come to these conclusions. He avowed his conviction, that all saving truth was contained in the holy scriptures; that whatever the church of Rome had decreed to the contrary, by departing from the proper and literal sense of the sacred text, was false; that the idea of a purgatory and limbus patrum was a mere human invention; that it was a sin to receive money for saying mass; that tithes were fraudulently introduced into the Christian church by the priests; that the exaction of them was as dishonourable on their part, as it was impolitic and injurious to the cultivators of the soil; and that the ministers of religion should be paid by the state for their labours, in the same manner as the judges were. The tribunal, after going through the ordinary forms, decided that Solano should be delivered over to the secular arm. The inquisitor general at that time was Arce, archbishop of Saragossa, the intimate friend of the Prince of Peace, and suspected of secret infidelity. Averse to the idea of an execution by fire during his administration, he prevailed on the council of the Supreme to order a fresh examination of the witnesses. This was carried into execution, and the inquisitors renewed their former sentence. Arce next ordered an inquiry into the mental sanity of the prisoner. A physician was found to give an opinion favourable to the known wishes of the grand inquisitor; but the sole ground on which it rested was, that the prisoner had vented opinions different from those of his brethren. The only thing that remained was, to endeavour to persuade Solano to retract those opinions which had been condemned by so many popes and general councils. But this attempt was altogether fruitless. To all the arguments drawn from such topics, he replied, that money was the god worshipped at Rome, and that, in all the councils which had been held of late, the papal influence had decided theological questions, and rendered useless the good intentions of some respectable men. In the mean time, his confinement brought on a fever, during which the inquisitors redoubled their efforts for his conversion. He expressed himself thankful for their attention, but told them, that he could not retract his sentiments without offending God and betraying the truth. On the twentieth day of his sickness, the physician informed him of his danger, and exhorted him to avail himself of the few moments which remained. "I am in the hands of God," said Solano, "and have nothing more to do." Thus died, in 1805, the vicar of Esco. He was refused ecclesiastical sepulture, and his body was privately interred within the enclosure of the Inquisition, near the back gate, towards the Ebro. His death was reported to the council of the Supreme, who stopped further proceedings, to avoid the necessity of burning him in effigy.

Such are the details of the unsuccessful, but interesting, attempt to reform religion in Spain during the sixteenth century. Melancholy as the results were, they present nothing which reflects discredit on the cause, or on those by whom it was espoused. It did not miscarry through the imprudence or the infidelity of its leading friends. On the contrary, we have met with examples of the power of religion, of enlightened and pure love to truth, and of invincible fortitude, combined with meekness, scarcely inferior to any which are to be found in the annals of Christianity. To fall by such weapons as we have described, can be disgraceful to no cause. The fate of the Reformation in Spain, as well as in Italy, teaches us not to form hasty and rash conclusions respecting a course of proceedings on which Providence, for inscrutable reasons, may sometimes be pleased to frown.* The common maxim, that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church," was remarkably verified in the primitive ages of Christianity; but we must distinguish what is effected by the special interposition and extraordinary blessing of heaven, from what will happen according to the ordinary course of events. In the nature of things, it cannot but operate as a great, and with multitudes as an insuperable, obstacle to the reception of the truth, that, in following the dictates of their conscience, they must expose themselves to every species of worldly evil; and persecution may be carried to such a pitch as will, without a miracle, crush the best of causes; for, though it cannot eradicate the truth from the minds of those by whom it has been cordially embraced, it may cut off all the ordinary means of communication by which it is propagated. Accordingly history shows that true religion has been not only excluded, but banished, for ages from extensive regions of the globe, by oppressive laws and a tyrannical administration.

But we are not on this account to conclude that the Spanish martyrs threw away their lives, and spilt their blood in vain. They offered to God a sacrifice of a sweet-smelling

* The last person who was committed to the flames, was a beata, burnt alive at Seville, on the 7th of November 1781. (Llorente, iv. 270.) "I myself (says Mr. Blanco White) saw the pile on which the last victim was sacrificed to human infallibility. It was an unhappy woman, whom the inquisition of Seville committed to the flames, under the charge of heresy, about forty years ago. She perished on a spot where thousands had met the same fate. I lament from my heart, that the structure which supported their melting limbs was destroyed during the late convulsions. It should have been preserved, with the infallible and immutable canon of the Council of Trent over it, for the detestation of future ages." (Practical and Internal Evidence against Catholicism, p. 122—3.)

* The following words of a writer, whose knowledge of facts was not equal to his strong natural sense, express an opinion which is now not uncommon: "I believe it will be found, that when Christians have resorted to the sword, in order to resist persecution for the gospel's sake, as did the Albigenses, the Bohemians, the French Protestants, and some others, within the last 600 years, the issue has commonly been, that they have perished by it, that is, they have been overcome by their enemies, and exterminated; whereas, in cases where their only weapons have been 'the blood of the Lamb, and the word of their testimony, loving not their lives unto death,' they have overcome." (Christian Patriotism, by Andrew Fuller.) The facts which have been laid before the reader will enable him to judge of the truth of the last part of this assertion. Nor is the first part less incorrect and objectionable. The truth is, that the Albigenses, &c. who resisted, were not exterminated; while the Italian and Spanish protestants, who did not resist, met with that fate. If the defensive wars of the Albigenses, &c. were unsuccessful, it ought to be remembered that those of the protestants in Germany, Switzerland, Scotland, and the Low Countries, were crowned with success. The French protestants were suppressed, not when they had arms in their hands, but when they were living peaceably under the protection of the public faith, pledged to them in edicts which had been repeatedly and solemnly ratified. It is to be hoped that the public mind in Britain, much as has been done to mislead it, is not yet prepared for adopting principles which lead to a condemnation of the famous Waldenses and Bohemians, for standing to the defence of their lives, when proscribed and violently attacked on account of their religion. They lived during the period of Antichrist's power, and, according to the adorable plan of providence, were allowed to fall a sacrifice to his rage; but while the scriptures foretell this, they mention it to their honour, and not in the way of fixing blame on them. "It was given unto the beast to make war with the saints, and to overcome them." Instead of being ranked with those who perished in consequence of their having taken the sword without a just reason, these Christian patriots deserve rather to be numbered with those who "through faith waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens, and others were slain with the sword," all of whom, "having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promises, God having provided some better thing for us."

savour. Their blood is precious in his sight; he has avenged it, and may yet more signally avenge it. They left their testimony for truth in a country where it had been eminently opposed and outraged. That testimony has not altogether perished. Who knows what effects the record of what they dared and suffered may yet, through the divine blessing, produce upon that unhappy nation, which counted them as the filth and offscouring of all things, but was not worthy of them? Though hitherto lost on Spain, it has not been without all fruit elsewhere. The knowledge of the exertions made by Spaniards, and of the barbarous measures adopted to put them down, provoked many in other countries to throw off the Roman yoke, and to secure themselves against similar cruelties. In particular, it inspired their fellow-subjects in the Low Countries with a determination not to permit their soil to be polluted by the odious tribunal of the Inquisition, and consolidated that resistance which terminated in the establishment of civil liberty, in connexion with the reformed religion, in the United Provinces. While we bow with reverence to those providential arrangements which permitted the standard of truth to fall in one part of the world, we cannot but reflect with gratitude on the signal success vouchsafed to it in others. It was during the years 1559 and 1560 that the death-blow was given to the reformed religion in Spain; and during the same period the religious liberties of the protestants of Germany were finally secured, the reformed church was regularly organized in the kingdom of France, England was freed from popery by the accession of Elizabeth, and the cause of the Reformation, after struggling long for existence, attained to a happy and permanent establishment in Scotland.

CHAPTER VIII.

Protestant Exiles from Spain.

Those who have taken an interest in the preceding narrative, will feel a desire to know something of the fate of those Spaniards who escaped the horrors of the dungeon and the stake by abandoning their native country.

From the time that violent measures were first adopted to put down the new opinions, individuals who had incurred the suspicions of the clergy, or whose attachment to country yielded to their fears or to their passion for religious liberty, began to quit the Peninsula. As the persecution grew hotter, the emigration increased; nor had it altogether ceased at the close of the sixteenth century. Some of the emigrants crossed the Pyrenees, after which they sought out abodes in France and Switzerland; others, escaping by sea, took refuge in the Low Countries and in England.

Antwerp was the first place in which the refugees were formed into a church. The reformed opinions had been early introduced into this great mart of Europe, in consequence of the multitude of strangers who continually resorted to it, and the superior freedom which is enjoyed wherever commerce flourishes. It was to the merchants of Antwerp that the Spaniards were first indebted for the means of their illumination; and they continued long to promote the good work which they had begun, by encouraging translations of the scriptures and other books into the Spanish language. Antonio de Corran, or Corranus, a learned native of Seville, was pastor of the Spanish church in Antwerp before the year 1568, when that city fell into the hands of the duke of Alva, of sanguinary memory. After it recovered its liberty, the exiles returned to their former asylum, and enjoyed the pastoral labours of another native of Seville, Cassiodoro de Reyna, the translator of the Bible, who appears to have continued with them until 1585, when the city was again brought under the Spanish yoke, after a memorable siege by the duke of Parma. During his residence there, he drew up, for the use of his hearers, the Antwerp Catechism, which he published both in Spanish and French.

Previously to his settlement at Antwerp, De Reyna had resided at Strasburg, Frankfort, and other imperial cities, where he found a number of his countrymen, whom he would willingly have served as a preacher. But the German divines received him coldly, on account of his leaning to the sentiments of Calvin and the Swiss churches, on the subject of the eucharist. On this account he retired to Basle, and meeting with a kind reception in that seat of literature, he finished his translation of the Bible, which had been his chief employment for several years.

The Palatinate, and the dominions of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, opened a more hospitable retreat to the refugees than any other part of Germany. It was in Heidelberg that De Montes published that work which first laid open to the eyes of Europe the mysteries of the Spanish inquisition, and the sufferings which his protestant countrymen had endured from that inhuman tribunal; while a confession of faith in the name of the exiles from Spain, along with an account of their persecution, came from the press of Cassel.

France was happily in such a state as to offer a refuge to the Spanish protestants, when driven from their native country. Many of them repaired to the city of Lyons, where means of religious instruction had been provided for them, as well as for their brethren who had fled from Italy. The French protestants showed themselves uniformly disposed to sympathize with the Spanish refugees, contributed to their support, shared with them that degree of religious liberty which they happened at the time to enjoy, and admitted several of them to be pastors of their churches. It is gratifying to find the French synods also receiving into their communion Moors, who had escaped, along with the protestants, from the inquisition of Spain, and now abjured Mahometanism under circumstances which rendered their change of religion less obnoxious to suspicion.

But it was in Geneva and England that the greater part of Spanish refugees found a safe harbour and permanent abode. As they were intimately connected with the Italian refugees who settled in these places, we shall, according to a former promise, combine the affairs of both in the following narrative.

As early as 1542, there was formed at Geneva a congregation of Italian refugees, which had the chapel of the cardinal d'Ostie assigned to it by the council, and was under the pastoral inspection of Bernardino de Sesvaz. Its meetings were, however, discontinued after a short time, probably by the removal of some of its principal members; and they were not resumed until the year 1551.

The person to whom its revival was chiefly owing was Galeazzo Caraccioli, whose life presents incidents which would excite deep interest in a romance. He was the eldest son of Nicol-Antonio Caraccioli, marquis of Vico, one of the grandees of Naples. His mother was of the noble family of the Caraffi, and sister to the cardinal of that name who was raised to the pontifical chair. At the age of twenty, he married Vittoria, daughter to the duke of Nuceria, who brought him a large fortune, and bore him six children. The emperor Charles V., who was under obligations to the marquis, conferred on his son the office of gentleman-sewer; and the personal accomplishments of Galeazzo, the uniform correctness of his manners, his affability, and the talents which he discovered for public business, led all who knew him to anticipate his gradual and certain advancement in worldly honours. Serious impressions, accompanied with a conviction of the errors of the church of Rome, were made on his mind by Valdes and Martyr, at the time that the protestant tenets were secretly embraced by many individuals in Naples; and his religious dispositions were cherished by the advices of that pious and elegant scholar, Marc-Antonio Flaminio Having accompanied the emperor to Germany, his acquaintance with the reformed doctrine was enlarged by conversation with some of the leading protestants, and the perusal of their writings; and his attachment to it was confirmed by an interview which, on his way home, he had at Strasburg with Martyr, who had lately forsaken his native country for the sake of religion. After his return to Naples he endeavoured to prevail on such of his countrymen as held the same views with himself to meet together in private for their mutual edification; but he found that the severe measures lately resorted to had struck terror into their minds, and that they were resolved, not only to conceal their sentiments, but also to practise occasional conformation to the rites of the popish worship. He now entered into serious deliberation with himself on one of the most delicate and painful questions which can be forced on a person in his circumstances. What was he to do? Was he to spend his whole life in the midst of idolatry, in the way of concealing that faith which was dearer to his heart than life, and incurring the threatening, "Him that confessed me not before men, I will not confess before my Father and his angels?" Or, was it his duty to leave farther, and wife, and children, and houses, and lands, for Christ's sake and the gospel's? The sacrifice of his secular dignities and possessions did not cost him a sigh; but as often as he reflected on the distress which his departure would inflict on his aged father, who, with parental pride, regarded him as the heir of his titles, and the stay of his family,—on his wife whom he loved and by whom he was loved tenderly,—and on the dear pledges of their union, he was thrown into a state of unutterable anguish, and started back with horror from the resolution to which conscience had brought him. At length, by an heroic effort of zeal, which few can imitate, and many will condemn, he came to the determination of bursting the tenderest ties which perhaps ever bound man to country and kindred. His nearest relations, so far from being reconcilable to the idea of his abandoning the church of Rome, had signified their displeasure at the pious life which he had led for some years, and at his evident disrelish for the gaieties of the court. Having no hope of procuring their consent, he concealed his design from them, and, availing himself of the pretext of business which he had to transact with the emperor, set out for Augsburg, whence he speedily repaired to Geneva. The intelligence of his arrival at that place, and his abjuration of the Roman religion, while it filled the imperial court with astonishment, plunged his family into the deepest distress. One of his cousins, who had been his intimate friend, was despatched from Naples to represent the grief which his conduct had caused, and urge him to return. As soon as his refusal was known, sentence was passed against him, and he was deprived of all the property which he inherited from his mother. At the risk of his life, he went to Italy and met his father at Verona, where he remained until the marquis went to the emperor, and obtained, as a special favour, that the sentence pronounced against his son should not extend to his grandson. During his father's absence, Galeazzo was waited upon by the celebrated Fracastoro, who used his great eloquence to persuade him to comply with the wishes of his friends. In the following year he met his father a second time at Mantua, when an offer was made to him, in the name of his uncle, now pope Paul IV., that he should have a protection against the Inquisition, provided he would take up his residence within the Venetian states; a proposal to which neither his safety nor the dictates of his conscience would permit him to accede. All this time he had been refused the privilege of seeing his family; and it was not until the end of the year 1557 that he received a letter from his wife Vittoria, earnestly requesting an interview with him, and fixing the place of meeting. Having obtained a safe-conduct from the government of the Grisons, he immediately set out for Lesina, an island on the coast of Dalmatia, over against his paternal castle of Vico; but, on his arrival at the appointed place, Vittoria, instead of making her appearance, sent two of her sons to meet their father. He had scarcely returned to Geneva from this fatiguing and dangerous journey, when he received another packet from his wife, apologizing for her breach of engagement, and begging him to come without delay to the same place, where she would not fail to meet him, along with his father and children. On his reaching Lesina the second time, none of the family had arrived; and unable to brook further delay, he crossed the Gulf of Venice, and presented himself at his father's gate. He was received with every demonstration of joy, and for some days the castle was thronged with friends who came to welcome him. But it behoved the parties to come at last to an explanation. Taking Vittoria aside, Galeazzo apologized for not having imparted to her the secret of his departure, gave a full account of the reasons of his conduct, and begged her to accompany him to Geneva; promising that no constraint should be laid on her conscience, and that she should be at liberty to practise her religion under his roof. After many protestations of affection, she finally replied, that she could not reside out of Italy, nor in a place where any other religion than that of the church of Rome was professed; and further, that she could not live with him as her husband, so long as he was infected with heresy. Her confessor had inculcated upon her that it was a damnable sin te cohabit with a heretic, and dreading the influence which her husband might exert over her mind, had prevented her from keeping her first appointment. The day fixed for his departure being come, Galeazzo went to take leave of his father, who, laying aside the affection with which he had hitherto treated him, and giving way to his passion, loaded him with reproaches and curses. On quitting his father's apartment, he had to undergo a still severer trial of his sensibility. He found his wife and children, with a number of his friends, waiting for him in the hall. Bursting into tears, and embracing her husband, Vittoria besought him not to leave her a widow, and her babes fatherless. The children joined in the entreaties of their mother; and the eldest daughter, a fine girl of thirteen, grasping his knees, refused to part with him. How he disengaged himself, he knew not; for the first thing which brought him to recollection was the noise made by the sailors on reaching the opposite shore of the Gulf. He used often to relate to his intimate friends, that the parting scene continued long to haunt his mind; and that, not only in dreams, but also in reveries into which he fell during the day, he thought he heard the angry voice of his father, saw Vittoria in tears, and felt his daughter dragging at his heels. His return gave great joy to his friends at Geneva, who, in proportion to the confidence which they reposed in his constancy, were alarmed for the safety of his person.

Painful as this visit had been to his feelings, it contributed to restore his peace of mind, by convincing him that he could entertain no hope of enjoying the society of his family except on the condition of renouncing his religion. After he had remained nine years in exile, he consulted Calvin on the propriety of contracting a second marriage. That reformer, who took a deep interest in the character of his noble friend, felt great scruples as to the expediency of this step, but ultimately gave his approbation to it, after he had consulted the divines of Switzerland and the Grisons. Accordingly, the courts of Geneva having legally pronounced a sentence of divorce against Vittoria, on the ground of her obstinate refusal to live with her husband, he married Anne Fremejere, the widow of a French refugee from Rouen, with whom he continued to live happily in a state of dignified frugality. On being informed of this part of his conduct, we feel as if it detracted from the high unsullied virtue which Galeazzo had hitherto displayed. His second nuptials, though contracted according to the rules of the canon law, gave occasion of reproach to the keen adversaries of the Reformation; but they did not lower him in the estimation of his acquaintance of either religious persuasion. By the citizens of Geneva he was all along held in the highest respect; the freedom of the city had been conferred on him soon after his arrival among them; a house was allotted to him by the public; and he was admitted a member both of the great and small council. Princes, ambassadors, and learned men, popish as well as protestant, who visited the city, regularly paid their respects to the marquis; a title which was always given him, though he refused to assume it even after the death of his father. Nothing gave greater offence to the papal court, and the government of Naples, than his chosing the see of heresy for his residence. It was probably with the view of removing this prejudice, and thereby procuring remittances from his patrimonial estate, that he consented, in the spring of 1572, to a proposal made by Admiral Coligni to take up his abode with him; but providentially he was prevented from removing to France so soon as he had intended, and thus escaped the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which took place in August that year. After residing five years at Nion and Lausanne for the sake of economy in his living, he returned to Geneva, which he did not again leave until his death, which happened in 1586, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

The first thing which engaged the attention of Caraccioli, after his settlement in Geneva, was the re-organizing of the Italian congregation. Lattantio Ragnoni, a gentleman of Sienna, whom he had known at Naples, having arrived a few days after him, and given proofs of his orthodoxy and qualifications for public teaching, was persuaded by him to undertake the office of pastor to his countrymen. They accordingly recommenced their public exercises in the Magdalene church, which was assigned to them by the council. Caraccioli himself became one of their elders, and by the respectability of his character, and the wisdom of his counsels, contributed more than any other individual to the permanent prosperity of that church. In the close of the year 1553, they obtained a preacher of greater abilities in Celso Massimiliano, usually called Martinengo, because he was the son of a count of that name in the territories of Brescia. He had entered into the order of canons regular, and having imbibed the reformed doctrine from Peter Martyr, preached it for some time with great boldness and eloquence; but understanding that snares were laid for his life, he fled to the Valteline, whence he came to Basle, with the intention of proceeding to England. By the importunities of Caraccioli he was induced to abandon his intended journey, and to undertake the pastoral charge of the Italian church at Geneva. On his death in 1557, Calvin exerted himself to procure for them the services of Martyr and Zanchi, who excused themselves on account of their engagements; and the church appears to have remained under the sole inspection of Ragnoni until 1559, when they procured Nicola Balbani, who continued to serve them with much approbation nearly to the close of the sixteenth century. It would seem that this situation was also held by Jean Baptiste Rotan, a learned man, who, on removing to France, incurred the suspicion of seeking to betray the reformed church by reconciling it to Rome.

The peace of the Italian church was for some time disturbed by the antitrinitarian controversy. Alciati, a military officer from Milan, and blandrata, a phisician from Piedmont, in the visits which they made to Geneva, privately disseminated their sentiments, which were adopted by Valentinus Gentilis, a native of Cosenza in Calabria, who had joined the Italian congregation. The celebrated lawyer Gribaldo, after differing with Calvin, had taken up his residence at Fargias, a villa which he purchased in the neighbouring district of Gex, within the jurisdiction of Bern, from which he kept up an intercourse with the secret agitators in Geneva. They had caused great uneasiness to Martinengo, who, in recommending his church to the care of Calvin, when he was on his deathbed, adjured that reformer to guard them against the arts of these restless spirits. In concert with Ragnoni, their surviving pastor, Calvin exerted himself in allaying these dissensions, and, in 1558, drew up a confession of faith for the use of the Italian congregation. This was subscribed by Gentilis, under the pain of perjury if he should afterwards contradict it; but, encouraged by Gribaldo, he began again to spread the opinions which he had renounced, upon which a process was commenced against him, which issued in his expulsion from the city.

The internal peace of the Italian church being restored, it continued to flourish, and gained fresh accessions every year by the arrival of persons from the different parts of Italy. All classes in Geneva, the magistrates, the ministers, and the citizens, vied with each other in their kind attention to the exiles from Italy, who were admitted to privileges, and advanced to offices, in common with the native inhabitants of the city. Nor had the republic any reason to repent of this liberal policy. The adopted strangers transferred their loyalty and affections to Geneva; and among those who have served her most honourably in the senate, the academy, and the field, from that time to the present, we recognize with pleasure Italian refugees and their descendants. It is sufficient here to mention the names of Diodati, Turretini, Calandrini, Burlamaqui, Micheli, Minutoli, Butini, and Offredi.

Individual Spaniards, who found it necessary to fly from the Inquisition, had taken refuge in Geneva from the time that Egidio was thrown into prison at Seville. In 1557, additions were made to their number; and the persecution increasing during the two subsequent years, emigrants poured in from all parts of the Peninsula. The council extended to them the privileges which had been already granted to the emigrants from Italy. It was Juan Perez, to whom his countrymen were otherwise so much indebted, who first formed a Spanish church in Geneva. After his departure to France, they enjoyed the pastoral labours of De Reyna and others of their learned countrymen; but, as many of their members removed to England and other places, and as the most of them understood Italian, they adjoined themselves, before the close of the century, to the church which was placed under the charge of Balbani. One of the most distinguished of their number, both in point of learning and piety, was Pedro Gales. While he taught Greek and jurisprudence in Italy, he had fallen under the suspicion of heresy, and being put to the torture at Rome, lost one of his eyes. Escaping from prison, he came to Geneva about the year 1580, and was appointed joint professor of philosophy with Julio Paci, an Italian lawyer. During an interruption of the academical exercises caused by the attempts of the duke of Savoy on Geneva, Gales was persuaded to accept the rectorship of the college of Guienne at Bordeaux. But finding his situation unpleasant, in consequence of the civil wars which then raged in France, and the envy of one of his colleagues, he left it, with the intention of repairing to the Netherlands. On his journey he was seized by some of the partisans of the League, and delivered first to his countrymen, and afterwards to the Spanish Inquisition, by whose sentence he was committed to the flames, after making an undaunted profession of his faith. He had made a large collection of ancient manuscripts with annotations of his own, part of which was preserved, and has been highly prized by the learned.

England had the honour of opening a harbour to protestants of every country who fled from persecution at the beginning of the Reformation. The first congregation of strangers formed in London was the Dutch or German, which met in the church of Austin Friars, under the superintendence of the learned Polish nobleman John a Lasco. It was followed by the erection of French and Italian congregations. As early as 1551 there was an Italian church in London, of which Michael Angelo Florio was pastor. On its restoration after the death of queen Mary, Florio returned; but, owing to some irregularity of conduct, he was not admitted to his former place, which was conferred on Jeronimo Jerlito. The most distinguished of its members were Jacomo Contio, better known as an author by the name of Acontius, who was suspended for some time from communion, on suspicion of his being infected with Arian and Pelagian tenets; his friend Battista Castiglioni, who had a place at court, and taught Italian to queen Elizabeth; Julio Borgarusci, physician to the earl of Leicester; Camillo Cardoini, a Neapolitan nobleman, whose son was afterwards made governor of Calabria, as a reward for abjuring the protestant religion, and Albericus Gentilis, who became professor of civil law at Oxford. The foreign Italian congregation appears to have been united to the French in the course of the sixteenth century; but in 1618 the noted Antonio de Dominis, archbishop of Spalatro, preached in Italian at London, and had one of the family of Calandrini appointed as his colleague.

There had been Spaniards in England from the time of Henry the VIII., whose first queen belonged to that nation. Her daughter Mary entertained them about her person, and their number greatly increased after her marriage to Philip II. of Spain. As several of them were converted to protestantism, some writers are of opinion that they must have heard the gospel preached in their native tongue during the reign of Edward VI. But it does not appear that the Spanish protestants were formed into a congregation until the accession of Elizabeth. During the year 1559 they met for worship in a private house in London, and had one Cassiodo for their preacher. In the course of the following year they presented a petition to secretary Cecil and Grindal bishop of London, for liberty to meet in public. They had hitherto refrained, they said, from taking this step, by the advice of persons whom they greatly respected, and from fear of giving offence; but they were convinced that their continuing to do so was no less discreditable to the religion which they professed, than it was incommodious to themselves. Their adversaries took occasion to say, that they must surely harbour some monstrous tenets, detested even by Lutherans, when they were not permitted, or did not venture, to assemble publicly in a city where protestants from every country were allowed this privilege. Some of their countrymen had withdrawn from their assembly, and others had declined to join it, lest they should suffer in the trade which they carried on with Spain, from their attendance on a private and unauthorized conventicle. They added, that if the king of Spain complained of the liberty granted to them, they would desist from the exercise of it, and quit the kingdom rather than involve it in a quarrel with foreign states. The government was favourable to their application, and it would seem that they met soon after in one of the city churches, whose ministers, as stated in their petition, were willing to accommodate them. London was not the only place which furnished them with an asylum; but in other towns both they and the Italians generally assembled for worship along with the French emigrants. With the view of counteracting the invidious and unfounded reports circulated against their orthodoxy, the Spanish protestants in England drew up and published a confession of their faith, which was adopted by their brethren scattered in other countries. This document proves that the Spanish exiles, while they held the doctrines common to all protestants, were favourable to the views which the reformed churches maintained in their controversy with the Lutherans respecting the eucharist.

The countenance granted by the government of England to protestant exiles, and particularly to Spaniards, gave great offence to the pope and to the king of Spain. It was specified as one of the charges against Elizabeth, in the bull of Pius V. excommunicating that princess. This drew from bishop Jewel the following triumphant reply. Having mentioned that they had either lost or left behind them their all, goods, lands, and houses, he goes on to say: "Not for adultery, or theft, or treason, but for the profession of the gospel. It pleased God here to cast them on land. The queen, of her gracious pity, granted them harbour. Is it become a heinous thing to show mercy? God willed the children of Israel to love the stranger, because they were strangers in the land of Egypt. He that showeth mercy shall find mercy. But what was the number of such who came in unto us? Three or four thousand. Thanks be to God, this realm is able to receive them, if the number be greater. And why may not queen Elizabeth receive a few afflicted members of Christ, which are compelled to carry his cross? Whom, when he thought good to bring safely by the dangers of the sea, and to set in at our havens, should we cruelly have driven them back again, or drowned them, or hanged them, or starved them? Would the vicar of Christ give this counsel? Or, if a king receive such, and give them succour, must he therefore be deprived? They are our brethren; they live not idly. If they take houses of us, they pay rent for them; they hold not our grounds, but by making due recompence. They beg not in our streets, nor crave any thing at our hands, but to breathe our air, and to see our sun. They labour truly, they live sparefully; they are good examples of virtue, travail, faith, and patience. The towns in which they abide are happy, for God doth follow them with his blessings." Referring to the Spaniards who came to England in the reign of queen Mary, the bishop thus contrasts them with their protestant countrymen. "These are few, those were many; these are poor and miserable, those were lofty and proud; these are naked, those were armed; these are spoiled by others, those came to spoil us; these are driven from their country, those came to drive us from our country; these came to save their lives, those came to have our lives. If we were content to bear those then, let us not grieve now to bear these."

The Spanish monarch was not less indignant than his Holiness at the asylum granted to his protestant subjects. Not contented with persecuting them at home, he hunted them in every country to which they were driven. Large sums of money were appropriated to the maintaining of spies, and defraying other expenses incurred by that disgraceful traffic. In France and Germany, individuals were from time to time carried off, and delivered over to the Inquisition. Not daring to make such attempts on the free soil of England, the emissaries of Spain had recourse to methods equally infamous. They required the English government to deliver up the refugees as traitors and criminals who had fled from justice. Francisco Farias and Nicolas Molino, two respectable members of the Spanish congregation, who had resided eight years in this country, were denounced by one of their countrymen who acted as a spy in London. In consequence of this, the Spanish ambassador received instructions from his court to demand of Elizabeth, that they should be sent home to be tried for crimes which were laid to their charge; and to induce her to comply with the request, their names were coupled with that of a notorious malefactor who had lately escaped from Flanders. If these innocent men had not had friends at court who knew from experience to sympathize with the exile, they might have been delivered up to a cruel death. To enable it to meet any future demand of this kind, the English government adopted measures to obtain an exact account of all the members of the foreign congregations who had come from any part of the king of Spain's dominions.

In the year 1568, Corranus came from Antwerp, and undertook the pastoral charge of the Spanish congregation in London. Having been involved in a quarrel with Jerlito and Cousin, the ministers of the Italian and French congregations, who accused him of error and defamation, the parties appealed to Beza, who referred the controversy to bishop Grindal. The commissioners named by the bishop to try the cause suspended Corranus from preaching. He appears to have been a man of a hot temper; but his learning recommended him to secretary Cecil, by whose influence the suspension was taken off, and he was made reader of divinity in the Temple. When he went to Oxford at a subsequent period, some of the heads of colleges scrupled to receive him, on account of the suspicions formerly entertained as to his orthodoxy; but their objections were overcome, and he was admitted to read lectures on theology in the university, as well as to hold a living in the church of England. Though there is no evidence that Cypriano de Valera ever acted as a preacher in England, yet he took an active part in the affairs of the foreign churches. But his labours were chiefly by means of the press, in which respect he was more extensively beneficial to his countrymen than any of the exiles. He arrived in England soon after the accession of Elizabeth, and appears to have spent the remainder of his life chiefly in this country. After studying for some time at both universities, he devoted himself to the writing of original works in Spanish, and the translating of others into that language. The most of these were published in England, where also his translation of the Bible, though printed abroad, was prepared for the press. It would seem that the circulation of the last-mentioned work in Spain was much more extensive than we could have expected.

The influx of Spanish refugees into England ceased with the sixteenth century, though a solitary individual, who had found the means of illumination in his native country, flying from the awakened suspicions of the inquisitors, occasionally reached its hospitable shore after that period.

CHAPTER IX.

Effects which the Suppression of the Reformation produced on Spain.

Tyranny, while it subjects those against whom it is immediately directed to great sufferings, entails still greater misery on the willing instruments of its vengeance. Spain boasts of having extirpated the reformed opinions from her territory; but she has little reason to congratulate herself on the consequences of her blind and infatuated policy. She has paid, and is still paying, the forfeit of her folly and crimes, by the loss of civil and religious liberty, and by the degradation into which she has sunk among the nations.

Other causes, no doubt, contributed to produce this melancholy issue; but that it is to be traced chiefly to a corrupt religion, will appear from a general comparison of the condition of Spain with other European nations, and from an examination of her internal state.

It is a fact now admitted on all hands, that the Reformation has ameliorated the state of government and society in all the countries into which it was received. By exciting inquiry, and diffusing knowledge, it led to the discovery and correction of abuses; imposed a check, by public opinion, if not by statute, on the arbitrary will of princes; generated a spirit of liberty among the people; gave a higher tone to morals; and imparted a strong impulse to the human mind in the career of invention and improvement. These benefits have been felt to a certain degree in countries into which the reformed religion was only partially introduced, or whose inhabitants, from local situation and other causes, were brought into close contact with protestants. But while these nations were advancing with different degrees of rapidity in improvement,—acquiring free governments, cultivating literature and science, or extending their commerce and increasing their resources,—Spain, though possessed of equal or greater advantages, became stationary, and soon began to retrograde. It is impossible to account for this phenomenon from any peculiarity in her political condition at the middle of the sixteenth century. Italy was in very different circumstances in this respect, and yet we find the two countries nearly in the same condition, owing to their having pursued the same measures in regard to religion. On the other hand, the political state of France, at the era referred to, was very similar to that of Spain. The nobles had been stripped of their feudal power in both countries; the French parliaments had become as passive instruments in the hands of the sovereign as the Spanish cortes; and both kingdoms were equally exhausted by the wars which for more than half a century they had waged against one another. But the bulls of the Vatican had not the same free course in France as in the Peninsula. The Reformation deposited a seed in that country which all the violence and craft of Louis XIV., a despot as powerful as Philip II., could not eradicate; and though persecution drove from its soil thousands of its most industrious citizens, yet, as there was no Inquisition there, literature and the arts survived the shock. The consequence has been, that, after coming out of the storms of a revolution which long raged with most destructive fury, and being subjected to a military government of unparalleled strength, France still holds a place among the great powers of Europe, nor has she been entirely stripped of her liberties, though she has received back that family which formerly reigned over her with unlimited authority; while Spain, after being long subject to a branch of the same family, and participating of all the effects of the revolutionary period, is now lying prostrate and in chains at the feet of a despot and his ghostly ministers.

But the evils which Spain has brought upon herself, by her bigoted and intolerant zeal for the Roman Catholic religion, will appear in a more striking light from an examination of her internal state.

The unsuccessful attempt to reform religion in Spain led to the perpetuation of the tribunal of the Inquisition, not only by affording a pretext for arming it with new powers, but by increasing the influence which it already exerted over the public mind. It became the boast of that tribunal that it had extirpated the northern heresy, and henceforth all true Spaniards were taught to regard it as the palladium of their religion. This, if it did not entail the miseries of tyranny and ignorance in Spain, at least sealed the entail. To the superficial and egotistical philosophy, which is too often to be met with in the present day, we owe the discovery, that the Inquisition was no cause of the decline of the Spanish nation, inasmuch as it was merely the organ of the government. That the Spanish monarchs employed it as an engine of state, we have seen, and that it could not have tortured the bodies, or invaded the property of the subjects, without power conveyed to it by the state, is self-evident; but it is equally true that it was in itself a moral power, and exerted its authority over the minds of both princes and subjects. When Macanaz persuaded Philip V. to lay restraints on the transmission of money to Rome, his Holiness, by means of the Inquisition, not only drove the minister into exile, but forced his master to retract the law which he had passed, and, in a letter addressed to the council of the Supreme, to confess, that, led astray by evil counsel, he had rashly put his hand into the sanctuary. And to complete its triumph, the enlightened Macanaz, while in France, was induced to write a defence of the Holy Office, which is appealed to by its apologists in Spain to this day. When at a recent period the cortes wished to abolish that tribunal, they were made to feel that it had an existence independently of their authority, and a foundation deeper than that which mere laws had given it.

But civil and religious despotism are natural allies. Though the Inquisition exalted the power of the pope above that of the king, and its advocates have sometimes had recourse to the principles of civil liberty to vindicate the restraint and dethronement of princes who proved refractory to the church,* yet it all along yielded the most effective support to the arbitrary measures of the government, and exerted its influence in crushing every proposal to correct abuses in the state, and stifling the voice of complaint. Under other forms of despotism, actions, or the external manifestation of liberal opinions, have been visited with punishment; but in Spain every reflection on politics was denounced by the monks as damnable heresy, and proscribed in the sanctuary of conscience.

Ever since the suppression of the Reformation, it has been the great object of the inquisitors and ruling clergy to arrest the progress of knowledge. With this view they have exercised the most rigid and vigilant inspection of the press and the seminaries of education. Lists of prohibited books have been published from time to time, including vernacular translations of the Bible,† and the writings not only of the reformers, but also of Roman catholics, who discovered the slightest degree of liberality in their sentiments, or who treated their subjects in such a way as to encourage a spirit of inquiry. A commentary on the Pentateuch by Oleaster, a member of the council of Trent, and a Portuguese inquisitor, which had been several years in circulation, was ordered to be called in and corrected, because the author had ventured to depart from the Vulgate and the interpretations of the fathers. The commentaries of Jean Ferus, a French monk, who had availed himself of the learning of the protestants, were censured as containing "the heretical sentiments of Luther;" and for reprinting them in Spain, Michael de Medina, guardian of the Franciscans at Toledo, was thrown into the secret prisons of the Inquisition, and was saved from the disgrace of making a public recantation, only by a premature death. Arias Montanus was under the necessity of defending himself against the charges which the inquisitorial censors brought against his polyglot Bible, published under the patronage of Philip II. Luis de Leon, professor of divinity at Salamanca, having written a translation of the Song of Solomon in Spanish, to which he added short explanatory notes, was confined for five years in the dungeons of the Inquisition; and his poetical paraphrases of the book of Job and other parts of scripture, distinguished for their elegance and purity, were long suppressed.

The taste for theological studies, which had been produced by the revival of letters in Spain, survived for some time the suppression of the Reformation. It was cherished in secret by individuals, who, convinced that the protestants excelled in the interpretation of scripture, appropriated their writings in whole or in part, and published them as their own. The Latin Bible, with notes, by Leo Juda, and other Swiss divines, after undergoing certain corrections, was printed at Salamanca with the approbation of the censors of the press; but the real authors being discovered, it was subsequently put into the index of prohibited books. Hyperius, a reformed divine, was the author of an excellent book on the method of interpreting the scriptures. Having removed from it every thing which appeared to contradict the tenets of the church of Rome, Lorenzo de Villavicencio, an Augustinian monk of Xeres in Andalusia, published that work as his own, not even excepting the preface; and in consequence of the little intercourse which subsisted between Spain and the north of Europe, nearly half a century elapsed before the plagiarism was detected. Martini Martinez was less fortunate; for publishing a similar work, in which he exalted the originals above the Vulgate, he was subjected to penance, and prohibited from writing for the future. Precluded from every field of inquiry or discussion, the divines of Spain addicted themselves exclusively to the study of scholastic and casuistic theology.

The same tyranny was extended to other branches of science, even those which are most remotely connected with religion. All books on general subjects composed by protestants, or translated by them, or containing notes written by them, were strictly interdicted. A papal bull, dated 17 August 1627, took from metropolitans, patriarchs, and all but the inquisitor general, the privilege of reading prohibited books. Nicolas Antonio, the literary historian of Spain, was obliged to remain five years in Rome before he obtained this privilege, with the view of finding materials for his national work. The Pontifical History of Illescas was repeatedly suppressed, and the author constrained at last to put his name to a work containing statements and opinions dictated to him by others, and diametrically opposite to those which he had formerly given to the world. While the native historians of Spain were prevented from speaking the truth, histories written by foreigners were forbidden under the severest pains, as satires on the policy and religion of the Peninsula. The consequence has been, that the Spaniards entertain the most erroneous conceptions of their own history, and are profoundly ignorant of the affairs of other countries.

Not satisfied with exerting a rigid censorship over the press, the inquisitors intruded into private houses, ransacked the libraries of the learned and curious, and carried off and retained at their pleasure such books as they, in their ignorance, suspected to be of a dangerous character. So late as the beginning of the eighteenth century, we find Manuel Martini, dean of Alicant, and one of the most enlightened of his countrymen in that age, complained bitterly, in his confidential correspondence, of what he suffered from such proceedings.

Universities and other seminaries of education were watched with the most scrupulous jealousy. The professors in the university of Salamanca, who appear to have shown a stronger predilection for liberal science than their brethren, were forbidden to deliver lectures to their students; and similar orders were issued by Philip II. to those of the Escurial, who were instructed to confine themselves to reading from a printed book. Moral philosophy is too intimately allied both to religion and politics not to have excited the dread of the defenders of superstition and despotism; and, in fact, the feeble attempts made in Spain to throw off the degrading yoke have chiefly proceeded from the teachers of that science. This accordingly gave occasion to repeated interdicts, besides processes carried on against individuals. During the reign of Don Carlos IV., the prime minister, Caballero, sent a circular to all the universities, forbidding the study of moral philosophy, "because what his majesty wanted was, not philosophers, but loyal subjects." Even natural philosophy, in its various branches, was placed under the same trammels, and the Copernican system is still taught in that country as an hypothesis. Medical science is neglected; and surgeons, before entering on practice, are obliged to swear, not that they will exercise the healing art with fidelity, but that they will defend the immaculate conception of the blessed Virgin.

* The treatise of the Jesuit Mariana, De Rege, et Regis Institutione, which was burnt at Paris by the hands of the common hangman, is well known to the learned. In the library of Lambeth, there is a copy of the Works of Charles I. with the corrections made on it by order of the inquisition of Lisbon. Furious dashes of the pen appear across those passages in the prayers which refer to the protestant religion. Describing a "right monarchy," the British monarch had said, "where counsel may be in many, as the senses, but the supreme power can be but in one, as the head." The inquisitors have allowed this passage to stand; but over against it on the margin, they have written, "If king, false; if pope, true." (Catal. of Archiepiscopal Library at Lambeth, No. ccccxxii.)

† The prohibition of Bibles in the Spanish language was erased from the index by an edict dated 20 Dec. 1782; and yet the inquisition of Seville, by a general edict, promulgated 1 Feb. 1790, commanded all such Bibles to be denounced. This might be an oversight; but it is certain that the index still contains a prohibition of two books, upon this ground, that they point out the advantages of reading the scriptures. Nor was it the intention of the Inquisition to give the Bible to the common people; and accordingly it is printed in such a form as to confine it to the wealthy.

The great events which distinguished the reign of the emperor Charles V., by awakening the enthusiasm, contributed to develope the genius of the Spanish nation; and the impulse thus given to intellect continued to operate long after the cause which had produced it was removed. But the character of the degenerate age in which they lived was impressed even on the towering talents of Cervantes, Lope de Vega and Calderon, and can be easily traced in the false ideas, childest prejudices, and gross ignorance of facts which disfigure their writings. With these master spirits of literature the genius of Spain sunk; and when it began to recover from the lethargy by which it was long oppressed, it assumed the most unnatural form. Imagination being the only field left open to them, Spanish writers, as if they wished to compensate for the restraints under which they were laid, set aside the rules of good taste, and abandoned themselves to all the extravagancies of fancy, which they embodied in the most inflated and pedantic language. Although the natural talents of the inhabitants are excellent, there is at present no taste for literature in Spain. The lectures on experimental philosophy which Solano began to deliver gratis in the capital towards the close of the last century, though distinguished by their simplicity and elegance, were discontinued for want of an audience. Reading is unknown except among a very limited class. Every attempt to establish a literary magazine has failed, through the listlessness of the public mind and the control of the censorship. And the spies of the police and the Inquisition have long ago banished every thing like rational conversation from those places in which the people assemble to spend their leisure hours.

In Italy the same causes produced the same effects. Genius, taste and learning were crushed under the iron hand of inquisitorial despotism. The imprisonment of Galileo in the seventeenth, and the burning of the works of Giannone in the eighteenth century, are sufficient indications of the deplorable state of the Italians, during a period in which knowledge was advancing with such rapidity in countries long regarded by them as barbarous. When their intellectual energies began to recover, they were directed to a species of composition in which sentiment and poetry are mere accessories to sensual harmony, and the national love of pleasure could be gratified without endangering the authority of the rulers. To ennoble pleasure and render it in some degree sacred; to screen the prince from the shame of his own indolence and effeminacy; to blind the people to every consideration but that of the passing moment; and to give the author an opportunity to exert his talents without incurring the vengeance of the Inquisition—is the scope and spirit of the Italian opera. Later writers in Italy, whose productions breathe a fiery spirit of liberty, were of the French, or rather revolutionary school, and afford no criterion for judging of the national feelings and taste.

In Spain the increase of superstition, and of the numbers and opulence of the clergy, has kept pace with the growth of ignorance. The country is overrun with clergy, secular and regular. Towards the close of last century it contained nearly nine thousand convents; and the number of persons who had taken the vow of celibacy approached to two hundred thousand. The wealth of the church was equally disproportionate to that of the nation, as the numbers of the clergy were to its population. The cathedral of Toledo, for example, besides other valuable ornaments, contained four large silver images, standing on globes of the same metal; a grand massive throne of silver, on which was placed an image of the Virgin, wearing a crown valued at upwards of a thousand pounds; and a statue of the infant Jesus, adorned with eight hundred precious stones. Six hundred priests, richly endowed, were attached to it; and the revenues of the archbishop were estimated at nearly a hundred thousand pounds. The sums which are extorted by the mendicant friars, and which are paid for masses and indulgences, cannot be calculated; but the bulls of crusade alone yield a neat yearly income of two hundred thousand pounds to his Catholic Majesty, who purchases them from the pope, and retails them to his loving subjects.* Equally great are the encroachments which superstition has made on the time of the inhabitants. Benedict XIV. reduced the number of holydays in the states of the church, and recommended a similar reduction in other kingdoms. But in Spain there are still ninety-three general festivals, besides those of particular provinces, parishes and convents; to which we must add the bull-feasts, and the Mondays claimed by apprentices and journeymen.

Commerce and all the sources of national wealth are obstructed by persecution and intolerance. But the evil is unspeakably aggravated, when the greater part of the property of a nation is locked up, and a large proportion of its inhabitants, and of their time, is withdrawn from useful labour. Holland, with no soil but what she recovered from the ocean, waxed rich and independent, while Spain, with a third part of the world in her possession, has become poor. The city of Toledo is reduced to an eighth part of its former population; the monks remain, but the citizens have fled. Every street in Salamanca swarms with sturdy beggars and vagabonds able to work; and this is the case wherever the clergy, convents and hospicios are numerous. With a soil which, by its extent and fertility, is capable of supporting an equal number of inhabitants, the population of Spain is not half that of France.

The effects produced on the national character and morals are still more deplorable. Possessing naturally some of the finest qualities by which a people can be distinguished—generous, feeling, devoted, constant—the Spaniards became cruel, proud, reserved and jealous. The revolting spectacles of the auto-de-fe, continued for so long a period, could not fail to have the most hardening influence on their feelings. In Spain, as in Italy, religion is associated with crime, and protected by its sanctions. Thieves and prostitutes have their images of the Virgin, their prayers, their holy water, and their confessors. Murderers find a sanctuary in the churches and convents. Crimes of the blackest character are left unpunished in consequence of the immunities granted to the clergy. Adultery is common, and those who live habitually in this vice, find no difficulty in obtaining absolution. The cortejos, or male paramours, like the cicisbei in Italy, appear regularly in the family circle. In great cities the canons of cathedrals act in this character, and the monks in villages. The parish priests live almost universally in concubinage, and all that the more correct bishops require of them is, that they do not keep their children in their own houses. Until they begin to look towards a mitre, few of the clergy think of preserving decorum in this matter.

The dramatical pieces composed by their most celebrated writers, and acted on the stage with the greatest applause, demonstrate the extent to which the principles of morality have been injured by fanaticism and bigotry. In one of them, after the hero has plotted the death of his wife, and accomplished that of his parents, Jesus Christ is represented as descending from heaven to effect his salvation by means of a miracle. In another, an incestuous brigand and professed assassin preserves, in the midst of his crimes, his devotion for the cross, at the foot of which he was born, and the impress of which he bears on his breast. He erects a cross over each of his victims; and being at last slain, God restores him to life in order that a saint might receive his confession, and thus secure his admission into heaven. In another piece, Alfonzo VI. receives the capitulation of the Moors of Toledo, and, in the midst of his court and knights, swears to maintain their religious liberties, and to leave for their worship the largest mosque in the city. During his absence, Constance his queen violates the treaty, and places the miraculous image of the Virgin in the mosque. Alfonso is highly indignant at this breach of faith, but the Virgin surrounds Constance with a crown of glory, and convinces the king, to the great delight of the spectators, that it is an unpardonable sin to keep faith with heretics. To give one instance more; in another piece, the hero, while leading the most abandoned life, is represented as adhering to the true faith, and thus meriting the protection of St. Patrick, who follows him as his good genius to inspire him with repentance. When about to commit a murder, in addition to numbers which he had already perpetrated, he is converted by an apparition of himself, and exclaims, "What atonement can be made for a life spent in crime?" to which a voice of celestial music replies, "Purgatory." He is then directed into St. Patrick's Purgatory, and at the end of a few days comes out pardoned and purified. Still more precious specimens of religious absurdity and fanaticism might have been given from the autos sacramentales, a species of composition which continued to be popular till a late period, and has employed the pens of the most celebrated writers in Spain.

* For this bull the nobles pay about six shillings and four pence, the common people about two shillings and four pence, in Aragon. In Castile it is somewhat cheaper. No confessor will grant absolution to any one who does not possess it. (Townsend, ii. 171-2. Doblado's Letters, p. 214. Dr. Colbach has given an account of this traffic. In 1709 a privateer belonging to Bristol took a galleon, in which they found five hundred bales of these precious goods, containing each sixteen reams, and amounting in all to 384,000 bulls. Captain Dampier says he carcened his ship with them.

The Italians are bound to religion chiefly by the ties of interest and pleasure. The Spaniards are naturally a grave people; their devotional feelings are strong; and had they lived under a free government, they would have welcomed a purer worship, when, after a long period of ignorance, it was unveiled to their eyes, and might have proved its most enthusiastic and constant admirers. But their minds have been subjugated and their feelings perverted by a long course of debasing slavery. As to religion, the inhabitants of Spain are now divided into two classes, bigots and dissemblers: There is no intermediate class. Under such an encroaching system of faith as that of the church of Rome, which claims a right of interference with almost every operation of the human mind, the prohibition of all dissent from the established religion is a restraint sufficiently painful. But this is the least evil. Every Spaniard who disbelieves the public creed is constrained to profess himself to be what he is not, under the pain of losing all that he holds dear on earth. What with masses, and confessions, and festivals, and processions, and bowing to crosses and images, and purchasing pardons, and contributing to deliver souls from purgatory, he is every day, and every hour of the day, under the necessity of giving his countenance to what he detests as a Christian, or loathes as the cause of his country's degradation. It is not enough that he contrives to avoid going to church or chapel: the idol presents itself to him abroad and at home, in the tavern and in the theatre. He cannot turn a corner without being in danger of hearing the sound of the hand-bell which summons him to kneel in the mud, till a priest, who is carrying the consecrated host to some dying person, has moved slowly in his sedan chair from one end of the street to the other. If he dine with a friend, the passing bell is no sooner heard than the whole party rise from table and worship. If he go to the theatre, the military guard at the door, by a well-known sound of his drum, announces the approach of a procession, upon which "Su Magestad! Dios, Dios!" resounds through the house; the play is instantly suspended, and the whole assembly, actors and spectators, fall on their knees, in which attitude they remain until the sound of the bell has died away, when the amusement is resumed with fresh spirit. He has scarcely returned to his inn, when a friar enters, bearing a large lanthorn with painted glass, representing two persons enveloped with flames, and addresses him, "The holy souls, brother! Remember the holy souls."

Religion in its purity is calculated to soothe and support the mind under the unavoidable calamities of life; but when perverted by superstition, it aggravates every evil to which men are exposed, by fostering delusive confidence, and leading to the neglect of those natural means which tend to avert danger or alleviate distress. In Spain every city, every profession, and every company of artisans, has its tutelary saint, on whose miraculous interposition the utmost reliance is placed. The merchant, when he embarks his goods for a foreign country, instead of insuring them against the dangers of the sea in the ordinary way, seeks for security by paying his devotions at the shrine of the saint under whose protection the vessel sails. There is scarcely a disease affecting the human body which is not submitted to the healing power of some member of the calendar. So late as 1801, when the yellow fever prevailed in Seville, the civil authorities, instead of adopting precautionary measures for abating the violence of that pestilential malady, applied to the archbishop for the solemn prayers called Rogativas; and not trusting to these, they resolved to carry in procession a fragment of the true cross, preserved in the cathedral of Seville, which had formerly chased away an army of locusts, together with a large wooden crucifix, which, in 1649, had arrested the progress of the plague. The inhabitants flocked to the church; and the consequence was, that the heat, fatigue, and anxiety of a whole day spent in this ridiculous ceremony, increased the disease in a tenfold proportion.

Popery, by the false light and repulsive form in which it represents Christianity, tends naturally to produce deism and irreligion. In France, where a certain degree of liberty was enjoyed, it led at first to the covert dissemination and afterwards to the bold avowal of infidel opinions, by those who had the greatest influence over the public mind. In countries where a rigid system of police, civil and ecclesiastical, has been kept up, its operation has been different, but not less destructive to national character and the real interests of religion. The great body of the unbelievers, anxious only for present enjoyment, and regarding religion in no other light than as an engine of state, have made no scruple of fostering the popular credulity, that they might share its fruits; while those of more generous and independent spirit, writhing under the degrading yoke, have given way to irritation of feeling, and, confounding Christianity with an intolerant superstition, cherish the desperate hope that religion, in all its forms, will one day be swept from the earth, as the support of tyranny and the bane of human happiness. It is well known that the Italian clergy have for a long time given the most unequivocal proofs that they disbelieve those doctrines, and feel indifferent to those rights, from which they derive their maintenance and wealth.* We were formerly aware that the principles of irreligion were widely diffused among the reading classes in Spain; but more ample information, furnished by recent events, has disclosed the fact, that this evil is not confined to the laity, and that infidelity is as common among the educated Spanish clergy as vice is among the vulgar crowd of priests. There is a lightness attached to the character of the Italians, which, together with the recollection that they have been the chief instrument of enslaving the Christian world, disposes us to turn away from the manifestations of their irreligion with feelings of contempt. But such is the native dignity of the Spanish character, and its depth of feeling, that we dwell with a mixed emotion of pity and awe on the ravages which infidelity is making on so noble a structure. Who can read the following description by a Spaniard without the strongest sympathy for such of his countrymen as are still in that "gall of bitterness and bond iniquity" from which he was so happily rescued! "Where there is no liberty, there can be no discrimination. The ravenous appetite, raised by a forced abstinence, makes the mind gorge itself with all sorts of food. I suspect I have thus imbibed some false and many crude notions from my French masters. But my circumstances preclude the calm and dispassionate examination which the subject deserves. Exasperated by the daily necessity of external submission to doctrines and persons I detest and despise, my soul overflows with bitterness. Though I acknowledge the advantages of moderation, none being used towards me, I practise none, and in spite of my better judgment learn to be a fanatic on my own side. Pretending studious retirement, I have fitted up a small room to which none but confidential friends find admission. There lie my prohibited books in perfect concealment, in a well-contrived nook under a staircase. The Breviary alone, in its back binding, clasps, and gilt leaves, is kept upon the table, to check the doubts of any chance intruder." The same person writes at a subsequent period: "The confession is painful indeed, yet due to religion itself—I was bordering on atheism. If my case were singular, if my knowledge of the most enlightened classes of Spain did not furnish me with a multitude of sudden transitions from sincere faith and piety to the most outrageous infidelity, I would submit to the humbling conviction that either weakness of judgment or fickleness of character had been the only source of my errors. But though I am not at liberty to mention individual cases, I do attest, from the most certain knowledge, that the history of my own mind is, with little variation, that of a great portion of the Spanish clergy. The fact is certain; I make no individual charge; every one who comes within the description may still wear the mask, which no Spaniard can throw off without bidding an eternal farewell to his country."

It is evident from this slight sketch that there are many and powerful obstacles to the regeneration of Spain. Superstition is interwoven with her national habits and feelings; and civil and spiritual despotism are bound together by an indissoluble league, while they find a powerful auxiliary in the depraved morals of the people; for liberty has not a greater enemy than licentiousness, and an immoral people can neither preserve their freedom when they have it, nor regain it after it has been lost. But what augurs worse than perhaps any thing else for Spain is, that it does not possess a class of persons animated by the spirit of that reformation to which the free states of Europe chiefly owe their political privileges. Infidelity and scepticism, besides weakening the moral energies of the human mind, have a tendency to break up the natural alliance which subsists between civil and religious liberty. Those who are inimical or indifferent to religion cannot be expected to prove the firm and uncompromising friends of that liberty which has religion for its object. They love it not for itself, and cannot be prepared to make all sacrifices for its sake. Thus, when tyranny takes the field, brandishing its two swords, the right arm of liberty is found to be palsied. The irreligious or sceptical principles of those who have been called liberals must always excite a strong and well-grounded prejudice against their schemes. If they demand a reform in the state, the defenders of abuse have only to raise against them the cry of impiety. Bigots and hypocrites are furnished with a plausible pretext for putting them down. And good men, who may be convinced of the corruptions which adhere to both church and state, and might be willing to co-operate in removing them, are deterred from joining in the attempt, by the apprehension that it may lead to the overthrow of all religion. It is not difficult to trace the operation of all these causes in defeating the struggles for liberty which have been made within these few years in Italy and the Peninsula.

* An English gentleman who had resided long in Italy, and obtained lodgings in a convent, was frequently engaged in friendly discussions with the most intelligent individuals of the house on the points of difference between the churches of Rome and England. On the termination of one of these disputes, after the greater part of the company had retired, a young monk, who had supported the tenets of his church with great ability, turning to his English guest, asked him, if he really believed what he had been defending. On his answering seriously in the affirmative, the monk exclaimed, Allor lei crede piu che tutto il convento. Then, Sir, you believe more than all the convent. (Doblado's Letters, p. 476.)

But may we not cherish better hopes, as the result of those events which have recently induced the more enlightened portion of the Spanish nation to turn their eyes to Britian instead of France, from which they formerly looked for instruction and relief? Let us hope that those individuals who have taken refuge in this country, and whose conduct has shown that they are not unworthy of the reception they have met with, will profit by their residence among us; that any of them who, from the unpropitious circumstances in which they were placed, may have formed an unfavourable opinion of Christianity, will find their prejudices dissipated in the free air which they now breathe; that what is excellent in our religion, as well as our policy, will recommend itself to their esteem; and that, when providence shall open an honourable way for their returning to their native country, they will assist in securing to it a constitution, founded on the basis of rational liberty, in connexion with a religion purified from those errors and corruptions which have wrought so much woe to Spain—which have dried up its resources, cramped and debased its genius, lowered its native dignity of character, and poisoned the fountains of its domestic and social happiness.

FANATICISM.

BY THE AUTHOR OF NATURAL HISTORY OF ENTHUSIASM.

—— αἱ μετὰ πάθους διαστροφαὶ
τῆς ψυχῆς χαγεπώτεραι.

PREFACE.

Strict propriety seldom allows an author to obtrude upon the public the circumstances that may have attended and controlled his literary labours. Yet the rule may give way to special reasons; and in the present instance the reader is requested courteously to admit an exception.

More than twelve years ago the Author projected a work which should at one view exhibit the several principal forms of spurious or corrupted religion. But discouraged by the magnitude and difficulty of such a task, he after a while, yet not without much reluctance, abandoned the undertaking. Nevertheless the subject continually pressed upon his mind. At length he selected a single portion of the general theme, and adventured—Natural History of Enthusiasm.

Emboldened to proceed, the Author almost immediately entered upon the nearly connected and sequent subject which fills the present volume. Yet fearing lest, by an unskilful or unadvised treatment of certain arduous matters which it involves, he might create embarrassment where most he desired to do good, he laid aside his materials.

But in the interval, by extending his researches concerning the rise and progress of the fatal errors that have obscured our holy religion, the Author greatly enhanced his wish to achieve his first purpose. He therefore resumed Fanaticism; which is now offered to the candour of the Reader. He next proposes, in advancing towards the completion of his original design, to take in hand Superstition, and its attendant, Credulity.

A natural transition leads from Superstition and Credulity to Spiritual Despotism. The principal perversions of Religion having thus been reviewed, it would be proper to describe that Corruption of Morals which, in different modes, has resulted from the overthrow of genuine piety. There would then only remain to be considered Scepticism, or Philosophic Irreligion; and the series will embrace all that the Author deems indispensable to the undertaking he has so long meditated.

SECTION I.

MOTIVES OF THE WORK.

The maladies of the mind are not to be healed any more than those of the body, unless by a friendly hand. But through a singular infelicity it too often happens that these evils, deep as they are, and difficult of cure, fall under a treatment that is hostile and malign, or, what is worse, frivolous. Especially does this disadvantage attach to that peculiar class of mental disorders which, as they are more profound in their origin than any other, and more liable to extreme aggravation, demand in whoever would relieve them, not only the requisite skill, but the very purest intentions.

Vitiated religious sentiments have too much connexion with the principles of our physical constitution to be in every case effectively amended by methods that are merely theological; and yet, drawing their strength as they do from great truths with which the physiologist has ordinarily little or no personal acquaintance, and which perhaps he holds in contempt, he is likely to err, as well in theory as in practice, when he takes them in hand. How profound soever or exact may be his knowledge of human nature, whether as matter of science or as matter of observation, the subject, in these instances, lies beyond his range!—himself neither religious nor even superstitious, he has no sympathy with the deep movements of the soul in its relation to the Infinite and Invisible Being;—he has no clue therefore to the secret he is in search of. The misapprehensions of the frigid philosopher are vastly increased if it should happen that, in reference to religion, his feelings are petulant and acrimonious. Poor preparation truly for a task of such peculiar difficulty to be at once ignorant in the chief article of the case, and hurried on by the motives that attend a caustic levity of temper!

It would indeed be difficult to furnish a satisfactory reason either for the asperity or for the levity with which persons of a certain class allow themselves to speak of grave perversions of the religious sentiment; for if such vices of the spirit be regarded as corruptions of the most momentous of all truths, then surely a due affection for our fellow-men, on the one hand, and a proper reverence towards Heaven on the other, alike demand from reasonable persons as well tenderness as awe, in approaching a subject so fraught with fatal mischiefs. Or even if religion be deemed by these sarcastic reprovers altogether an illusion, or an inveterate prejudice, infesting our luckless nature, not the more, even in that case, can rancour or levity become a wise and benevolent mind, seeing that these same powerful sentiments, whether true or false, do so deeply affect the welfare of the human family.

Or, to look at the subject on another side, it may fairly be asked why the religious passions might not claim from supercilious wits a measure of that lenity (if not indulgence) which is readily afforded to vices of another sort. If Pride, abhorrent as it is, and if Ambition, with both hands dyed in blood, and if the lust of wealth making the weak its prey, and if sensual desires, devoid of pity, are all to be gently handled, and all in turn find patrons among Sages—why might not also Fanaticism? why might not Enthusiasm? why not Superstition? It would be hard to prove that the deluded religionist, even when virulent in an extreme degree, or when most absurd, is practically a more mischievous person than for instance, the adulterous despoiler of domestic peace, or than the rapacious dealer in human souls and bodies. Let it be true that the Hypocrite is an odious being?—yes, but is not the Oppressor also detestable? And what has become of the philosophic impartiality of the Sage (self-styed) who will spend his jovial hours at the table of the Cruel or the Debauched, while all he can bestow upon the victims of religious extravagance, is the bitterness of his contempt? There is a manifest inconsistency here of which surely those should be able to give a good account who, themselves, are far too wise than to be religious.

We leave this difficulty in the hands of the parties it may concern, and proceed to say that emotions altogether strange to frigid and sardonic tempers, must have come within the experience of whoever would truly comprehend the malady of the fanatic or the enthusiast; and much more so, if he is attempting to restore the disordered spirit to soundness of health. Mere intellectualists, as well as men of pleasure, know just so much of human nature as their own frivolous sentiments may serve to give them a sense of: all that lies deeper than these slender feelings, or that stretches beyond this limited range, is to them a riddle and a mockery. But it may happen that a mind natively sound, and one now governed by the firmest principles, has in an early stage, or in some short era of its course, so far yielded to the influence of irregular or vehement sentiments as to give it ever after a sympathy, even with the most extreme cases of the same order; so that, by the combined aid of personal experience and observation, the profound abyss wherein exorbitant religious ideas take their course may successfully be explored; nor merely explored, but its fearful contents brought forth and described, and this too in the spirit of humanity, or with the feeling of one who, far from affecting to look down as from a pinnacle upon the follies of his fellow-men, speaks in kindness of their errors, as being himself liable to every infirmity that besets the human heart and understanding.

Never, in fact, have we more urgent need of a settled principle of philanthropy than when we set foot upon the ground of religious delusion. Nowhere, so much as there, is it necessary to be resolute in our good-will to man, and fixed in our respect for him too, even while the strictness of important principles is not at all relaxed. Far more easy is it to be contemptuously bland, than kind and firm on occasions of this sort. We have only to abandon our concern for serious truths, and then may be indulgent to the worst enormities. But this were a cruel charity, and a farce too; and we must seek a much surer foundation for that love which is to be the consort of knowledge.

A personal consciousness of the readiness with which even the most egregious or dangerous perversions of feeling at first recommend themselves to the human mind, and soon gain sovereign control over it, is needed to place us in the position we ought to occupy whenever such evils are to be made the subject of animadversion. And if, with the light of Christianity full around us, and with the advantages of general intelligence on our side, we yet cannot boast of having enjoyed an entire exemption from false or culpable religious emotions, what sentiment but pity should be harboured when we come to think of those who, born beneath a malignant star, have walked by no other light than the lurid glare of portentous superstitions? A check must even be put to those strong and involuntary emotions of indignation with which we contemplate the hateful course of the spiritual despot and persecutor. Outlaw of humanity, and offspring, as he seems, of infernals, he may command also a measure of indulgence as the child of some false system which, by a slow accumulation of noxious qualities, has grown to be far more malign than its authors would have made it. Besides, there may revolve within the abyss of the human heart (as history compels us to admit) a world of wondrous inconsistencies; and especially so when religious infatuations come in to trouble it. How often has there been seen upon the stage of human affairs beings—must we call them men? who, with hands sodden in blood—blood of their brethren, have challenged to themselves, and on no slender grounds, the praise of a species of virtue and greatness of soul!

The very same spirit of kindness which should rule us in the performance of a task such as the one now in hand, must also furnish the necessary motive for the arduous undertaking. Is it a matter of curious description only, or of entertainment, or even with the more worthy, though secondary purpose of philosophical inquiry, that we are to pass over the ground of religious extravagance? Any such intention would be found to lack impulse enough for the labour. There are however at hand motives of an incomparably higher order, and of far greater force, and these (or some of them at least) have a peculiar urgency in reference to the present moment. To these motives too much importance cannot be attributed; and it will be well that we should here distinctly bring them to view.

All devout minds are now intent upon the hope of the overthrow of old superstitions, and of the universal spread of the Gospel. But the spread of the Gospel, as we are warranted to believe, implies and demands its clear separation from all those false sentiments and exaggerated or mischievous modes of feeling which heretofore, and so often, have embarrassed its course. In a word, Christianity must free itself from all entanglement with malignant or exorbitant passions, if it would break over its present boundaries. Is the world to be converted—are the nations to be brought home to God? Yes; but this supposes that the Christian body should awake from every illusion, and rid itself of every disgrace.

True indeed it is, and lamentable, that the families of man have remained age after age the victims of error: yet this has not happened because there has not been extant in every age, somewhere, a repository of truth, and an INSTRUMENT, or means of instruction. If even now superstition and impiety share between them the empire of almost all the world, it is not because nothing better comes within the reach of the human mind, or because nothing more benign is presented to its choice. No—for absolute Truth, Truth from heaven, has long sojourned on earth, and is to be conversed with. Why then do the people still sit in darkness? The question may painfully perplex us, yet should never be dismissed. Rather a genuine and intelligent compassion for our fellow-men will lead us to prosecute with intense zeal any inquiry which may issue in the purification of the means of salvation confided to our care. If the Gospel does not (as we might have expected, and must always desire) prevail and run from land to land—the anxious question recurs—what arrests its progress?

Besides employing ourselves then in all eligible modes for propagating the faith, every one competent to the task, should institute a scrutiny, at home and abroad, in quest as well of open hinderances to the progress of the Gospel, as of the more latent or obscure causes of obstruction. The great work in an age of Missions, should it be any thing else than the re-inauguration of Christianity among ourselves? If religion—religion we mean, not as found on parchments or in creeds, but in the bosoms of men, were indeed what once it was, it would doubtless spread, as once it did, from heart to heart, and from city to city, and from shore to shore. The special reason therefore—or the URGENT REASON, why we should now dismiss from our own bosoms every taint of superstition, and every residue of unbelief, as well as whatever is fanatical, factious, or uncharitable, is this—that the world—even the deluded millions of our brethren, may at length receive the blessings of the Gospel.

Although we were looking no further than to the personal welfare of individuals, it would always seem in the highest degree desirable that whoever believes the Gospel should cast off infirmities of judgment—preposterous suppositions—idle and debilitating fears, and especially should come free from the taint of malign sentiments. But after we have so thought of the individual, must we not give a renewed attention to the influence he may exert over others? No one "liveth to himself."—An efficacy, vital or mortal, emanates from the person of every professor of the Gospel.—Every man calling himself (in a special sense) a Christian, either saves or destroys those around him:—Such is the rule of the dispensation under which we have to act. It pleases not the Divine Power (very rare cases excepted) to operate independently of that living and rational agency to which even the scheme of human redemption was made to conform itself.

The Saviour of men "became flesh, and dwelt among us," because no violence could be done, even on the most urgent and singular of all occasions, to the established principles of the moral system.—The harmony of the intellectual world, in the constitution of which the Divine Wisdom is so signally displayed, must not be disturbed, notwithstanding that the Eternal Majesty himself was coming to the rescue of the lost; and in this illustrious instance we have a proof, applicable to every imaginable case, and always sufficient to convince us—That the saving mercy of God to man moves only along the line of rational and moral agency;—that if a sinner is to be "converted from the error of his way," it must be by the word or personal influence of one like himself. Was it not (other purposes being granted) to give sanction to this very mode of procedure, that he who "was rich" in the fulness of divine perfections, "became poor," that we, through the poverty of his human nature, "might be made rich?" Vain supposition then that God, who would not at first save the world at the cost, or to the damage of the settled maxims of his government, shall in after instances wave them; or put contempt in private cases upon that to which he attributed the highest importance on the most notable of all occasions!

Christianity, such as it actually exists in the bosoms of those who entertain it, is the Instrument of God's mercy to the world:—and the Effect in every age will be as is the Instrument. In these times we have not quite lost sight of this great principle; much less do we deny it:—and yet every day we give more attention to other truths, than to this. We honour the capital doctrine of the agency of the Spirit of Grace in the conversion of men; and then we turn to proximate and visible means, and pay due regard to all the ordinary instruments of instruction. And thus having rendered homage in just proportion, to the Divine Power and sovereignty on the one hand, and to human industry on the other, we think too little of that Middle Truth which, nevertheless, to ourselves is the most significant of the three, namely—That the moral and intelligent imstrumentality from the which the Sovereign Grace refuses to sever itself, is nothing else than the vital force which animates each single believer.

Does not the Omnipresent Spirit, rich in power to renovate human hearts, even now brood over the populous plains and crowded cities of India and of China, as well as over the cities and plains of England? Is not God—even our God, locally present among the dense myriads that tread the precincts of idol worship?—Is He not ever, and in all places at hand; and wherever at hand, able also to save? Yes, but alas! the moral and rational instrumentality is not present in those dark places; and the immutable law of the spiritual world forbids that, apart from this system of means, the souls of men should be rescued.

Nor is the bare presence of the moral and rational instrument of conversion enough; for its Power resides in its Quality. The very same law—awful and inviolable, which demands its presence, demands also its quality, as the condition of its efficiency. Yes, indeed, awful and inviolable law;—awful because inviolable; and awful to the Church, because it makes the salvation to mankind, in each successive generation, to lean with undivided stress, upon the purity and vigor of faith and charity, as found in the hearts of the Christians of each age, severally and collectively!

There might, we grant, seem more urgent need to make inquiry concerning the intrinsic condition of the Christian body in those times when its diffusive influence had sunk to the lowest point, or seemed quite to have failed, than when this influence was growing. And yet, inasmuch as hope is a motive imcomparably more efficacious than despondency, we should be prompt to avail ourselves of its aid whenever it makes its auspicious appearance. But the present hour is an hour of hope;—let us then seize the fair occasion, and turn it to the utmost advantage. This age of expectation is the time when vigilance and scrutiny, of every sort, should be put in movement, and should be directed inward upon the Church itself: for in the bosom of the Church rests the hope of the conversion of the world?

How culpable, then, and how ignoble too, must we deem that spirit of jealousy or reluctance which would divert such a scrutiny, as if the honour of the Gospel were better secured by cloaking the faults of its adherents, than by labouring to dispel them! Shall we, as Christians, wish to creep under the shelter of a corrupt lenity? Shall we secretly wish that the time may never come—or at least, not come while we live, when the inveterate and deep-seated errors of the religious body shall be fairly dealt with, and honestly spread to the light? It may indeed be true that when we have to denounce the flagrant evils that abound in the world, and when open impiety and unbelief are to be reproved, we should use a serious severity; but then, when we turn homeward, shall we at once moderate our tones, and drop our voice, and plead for a sort of indulgence, as the favourites of heaven, which we are by no means forward to grant to the uninstructed and irreligious portion of mankind! Shall our thunders always have a distant aim? Alas! how many generations of men have already lived and died untaught, while the Church has delicately smothered her failings, and has asked for an inobservant reverence from the profane world! True it is that the vices of heathens and infidels are grievous; but it is also true that the vices of the Church, if much less flagrant, and less mischievous in their immediate operation, are loaded with a peculiar aggravation, inasmuch as they destroy or impair the ONLY EXISTING MEANS for the repression and extermination of all error and all vice!

If then the alleged dependence of the religious welfare of mankind upon the vigor and purity of the Christian body be real, we find a full apology for whatever methods (even the most rigorous) that may conduce to its cleansing. All we need take care of is the spirit and intention of our reproofs. Should there be any, calling himself a disciple of Christ, who would protest against such impartial proceedings, he might properly be told that the inquiry in hand is too momentous, and is far too extensive in its consequences, than that it should be either diverted or relinquished in deference to the feelings or interests of the parties immediately concerned.—'Be it so,' we might say to the reluctant and faulty Christian, be it so, that your spiritual delinquencies are not of so fatal a kind as to put in danger your personal salvation (an assumption, by the way, always hazardous) and let it be granted that you are chargeable only with certain infirmities of judgment, or with mere exuberances in temper or conduct;—yes, but these faults in you, as a Christian, and especially at the present critical moment, exert a negative power, the circle of which none can measure. Can you then desire that we should exercise a scrupulous tenderness toward you, while we forget pity towards the millions of mankind? Nay, rather, let every instrument of correction, and the most severe, be put in play, which may seem needful for restoring its proper force to the Gospel—the only means as it is of mercy to the world.' No, we must not flinch, although the sensitiveness and the vanity of thousands among us were to be intensely hurt. Let all—all be humbled, if such humiliation is indeed a necessary process that shall facilitate the conversion of the world.

Such then is the prime motive which should animate the difficult labour we have in hand. But there are other reasons, nor those very remote, that may properly be kept in view when it is attempted, as now, to lay bare the pernicious sentiments that have so often and so severely afflicted mankind.—If, just at the present moment, there seems little or no probability that sanguinary and malignant superstitions should regain their lost ascendancy, can we say it is certain that no such evils, congruous as they are with the universal passions of man, shall henceforth be generated, and burst abroad? Manifest as it is that the human mind has a leaning toward gloomy and cruel excesses in matters of religion, whence can we derive a firm persuasion that this tendency shall, in all future ages, be held as much in check as now it is?—Not surely from broad and comprehensive calculations, such as a sound philosophy authenticates. The supposition that human nature has forever discarded certain powerful emotions which awhile ago raged within its circle, must be deemed frivolous and absurd. How soon may we be taught to estimate more wisely the forces we have to guard against in our political and religious speculations! The frigid indifference and levity we see around us is but the fashion of a day; and a day may see it exchanged for the utmost extravagance, and for the highest frenzy of fanatical zeal. Human nature, let us be assured, is a more profound and boisterous element than we are apt to imagine, when it has happened to us for a length of time to stand upon the brink of the abyss in a summer season, idly gazing upon the rippled surface—gay in froth and sunbeams. What shall be the movements of the deep, and what the thunder of its rage, at night-fall, and when the winds are up!

Nothing less than the ample testimony of history can support general conclusions as to what is probable or not, in the course of events. And yet even the events of the last few years might be enough to prove that mankind, whatever may be the boasted advance of civilization, has by no means outgrown its propensity to indulge vindictive passions. Or can we have looked around during our own era, and believe that the fascinations of impudent imposture and egregious delusion are quite spent and gone? Rather let it be assumed as probable, at least as not impossible, that whatever intemperance, whatever atrocity, whatever folly, history lays to the charge of man, shall be repeated, perhaps in our own age, perhaps in the next.

The security which some may presume upon, against the reappearance of religious excesses, if founded on the present diffusion of intellectual and Biblical light, is likely to prove fallacious in two capital respects. In the first place, the inference is faulty because this spread of knowledge (in both kinds) though indeed wide and remarkable—or remarkable by comparison, is still in fact very limited, and its range bears an inconsiderable proportion to the broad surface of society, even in the most enlightened communities. If a certain number has reached that degree of intelligence which may be reckoned to exclude altogether the probability of violent movements, the dense masses of society, on all sides, have hitherto scarcely been blessed by a ray of genuine illumination; moreover, there is in our own country, and in every country of Europe, a numerous middle class, whose progress in knowledge is of that sort which, while it fails to insure moderation or control of the passions, renders the mind only so much the more susceptible of imaginative excitements. Torpor, it is true, has to a great extent been dispelled from the European social system; but who shall say in what manner, or to what purposes, the returning powers of life shall be employed? In now looking upon the populace of the civilized world, such as the revolutionary excitements of the last fifty years have made it, one might fancy to see a creature of gigantic proportions just rousing itself, after a long trance, and preparing to move and act among the living. But, what shall be its deeds, and what its temper?—The most opposite expectations might be made to appear reasonable. Every thing favourable may be hoped for;—whatever is appalling may be feared. At least we may affirm that the belief entertained by some, that great agitations may not again produce great excesses; or that egregious delusions may not once more, even on the illuminated field of European affairs, draw after them, as in other ages, myriads of votaries, rests upon no solid grounds of experience or philosophy, and will be adopted only by those who judge of human nature from partial or transient aspects, or who think that the frivolous incidents of yesterday and to-day afford a sufficient sample of all Time.

But a persuasion of this sort, founded on the spread of intelligence, whether secular or religious, seems faulty in another manner—namely, in attributing to knowledge, of either kind, more influence than it is actually found to exert over the passions and the imagination of the bulk of mankind. Education does indeed produce, in full, its proper effect to moderate the emotions, and as a preservative against delusion, in cold, arid, and calculating spirits; and it exerts also, in a good degree, the same sort of salutary influence over even the most turbulent or susceptible minds, up to that critical moment when the ordinary counterpoise of reason is overborne, and when some paramount motive gains ascendancy. This sudden overthrow of restraining principles—an overthrow to which sanguine and imaginative temperaments are always liable, is not often duly allowed for when it is attempted to forecast the course of human affairs. We form our estimate of moral causes according to that rate of power at which we observe them now to be moving; but fail to anticipate what they shall become, perhaps the next instant, that is to say, when existing restraints of usage or feeling have been burst asunder.

The rush of the passions, on such occasions, is impetuous, just in proportion to the force that may have been overthrown; and whatever has given way before the torrent, goes forward to swell the tide. There are those who, from their personal history, might confirm the truth that, when they have fallen, their fall was aggravated, not softened, by whatever advantages they possessed of intelligence or sensibility. And it is especially to be observed that, when the balance of the mind has once been lost, the power of intelligence or of knowledge to enhance the vehemence of malignant emotions, or to exaggerate preposterous conceits, is immeasurably greater on occasions of general excitement, or of public delusion, than in the instance of private and individual errors. Whence in fact does knowledge draw the chief part of its controlling force over the mind, but from the susceptibility it engenders to the opinions of those around us? In entering the commonwealth of intelligence, do we not come under an influence that will probably out-measure the accession we may make of personal power? It is only on particular occasions that we regulate our conduct, or repress the violence of passion by self-derived inferences from what we know; while ordinarily and almost unconsciously, we apply to our modes of action and to our sentiments, those general maxims that float in the society of which we are members. If every man's personal intelligence absolutely governed his behaviour, the empire of knowledge would indeed be much more firm than it is, because truth would take effect at all points of the surface of society, instead of touching only a few. But this not being the fact, whatever blind impulse awakens the passions of mankind affects all, individually, in a degree that bears little relation to the individual intelligence of each. The movements of a community when once excited, are far more passionate and less rational, than an estimate of its average intelligence might lead us to expect.

If it be so, it must happen that when once a turn is made in the general tendency of men's feelings—when once a certain order of sentiment, or a certain course of conduct has come to be authenticated;—if, for example, some dark, cruel, or profligate rule of policy is assented to as necessary or just, all men in particular, in yielding themselves to the stream of affairs, will plunge into it with an impetuosity proportioned to their personal intelligence and energy of mind. Every man in assenting to the general conclusion, because assented to by others, would strengthen himself and others, in the common purpose, by all those means of knowledge and powers of argument which he possessed. If the error or extravagance had been his own, exclusively, his faculty and furniture of mind would have been employed in defending himself from the assaults of other men's good sense; and human nature does not, under such circumstances, often accumulate such force. But the same faculties moving forward with the multitude, on a broad triumphant road, swell and expand and possess themselves of the full dominion of the soul.

At this present moment of general indifference the breaking forth of any species of fanaticism may seem highly improbable. We ought however to look beyond to-day and yesterday;—we should survey the general face of history, and should inspect too the depths of the human heart, and calculate the power of its stronger passions. Disbelief is the ephemeron of our times; but disbelief, far from being natural to man, can never be more than a reaction that comes on, as a faintness, after a season of credulity and superstition. And how soon may a revulsion take place! How soon, after the hour of exhaustion has gone by, may the pleasurable excitements of high belief and of unbounded confidence be eagerly courted!—courted by the vulgar in compliance with its relish of whatever is pungent and intense;—courted by the noble as a means, or as a pretext of power;—courted by the frivolous as a relief from lassitude; and by the profound and thoughtful, as the proper element of minds of that order!

Whenever the turn of BELIEF shall come round (we are not here speaking of a genuine religious faith), empassioned sentiments, of all kinds, will follow without delay: nor can any thing less than a revival of Christianity in its fullest force then avail to ward off those excesses of fanaticism and intolerance, and spiritual arrogance, which heretofore have raged in the world. The connexion of CREDULITY with VIRULENCE is deep seated in the principles of human nature, and it should not be deemed impertinent or unseasonable at any time to attempt to trace to its origin this order of sentiments, or to lay bare the fibres of its strength:—unless, indeed, we will profess to think that man is no more what once he was.

SECTION II.

THE MEANING OF TERMS—RISE OF THE MALIGN EMOTIONS.

Every term, whether popular or scientific, which may be employed to designate the affections or the individual dispositions of the human mind, is more or less indeterminate, and is liable to many loose and improper extensions of the sense which a strict definition might assign to it. This disadvantage—the irremediable grievance of intellectual philosophy, has its origin in the obscurity and intricacy of the subject; and is besides much aggravated by the changing fashions of speech, which neither observe scientific precision, nor are watched over with any care. Men speak not entirely as they think; but as they think and hear; and in what relates to things impalpable few either think or hear attentively. All ethical and religious phrases, and those psychological terms which derive their specific sense from the principles of religion, besides partaking fully of the above-named disparagements, common to intellectual subjects, labour under a peculiar inconvenience, not shared by any others of that class. For if the mass of men are inaccurate and capricious in their mode of employing the abstruse portion of language, they entertain too often, in what relates to religion, certain capital errors—errors which ordinarily possess the force and activity of virulent prejudices, and which impart to their modes of speaking, not indistinctness indeed, but the vivid and positive colours of a strong delusion.

It is not the small minority of persons soundly informed in matters of religion, that gives law to the language of a country;—or even if it did, this class is not generally qualified, by habits or education, to fix and authenticate a philosophical nomenclature. From these peculiar disadvantages it inevitably follows that when, by giving attention to facts, we have obtained precise notions on subjects of this sort, or at least have approximated to truth, it will be found impracticable to adjust the result of our inquiries to the popular and established sense of any of the terms which may offer themselves to our option. The mass of mankind, besides their backwardness always to exchange a loose and vague, for a definite and restricted notion, do not fail to descry, in any definition that is at once philosophical and religious, some cause of offence.—The new-sharpened phrase is felt to have an edge that wounds inveterate prejudice, and rankles in the heart; and the writer who is seen to be thus whetting afresh his words, is deemed to entertain a hostile purpose, and is met with a correspondent hostility. Nor is much more favour to be looked for from the religious classes who, always alarmed at the slightest change in venerable modes of speech, will scent a heresy in every such definition.

If then new terms are not to be created (a procedure always undesirable), and if the intolerable inconvenience of a ponderous periphrasis is also to be avoided, the best that can be done, amid so many difficulties, is to select a phrase which, more nearly than any other (of those commonly in use) conveys the notion we have obtained; and then to append a caution, explicit or implied, against the misunderstandings to which the writer, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, is exposed.

In the instance of every term connected with religious principles or modes of feeling, there must of course be admitted a far wider departure from the etymological or ancient, than from the modern and popular sense they bear. If the recent and vulgar meaning of such phrases be incorrect, or delusive, how much more so must be the remote and original meaning!—Whither does the etymon carry us, but to altogether a foreign region of thought? In matters of religion a revolution has taken place, upon all lettered nations, which, while it leaves human nature the same, has imparted a new substance, a new form, and a new relative position, to every notion that respects Invisible Power, and human conduct.

Preposterous therefore would be the pedantry of a writer who, in discoursing, for example, of Superstition, or Enthusiasm, should confine himself to such a definition of those terms as might comport with the sense they bore, centuries ago, in the minds of Lucian, Plutarch, Epictetus, or Aristotle! Even many of the less fluctuating ethical abstractions have dropped almost the whole of their primeval significance in the course of ages. Is Justice, in the sense of an Athenian populace, or in the sense of the "Senate and People of Rome," the justice either of English law, or of English opinion? Has the Virtue of Sparta much analogy with the virtue of Christian ethics? Where, in modern times (except indeed among the slaveholders of Republican America) where shall we find a meaning of the word Liberty which has even a remote resemblance to the sense attached to it by the ferocious lords of miserable Lacedæmonian helots?

The passions of man are permanent; but the difference between polytheism and true theology—how much soever true theology may in any instance be encumbered or obscured, is so vast, as to leave nothing that belongs to the circle of religious emotion unchanged.

Thus it is that the FANATIC of the Grecian and Roman writers is hardly, if at all, to be recognized as predecessor of the Fanatic of Christendom; and although, for purposes of illustration, or of mere curiosity, we may hereafter glance (once and again) at some of the ancient and long-obsolete forms of religious extravagance, it is with the modern species (practical inferences being our prime object) that we shall, in the following pages, chiefly be conversant.

In a former instance (Natural History of Enthusiasm) the author was not insensible of the disadvantage he laboured under in adopting a phrase which perhaps more than any other (the one he has now to do with excepted) is employed in every imaginable diversity of meaning, and to which, in truth, every man, as he utters it, assigns a sense that reflects his personal rate of feeling in matters of religion. One man's Enthusiasm being only another man's Sobriety. Before such diversities can be harmonized not only must mankind be taught to think with precision, but must come also to an agreement on the great principles of piety.

Discordances, still more extreme, belong to the popular senses of the word FANATICISM; for inasmuch as it takes up a more pungent element than the term Enthusiasm, it commonly draws some special emphasis from the virulence or prejudices of the mouth whence it issues:—the word is the favourite missile of that opprobrious contempt wherewith Irreligion defends itself in its difficult position; and it is hurled often with the indiscriminate vehemence that belongs to infuriate fear. The sense attached to a term when so employed must of course differ immensely from that which it bears in the mind of the dispassionate observer of mankind, and especially of one who takes up the truths of Christianity as the best and most certain clew to the philosophy of human nature.

Once for all, then, the author requests the reader to remember that he is not professing to be either lexicographer or scholastic disputant; nor does he assume it as any part of his business to adjust the nice proprieties of language; but aims rather, on a very important subject, to make himself understood, while he describes a certain class of pernicious sentiments, which too often have been combined with religious belief. In another volume spurious and imaginative religious emotions were spoken off: our present task is to describe the various combinations of THE SAME SPURIOUS PIETISM with the MALIGN PASSIONS.

After quite rejecting from our account that opprobrious sense of the word Fanaticism which the virulent calumniator of religion and of the religious assigns to it, it will be found, as we believe, that the elementary idea attaching to the term in its manifold applications, is that of fictitious fervour in religion, rendered turbulent, morose or rancorous, by junction with some one or more of the unsocial emotions. Or, if a definition as brief as possible were demanded, we should say, that FANATICISM IS ENTHUSIASM INFLAMED BY HATRED.

A glance at the rise and reason of the irascible emotions will facilitate our future progress. Our subject being an instance of the combination of these emotions with other principles, we ought distinctly to have in view the elements; and to note also some of their coalescent forms.

The difficulty that attends analysis in the science of mind (science so called) belongs in a peculiar manner to those instances in which we endeavour to trace the original construction of passions or impulses that scarcely ever present themselves otherwise than in an exaggerated and corrupted condition. It is usual, if an object of philosophic curiosity be obscure or evanescent, to single out for examination the most marked examples of the class. But to take this course in an analysis of the passions is to seek for primitive elements where most they have lost their original form, and have suffered the most injury.

What the contour and symmetry of the moral form was, as it came from the hand of the Creator, may be more readily determined in the dry method of ethical definition, than vividly conceived of; and this is especially true of those emotions which imply the presence of evil. How delicate is the task—if indeed it be a practicable one, to trace the line between nature (in the best sense) and deformity—between the true and false, in these instances! And yet, not the most rancorous or foul of the malign sentiments can be thought any thing else than a disordered state of some power indispensable to the constitution of a rational and independent agent. We need then take care lest, in our haste to condemn what is evil, we should denounce as such that of which God himself is author, and which, if we think closely, cannot even be conceived of as altogether wanting in a being placed where man is placed.

Within a certain line there can however be no difficulty in deciding between good and evil. It is quite obvious that a passion or appetite, subservient to some specific purpose, is in an irregular state when it overpasses or fails to secure that purpose;—the end must give law to the means; and where the end may clearly be defined, the limit which the means should reach is not hard to ascertain. Either by EXCESS and too great intensity—or by PERVERSION, or misdirection from their proper object—or by PROLONGATION from momentary impulses to habits and permanent qualities, as well the animal appetites as the irascible passions assume a pernicious form, and derange the harmony of nature.

Which of the emotions or desires is it that may justly claim to be not subservient, but paramount, and may therefore safely be prolonged, and impart themselves as qualities to the mind. Nature distinctly informs us, by rendering them always agreeable; while some uneasiness, or even positive pain, is attached to the continuance of every one of those feelings which, in her intention, are only to measure out a momentary occasion, and which ought to rise and disappear in the same hour.

It is thus, we need hardly say, with the bodily appetites, which disturb the system (as well corporeal as mental) whenever they do more than accomplish their definite purpose. Indispensable as these impulses are to the machiery of life, they take a noxious quality when they are detained: their property should be to evaporate without residuum. Each, moreover, has its specific object, and throws every other function into disorder if it become fastidious; and each too must observe its due amount of force.

The same is true of all forms of the irascible emotions, and which never go beyond their purpose, and especially can never pass into dispositions, without vitiating the character. Each single instance of excessive excitement contributes, shall we say, the whole amount of its excess to the formation of a habit of the same class; and then these habits—emotions parted from their occasions, soon run into some sort of perversion, or become misdirected. Unoccupied desire strays from its path, and attaches itself perniciously to whatever objects it may meet. It is thus that human nature subsides into the most corrupted states. A certain mode of feeling is generated, of the utter unreasonableness of which the mind is dimly conscious, and to rid itself of the uneasy sense of being absurd, rushes on towards sentiments still more preposterous, that by their aid it may quite surround itself with false impressions, and lose all recollection of calm truths. As there is an intoxication of the animal appetites, so is there an intoxication of the malign passions; and perhaps if we could completely analyse some extreme instance of dark and atrocious hatred—hatred when it constitues the fixed condition of the soul, we should find that the miserable being has become what he is by the impulse of a perpetual endeavour to drown self-reproach and inward contempt in deeper and deeper draughts of the cup of poison.

Up to that point where the subordinate principles of our nature become transmuted into permanent qualities, imparting a character to the mind, it is easy to discern their reason and propriety as constituents of the physical and moral life: nor can we fail to perceive that each is attended with a provision for restraining it within due limits. Thus it is, as we have said, that while the machinery of animal life is impelled by the sense of pleasure which is attached to the brief activity of the appetites, an admonitory uneasiness attends the excessive indulgence or protracted excitement of them. Consistently with this same regard to ulterior purposes, the irascible emotions in their native state, are denied any attendant pleasurable sense; or at most so small an element of pleasure belongs to them, that the pain consequent upon their excess or their continuance is always paramount. The dash of gratification, if there be any, does but give momentary life to the rising energy, and then passes off.

The irascible passions can be allowed to have respect to nothing beyond the preservation of life, or of its enjoyments, in those unforeseen occasions when no other means but an instantaneous exertion of more than the ordinary force, both of body and mind, and especially of the latter, could avail for the purpose of defence:—anger is the safeguard of beings not housed, like the tortoise, within an impenetrable crust; and if man had been born cased in iron, or were an ethereal substance, he would probably have been furnished with no passionate resentments. Nevertheless every good purpose of such emotions has been answered when the faculties have received that degree and kind of stimulus which the exigency of the moment demanded; and their continuance must be always (if it were nothing worse) a waste and a perversion of power; since the conservative ends they may seem to have in view are far more certainly secured by other means when the sudden peril is gone by. Malign dispositions and vindictive habits are, shall we say, miserable incumbrances of the mind; as if a man would sustain the load of bulky armour, night and day, and carry shield and lance, though probably he will not encounter a foe once in the year. The checks of opinion, the motives of mutual interest; and at last the provisions of law, and the arm of the body politic, are in readiness to defend us from every aggression, those only excepted which must be repelled at the instant they are made, or not at all.

That brisk excitement of the faculties which a sudden perception of danger occasions, not merely bears proportion to the nearness and extent of the peril, but has a relation to its quality and its supposed origin. This excitement, to answer its end, must possess an affinity with the aggressive cause. The repellant power must be such as is the assailant power. A quick sympathy with the hostile purpose of an antagonist belongs to the emotion at the impulse of which we are to withstand his attack. Simple ear, and its attendant courage, are enough if the danger we have to meet arises from material causes only; or if a mechanical injury is all that is thought of. But anger, and the courage peculiar to anger, is called up when MIND contends with MIND, that is to say, when an injury is to be warded off which (whether truly so or not) we believe to spring from the inimical intention of a being like ourselves. In this case matter and its properties are forgotten, or are thought of as the mere instruments of the threatened harm, while we rouse ourselves to grapple, soul against soul with our foe.

For the very same reason that some knowledge, more or less accurate, of the laws of matter (whether acquired by the methods of science, or by common experience) is indispensable as our guide in avoiding or repelling physical evils, so is an intuition of motives necessary to our safety when it is a hostile purpose that originates the danger we are exposed to. Successfully to resist an impending harm, we must rightly conceive of its occult cause.

There may be those who would ask—"Why should we suppose these irascible emotions, liable as they are to abuse, and destructive as they often become, to be original ingredidients of our nature; or why needs man be furnished with any impulses more potent or complex than those given him as a defence against physical injuries?" The answer is not difficult.—An additional motive and a more vigorous spring is needed in the one case which is not requisite in the other, because the danger in the one is of a far more recondite quality than in the other, and demands a commensurate provision. If, for our safety, we must know to what extent, at what distances, and under what conditions, fire may destroy or torment us; we must, for a like reason, know the nature, extent, and conditions of the harm that may arise from the rage of a furious man. Now it does not appear that the extreme exigency of the moment could be met in any way so efficaciously—if at all, as by this sudden sympathy with the ill intention of our enemy—a sympathy which, as by a flash of consciousness, puts us into possession of his evil purpose. The rage or the malice of the aggressor, thus reflected (if dimly yet truly) upon the imagination of whoever is its object, informs him with the rapidity of lightning, of all he should prepare himself to meet. May we not properly admire the simplicity and the fitness of this machinery?

It is quite another question, and one which does not now press upon us—Whence comes that first malignant purpose or hostile intention against which the irascible emotions are provided? Evil existing as it does, we are here concerned only with the arrangement made for repelling it. Let it then be remembered, that inasmuch as the hostile powers of MIND are far more pernicious, because more various, insidious and pertinacious than those of matter (which can move only in a single direction) there is required more motive and more energy to resist them. Now this necessary accession of power is, might we say, borrowed for the moment when it is wanted, by sympathy from the aggressor. He who rises in fatal rage upon his fellow, does, by the contrivance of nature, and at the very instant of his violent act, put into the hand of his victim a weapon that may actually avert the stroke. The vicious and exaggerated condition in which these passions usually present themselves (a condition accidental, not necessary) should not prevent our assigning to the wisdom and benignity of the Creator what conspicuously exhibits both. And surely it is becoming to us to rescue (if so we may speak) the praise of the Supreme in those instances where most it is obscured by the evils that have supervened upon his work.

Yet all we see around us of the wisdom and benevolence of the Author of Nature, especially as displayed in the constitution of the sentient orders, would stand contradicted if it appeared that passionate resentments were otherwise than painful.* In fact we do not find them to be entertained as modes of gratification until after they have gone into the unnatural condition of permanent qualities; and even then the gratification, if such it can be called, is wrung out from the very torments of the heart. When indeed these dark emotions have formed alliance with imaginative sentiments, they at once lose a portion of their virulence, and borrow a sense of pleasure, which may become very vivid. Some remarkable cases of this sort our proper subject will lead us to consider.

There is, however, an instance that may seem to be at variance with our assumptions; and it is one which should be fairly looked at. Of what sort then is the pleasure of consummated revenge; and whence does it spring?—or must we trace it to the original constitution of the mind? To answer such a question we should go back to the elements of the moral sense. Let it then be remembered that this sense, indispensable as it is to rational agency and to responsibility, implies, not only a consciousness of pleasure in the view of what is good, benign, and generous; but an equal and correspondent feeling (necessarily painful) towards the opposite qualities, whether of single actions or of character. We cannot so much as form a conception of a moral sense that should possess one of these faculties apart from the other:—as well suppose the eye to be percipient of light, but unconscious of darkness. The power of approval is a nullity, if it do not involve a power of disapproval and disgust. What sort of languid and vague instinct were it, which, though capable of high delight in the comtemplation of virtue and beneficence, should look listlessly and without emotion upon the infliction of wanton torture, or upon acts of injustice, fraud, or impurity? We may indeed imagine a world into which no evils and no discords or deformities should gain admission; but it is impossible to conceive of sentient beings endowed with faculties of pleasure, such as should involve no power of suffering. Whoever would be capable of exalted happiness must undergo the possibility of misery, equally intense; or if the power of enjoyment be greater than the power of suffering, the whole amount of the difference is just so much torpor, or so much relaxation. A sense or faculty may indeed be numbed or paralyzed; but although such damage should secure an exemption from pain, no one would boast of it as a natural perfection.

The sense of fitness, whence arises our acquiescence in retributive proceedings, as well penal as remunerative, implies an uneasiness not to be dismissed, or even an intense consciousness of pain, so long as merited punishment is diverted, or delayed, or its ultimate arrival is held in doubt. Few emotions, perhaps none, are more racking than that which attends the indeterminate delay of righteous retribution. And then, as every faculty of pleasure involves a liability to pain, so does a sudden release from pain, mental or bodily, bring with it a sensation which, if we must hesitate to call it pleasure, it will be hard to designate at all.—Thus the extreme uneasiness that attends the delay of retribution, is, when at length relieved by the infliction of due punishment, followed by an emotion (very transient in benignant minds) which, if it may not be called pleasurable, must remain undescribed. We have only to add that, as the exaggerations of self-love render the common desire of retribution intense—shall we say intolerable, if self be the sufferer, so, and in the same degree, will the pleasurable sense of relief he enhanced when, after a doubtful delay, ample retribution alights on its victim.—The continuance, or the brief duration of this malign gratification might well be taken as a guage of the nobility or baseness of the mind that entertains it. If a generous spirit admits at all any such emotion, it will refuse to give it lodgment longer than a moment, and will gladly return to sentiments of compassion and forgiveness. On the contrary, a mind, by disposition and habit rancorous, derives from an achieved revenge a sweetness not soon spent, and which is resorted to year after year as a cordial.

So jealous is Nature of her constitutions, that she rigorously visits every infringement of them. To revolve or entertain any desire at a distance from its due occasion, and in the absence of its fit object, is always to undergo some degree of corruption of the faculties—a corruption which, if not checked, spreads as a canker even through the powers of animal life. All kinds of introverted mental action, even of the most innocent sort, are more or less debilitating to both mind and body, and trebly so when attended by powerful emotions. Might it not be said, that health—both animal and intellectual, is Emanative movement, or a progression from the centre, outwards: and is not disease a movement in the reverse direction? Assuredly those vices are the most destructive, the most rancorous, and the most inveterate, which are peculiarly meditative, or the characteristic of which is rumination.

By extending themselves beyond their immediate occasion, the irascible passions are quickly converted from acts into habits. Thus anger becomes petulance or hatred:—wrath slides into cruelty; disgust into moroseness; dislike into envy; and at last the whole course of nature is "set on fire;" or worse, undergoes the tortures of a slow and smothered combustion.

The transition of the passions from momentary energies to settled dispositions, does not advance far (much less does it reach its completion) without the aid of what may be termed a reverberative process, not very difficult to be traced. That quick sympathy which vivifies the impressions of anger, by attributing an ill intention to him who assails us, accompanies, and even in a higher degree, the same class of feelings in their transmuted form of permanent sentiments. A malign temper imputes to an adversary, not a momentary hostility; but an evil nature and a settled animosity like its own. The supposition takes its measure and its quality from the sentiment whence it springs; and as the irascible emotion has now become a constant mood of the mind, so is malignant character made over and assigned to whoever is its object. Evil passions at this stage, are fast attaining their maturity, and fail not soon to gain absolute mastery over the soul. The meditation of evil abroad, inflames evil at home: the infatuated being in idea challenges its adversary to take a lodgement even within the palpitating ramparts of the heart, so that the conflict may go on as an intestine war at all hours, and in all seasons: night does not part the combatants; nay rather is it then that, like other savage natures which stalk forth from their lairs in the dark, envenomed hatreds (while children of peace are sleeping) wake up, and rend their prey.

If anger be simply painful, hatred involves the very substance of misery. How should it then, we may ask, subsist in the human mind, the first instinct of which is the desire of happiness? Strong as is this instinct, it takes effect only under certain conditions. There are circumstances which impel us to hold even our love of enjoyment in abeyance, or which make us refuse to taste the least gratification until the disturbance of feeling that has happened is adjusted. Do not minds of a sensitive order repel every solicitation of pleasure so long as one beloved suffers; and this, even when the object of fondness is far distant, and quite beyond the reach of any active service? The happiness of those we love, if indeed we be capable of love, is an indispensable condition of our own. And there are other necessary conditions of personal peace, and some so inseparable from human nature that they can never be evaded. Of these we have already mentioned that which belongs to the Retributive sentiment, and which forbids us to rest while the author of a wrong enjoys impunity.

A sort of fascination leads on the tortured soul that is the victim of these feelings in a double line; on the one hand it eagerly pursues its desire of revenge; and on the other, labours with indefatigable zeal to establish its own conviction of the malignant nature of its adversary. In its efforts to obtain this double satisfaction, it revolves hourly all evidences, real or imaginary, of the innate atrocity of its foe; for if this point were but fully settled, SELF would be cleared of the imputation of wrong, and the arrival of retribution would seem so much the more probable. But far from reaching a definite conclusion of this sort, with which it might rest satisfied, and so return to the common enjoyment of life, the racked spirit feels from day to day that the very cogitation of its doubt only enhances the motives that give it force. Inflamed and insatiate, the distracted being returns ever and again to the salt stream that, at every draught, aggravates its thirst! In this fever of the heart the assuagement of the inward torment by the destruction of its adversary, is the only happiness it can think of.

And yet even the most extreme and deplorable instances that could be adduced of the predominance of the malignant passions, would serve to attest, at once, the excellence of the original constitution of human nature, and the indestructible property of its moral instincts. Not the most furious or irascible of men can indulge his passion until after he has attributed an ill intention to the object of his wrath. To be angry with that which is seen and confessed to be innoxious or devoid of hostile feeling, is a reach of malignity that lies beyond the range of human passions, even when most corrupted or most inflamed. How else can we account for the absurd use which the angry man makes of the prosopopæia when he happens to be hurt, torn or opposed by an inanimate object: the stone, the steel, the timber, which has given him a fall, or has obstructed his impatience, he curses on the hypothesis that it is conscious and inimical: nay, he would fain breathe a soul into the senseless mass, that he might the more reasonably revile and crush it.

* ——εἰ δὲ ἐσχὴ τοῖν τᾶς, τοῖ λυπεύμενοις.

And so, when hatred has become the settled temper of the mind, there attends it a bad ingenuity, which puts the worst possible construction upon the words, actions, looks of the abhorred object. Yet why is this but because the laws of the moral system forbid that any thing should be hated but what actually deserves, or is at the moment thought to deserve abhorrence? The most pernicious and virulent heart has no power of ejecting its venom upon a fair surface; it must slur whatever it means to poison. To hate that which is seen and confessed to be not wicked, is as impossible as to be angry with that which is not assumed to be hostile. And the most depraved souls, whose only element is revenge, feel the stress of this necessity not a whit less than the most benign and virtuous. Whether the universe any where contains spirits so malignant as to be capable of hating without assignment of demerit, or attributing of ill purpose to their adversary, we know not; but certainly man never reaches any such frightful enormity.*

What is the constant style of the misanthrope? What the burden of the dull echoes that shake the damps from the roof of his cavern? Is not his theme ever and again, the malignity, the cruelty, the falseness of the human race? To hate mankind is indeed his rule; but yet he must calumniate before he can detest it. Nature is here stronger than corruption, and a tribute is borne to the unalterable principles of virtue, even by those unnatural lips that breathe universal imprecations! How does the solitary wretch, prisoner as he is of his own malignity, toil from day to day in the work of ingenious detraction! how does he recapitulate and refute, untired the thousandth time, every alleged extenuation of human frailty or folly! How does he strive to justify the bad passion that rules him; how eagerly does he listen to any new proof of his poisonous dogma—That man is altogether abominable, and ought to be hated! Inwardly he feels the sheer absurdity of perpetual malice, and is always defending himself against the accusation of doing immense wrong to his species. But this very labour and this painful ingenuity refutes itself; for if human nature were, as he affirms it to be, simply and purely evil, his own bosom would not be thus tortured by the endeavour to prove mankind abominable, as a necessary condition of his malice. Most evident it is that if man were not formed to love what is good and follow virtue, he would find himself able to hate his fellows without first imputing to them wickedness and crimes.

There might be adduced a still more frightful case of malignancy, which, horrid as it is, furnishes the very same testimony in favour of the original benign structure of the human mind. If there are indeed miserable beings that harbour deliberate animosity against Him who is worthy of supreme affection, as well as reverence, yet this hatred must always be preceded by blasphemy. In word or in thought, there must be charged upon the Sovereign Ruler injustice, rigour, malevolence, before impiety can advance a step toward its bold and dread climax. Thus does the Supreme Benevolence secure and receive an implicit homage, even from the most envenomed lips; for why should the divine character be impeached, if it were not that the fixed laws of the moral world—those very laws of which God is author, forbid hatred to exist at all (at least in human nature) except on a pretext which is itself drawn from the maxims of goodness? What proof can be more convincing than this is, that these same maxims, these rules of virtue and benevolence, were actually the guiding principles of the creation, and must therefore belong as essential attributes to the Creator? If man, by the necessity of his nature, must calumniate and blacken whomsoever he would call his enemy, is it not because he is so constituted as to detest only what he thinks to be evil? The fact indeed is appalling, that rational agents should any where exist who can set themselves in array against the source and centre of all perfection. But how much more appalling, nay, how horrible a thing were it, to find any beings whose nature allowed them to hate the Sovereign Goodness without first defaming it!

The lower we descend into the depths of the malignant passions, the more striking are the proofs we meet with of the vigour of the prime principles of the moral life. There are, alas! scarcely any bounds to the degree of corruption or depravity which man may reach, but corruption or decay is something far less than destruction of elements; and no facts come within our sphere of observation which would imply that the original principles of the rational economy are in any case annulled. We have already spoken of the instinct of Retribution, or the vehement desire to see wrong visited with punishment; and we discern, in even the darkest purpose of revenge nothing more than a particular instance of this same instinct, inflamed and misdirected by preposterous self-love. No case can be more conclusive in proof of this position than the revenge of jealousy. When the firmest, and the most religious of the social ties has been torn asunder by the hand of ruthless lust, and an affection, more sensitive than any other, is left to bleed and ulcerate in open air, the inner structure of the vindictive passion may be said to be laid open, and it is seen in what way an emotion so violent as to lead to fatal acts, yet connects itself with virtuous sentiments, and in fact springs from them. The revenge of jealousy seems to the injured man to be justified at once by the best impulses of our nature, by the express sanction of God, by the opinion of mankind, and by the formal institutes of society. These authorities, or some of them, lend a palliation (deemed almost valid by the common feeling of men) even to deeds of a murderous kind; and they actually avail to put out of view the exaggerations which self-love has added to the sense of wrong. Thus it is that some, who, in no other case would for a moment harbour so hateful and torturing a passion, yield to its sway when thus injured, and feel as if uncondemned by even the strictest rules of virtue. It is true that principles of conduct of a higher kind are applicable, as well to this, as to all other instances of injury, and are fully adequate to assuage even so extreme a vindictive impulse. But whether they are actually brought to bear upon it or not, it is certain that the revenge of jealousy affords evidence that the elements of the moral system are the foundation of even the most fatal of the malignant passions, and in their most aggravated forms.

Let leave here be taken to draw an inference which suggests itself, bearing perhaps upon the future destinies of man. Does not then the history of human nature declare that all other emotions of the soul, as well as every inducement of interest or pride, may give way, and be borne down by the sovereign desire of retribution? Has not this feeling more than once impelled a father to consign his sons to the sword of public justice? Has it not strengthened the arm of a man, not murderous in disposition, to drive an assassin's sword into the heart of his friend? Has it not brought together an armed nation around the walls of a devoted city, the site of which, after being soaked with the blood of men, women, and babes, was to be covered with perpetual ruin? Does not this same robust instinct every day sustain the most humane minds in discharging the sad duty of conducting a fellow-man to death? We see, too, to what a degree of phrenzy the common desire of retribution may be inflamed by the suggestions of self-love. Now may it not be conceived of that an equal intensity of this emotion might be obtained by the means of some other sentiment than self-love, and by one more firm because more sound than the selfish principle? If so, then we have under our actual inspection powers which, in a future life, may be found vigorous enough to carry human nature through scenes or through services too appalling even to think or speak of. If, for example, it were asked—"Is it credible that man, his sensibilities being such as they are, should take his part, even as spectator, in the final procedures of the Divine Government?" We might fairly reply by referring to certain signal instances of the force of the vindictive passions, and on the ground of such facts assume it as possible that, whoever could go so far, might go further still. And this hypothetic inference would not be invalidated merely because revenge is malign and evil: for although it be so, the fulcrum of its power is nothing else than the unalterable laws of the moral world; we only want therefore a righteous motive to supplant the selfish one, and then an equal, or perhaps a much greater force, would be displayed by these same principles.

* The mere supposition may seem to be a contradiction in terms: that what is not hateful should be hated. But the analysis of emotions of this sort, if carried on a little further, brings us to some such notion as that of malignity separable from an object confessed to be odious.

If it be allowable to advance to this point, we then shall need only one more idea to give distinctness to our conception of the retributive processes of the future world;—and it is this—that the infatuations of self-love, which, in the present state, defend every mind from the application to itself of the desire of retribution—in the same manner as the principle of animal life defends the vital organs of a body from the chemical action of its own caustic secretions—that these infatuations, we say, being then quite dispersed, the Instinct of Justice—perhaps the most potent of all the elements of the spiritual life, shall turn inward upon each consciously guilty heart, so that every such heart shall become the prey of a reflected rage, intense and corrosive as the most virulent revenge! Whoever is now hurrying on without thought of consequences through a course of crimes, would do well to imagine the condition of a being left without relief to breathe upon itself the flames of insatiable hatred!

SECTION III.

ALLIANCE OF THE MALIGN EMOTIONS WITH THE IMAGINATION.*

If nature denies to the irascible passions any attendant sense of pleasure, she absolutely refuses them also, at least in their simple state, the power of awakening the sympathy, or of exciting the admiration of those who witness their ebullition. These harsh elements of the moral system must be taken into combination with the sentiments of a different, and a happier order, and must almost be concealed within such sentiments, before they can assume any sort of beauty, or appear in splendour. That such combinations do actually take place, and in conformity too with the intentions of nature, is true; but it is true also, that by the very means of the mixture, the worse or rancorous element is vastly moderated and refined. Let it be granted, for example, that wars have often originated in the military ambition and false thirst of glory to which certain gorgeous sentiments give an appearance of virtue. This may be true, but can we easily estimate the degree in which war universally has been softened and relieved in its attendant horrors, by the corrective influence of these very mixed emotions, extravagant and false as they are? And is it certain that there would have been altogether less bloodshed on earth, if mere sanguinary rage, and if the cupidity of empire, had been left to work their ends alone? For every thousand victims immolated at the altar of martial pride, have not ten thousand been rescued by the noble and generous usages that have belonged to the system of warfare among all civilized nations? Surely it may be said that, unless the imaginative sentiments had thus blended themselves with the destructive passions, the ambition of men would have been like that of fiends, and the human family must long ago have suffered extermination.

Ideas of chivalrous virtue and of royal magnanimity (ideas directly springing from the imagination) much more than any genuine sentiments of humanity, have softened the ferocious pride of mighty warriors. For though it may be true that some sparks or rare flashes of mere compassion have, once and again, gleamed from the bosoms of such men; yet assuredly if good will to their fellows had been more than a transient emotion, the sword would never have been their toy. But the imaginative sentiments are a middle power, in the hands of nature, which, because they may be combined more readily than some higher principles with the gross and dark ingredients of the human mind, serve so much the better to chasten or ameliorate what cannot be quite expelled. Except for emotions of this order, Alexander would have been as Tamerlane, and Tamerlane as the Angel of Death.

The beneficial provisions of Nature are especially to be observed in one remarkable fact—namely—that the alliance of the malign passions with the Imagination—an alliance from which the former draw both their mitigation, and an extension of their field, is not permitted to take place upon the narrow ground of self-love. This fact, for such we deem it, deserves to be distinctly noticed.

Nothing appears too great, sometimes, to be grasped by the conceits of self-importance; nothing too big for the stomach of vanity: and yet it is found that the Imagination refuses to yield itself, except for a moment, or in a very limited degree, to those excitements that are drawn from the solitary bosom of the individual. Man, much as he may boast himself, is by far too poor at home to maintain the expense of his own splendid conceptions of personal greatness. Not even when he revolves the vast idea of his immortality, is he able to accumulate the materials of sublimity, without looking abroad and beyond himself, in search of objects fitted to quicken the emotions of greatness and dignity. And yet surely if any idea, purely selfish, had power to call up and sustain such emotions, the idea and the hope of endless existence might do so. But whenever we meditate upon eternity, and think of our own part in it, we dwell much more upon the scenes, the personages, and the events it shall connect us with, than conceive of ourselves, simply, as destined to live for ever. It is no wonder then if this same rule holds good, when nothing beyond the present scene of things is contemplated. We can hardly err in assigning the reason of a mechanism so remarkable. If human nature had been so constituted as that the imaginative emotions could have found sufficient range within the lone precincts of the soul, and if there had been opened to every one (or at least to heroic spirits) a world of splendid illusions—such that he should have had no need to look abroad, man must have become, in a frightful sense, an insulated being; nor perhaps would any other impulse, drawn either from his wants, his fears, or his affections, have availed to connect him firmly and permanently with his fellows. No conception much more appalling can be entertained than that of a proud demigod, who, finding an expanse of greatness within his own bosom—an expanse wherein he could take ample sweep, and incessantly delight himself, should start off from the populous universe, and dwell content in the centre of an eternal solitude!

It may well be assumed as probable that the Creator has granted to none of his rational family the prerogative of so fatal a sort of self-sufficiency. Assuredly no such power is granted to man. Even those instances that may seem the most nearly to approach the idea just now mentioned, do in fact, when accurately looked at, support the general principle. The man of the wilderness, for example, is still a social being, though in a very perverted manner; and we should find convincing proof of the fact if we could only listen to those often rehearsed and monotonous soliloquies of which the great world—its noise, its vanity, and its corruptions are

* The copiousness of our subject must exclude whatever does not directly conduce to its illustration. Otherwise it would be proper here to mention those complex dispositions which spring from the union of the malignant passions with the elements of individual character. The irascible sentiment, for example, takes a specific form from the peculiarities of the animal structure. Combined with conscious mucular vigour, and a sanguineous temperament, it becomes a stormy rage, and constitutes either the bully, or the dread devastator of kingdoms, as circumstances may determine. The same irascibility, joined with a feeble constitution, begets petulance, in those various forms which depend upon the particular seat of debility; namely, whether it be the nervous system—the arterial system—the mesenteric glands—the liver, or the stomach; each of which imparts a peculiarity to the temper. An attentive observer of the early development of character will also leave room, in any theory of the passions he may construct, for a hitherto unexplored and undefined influence of conformation—ought we to say of the brain, or of the mind? How much soyer (from various motives) any might wish to simplify their philosophy of human nature, and especially to exclude from it certain facts which give rise to painful perplexities, they can do so only (as we think) by refusing to turn the eye toward the real world.

After receiving their first characteristic from the physical temperament, the malign emotions next ally themselves with the instinct of self-love, and generate either a sullen and obdurate pride, which makes every other being an enemy, as a supposed impugner of rights and honours that are its due; or else (and especially as combined with derangement of the hepatic functions) begets a rabid jealousy or reptile envy—passions of the most wretched natures! Our modern intellectual science yet wants a term to serve in the place of that theologico-metaphysic one—THE WILL. Analysis must be pushed a little further than it has gone before the deficiency can be well supplied. Meanwhile let us say that the malign passions have a characteristic alliance with "the will"—an alliance if not clearly to be distinguished from those it forms with self-love, yet distinct enough to arrest attention. As a single example we might name that undefined, and not easily analysed, cruelty or wanton and tranquil delight in torments, bloodshed, and destruction, which has given a dread notoriety to some few names in history. In such cases it has seemed as if the spontaneous principle would prove its force and its independence in the mode that should, more effectively than any other, make all men confess it to be free. Instances of malignity meet us which are at once too placid to be charged entire upon the irascible emotions, and too vague to be accounted for by the inducements of either selfishness or pride, and which, if they do not declare the presence of a determining cause that has no immediate dependence upon assignable motives, must remain quite unexplained.

the theme. Yes, he congratulates himself anew every day that mankind is far remote from his cell. But why can he not drop this reference altogether? Why not cease to think of what he does not see—does not feel! It is because the gloomy and vexed imagination of the solitary—spite of itself, can find none but the faintest excitements within its own circle, and so is driven to roam abroad in search of stimulants. The world, we may be assured, is as indispensable a material to the enthusiasm of the anchoret as it is to that of the busiest and most ambitious votary of fame. Only let some breathless messenger—like those that brought tidings of dismay to the Arabian patriarch, reach the cavern of the hermit and announce to him that his love of solitude was at length effectively and for ever sealed by the utter extinction of the human race;—solitude, from that instant, would not merely lose all its fancied charms, but would become terrible and insufferable; and this man of seclusion, starting like a maniac from his wilderness, would run round the world, in search, if happily it might be, of some straggling survivors!

Nor is it a few foreign materials that are enough to give effect to the alliance of the imagination with the selfish principle. A vigorous enthusiasm must embrace a broad field. Thus patrician pride, and the arrogance of illustrious blood must not only go very far back, but stretch itself very widely too, before it can acquire the alacrity or the force that distinguishes imaginative sentiments. The pride of ancestry is a sullen grace, and has always about it an air akin to melancholy or depression. The enthusiasm of the very meanest member of a warrior-clan is tenfold more animate than that of the head of a house laden with the decorations of heraldry. In the former instance the imagination grasps the compass of the community of which the individual is a part: in the latter, one slender line, terminating in self, is all that engages the fancy; and it is in vain, with so attenuated an object only in view, that pride chides itself for its dull and sluggish movements. The chief must think of his people more than of his ancestry, if he would, on any special occasion, gain a powerful spring of action. In truth it is more as a chief than as the offspring and representative of an illustrious stock, that the energetic patrician exults in his distinctions, and achieves deeds worthy of the name he bears.

Martial enthusiasm especially demands the social elements as its ground:—and here we reach that very compound sentiment which, as to its construction, stands immediately parallel with religious rancour and Fanaticism. The one species of ardent emotion differs from the other more in adjuncts and objects, than in innate quality or character. The battle-fury of the CLAN is only self-love, inflamed by hatred, and expanded, by aid of the imagination, over the width of the community with which the individual consorts. It is this envenomed enthusiasm that renders the CHIEF of the horde (as visible centre of all emotions) the object of a more zealous and efficient idolatry than is offered to the GOD of the horde: and it is this that lends a measure of nobility and importance to even the most abject son of the tribe. It is this feeling which knits the phalanx, shoulder to shoulder, when the marshalled family advances to meet its ancient rival in the field. It is this passion—the enthusiasm of gregarious rage, that puts contempt upon death, gives a brazen firmness to the nerves when torture is to be endured, seals the lips in impenetrable secresy when a trust has to be preserved; and, in a word, imparts to human nature a terrible greatness, which we are compelled at once to abhor and to admire.

What is the clangorous music of barbarous armies—what the rhapsodies of their poetry, but the modulated expressions of a ferocity which the imagination has already inflamed, ennobled, purified, and softened? Shall the frigid philosopher affirm that music and poetry are incentives to the destructive battle passions? It is true that they are; yet take away such incentives, and man is thrown back upon his mere malignity, and becomes more dreadful to his species than a tiger.

But the imagination has a limit beyond which it does not vigorously act. If it is not, as we have said, to be stimulated by ideas merely selfish, it becomes, on the other hand, languid, or ceases to exert an efficient influence over the passions, when the field of its exercise is very much extended. The men of a mighty empire that embraces many and various tribes, know little of the intense patriotism or of the unconquerable courage that distinguishes the heroes of a petty clan, or small community. Self, in this case, cannot retain its hold of an aggregate so vast; and although the object be immensely greater, the motive is incomparably less than in the other instance. If it were not that general intelligence and a better knowledge of the science of government, and more skill in war, ordinarily come in with extended empire to supply the place of personal enthusiasm, the history of nations would present (in a perpetual series) what in fact it has often presented—the destruction or subjugation of larger social bodies by the smaller. But thus is the great polity of mankind balanced:—men possess vastly more individual motive, and more spontaneous power, as members of a small than of a large community. Meanwhile the greater bodies have at command, not only a larger sum of physical force, but more knowledge, and principle, and order, than often exists in petty states. So it is that the small and the great coexist upon the same surface; and that the course of conquest has been alternate—in one age a fraction has broken up the mass—in another the mass has absorbed the fractions.

It may subserve our purpose to compare still more distinctly the steady martial temper that ordinarily belongs to the armies of a great empire, with the ferocious or desperate valour that distinguishes the warriors of a horde, a canton, or a petty republic. The first (extraordinary occasions excepted) is a calm perfunctory courage, drawing much more of its motive from usage, opinion, and reasons of interest or honour, than from the impulse of the malignant passions. An accomplished general of such an army excludes from his calculation of what may be effected by the tremendous engine which he wields, the rage or the rancour of the individual combatants. But, on the contrary, this very malus animus constitutes the principal ingredient in the bravery of the clan; and it does so because the human mind readily admits, under these circumstances, of an exaltation, which, in the other case, nothing can produce short of the most unusual excitements. The irascible passions are not to be raised to a height unless self-love, in some form, is immediately engaged in a quarrel; but the vast interests of an empire, and the immensity of an army that covers a province, and that is never seen as a whole, are quite disproportioned to the share each individual may have in the public weal. And then, as every one of the sentiments that infuse generosity into the practice of war, draws much of its force from the imagination, they will of course exist in the greatest vigour where the imagination is the most wrought upon. There are however very few minds, or they are minds only of the largest capacity and of the finest conformation, that can derive the stimulants of a vigorous enthusiasm from the idea of an extensive empire. On the other hand, few minds are so insensitive as not to entertain a degree of such enthusiasm when the various emotions of patriotism and civil affection spring up from a space that may all be seen at once from the summit of a hill.

And it is on the very same principle, as we shall find, that Fanaticism must attach itself always to a limited order of things, and is necessarily factious. What is fanaticism but rancorous Enthusiasm? And inasmuch as enthusiasm springs from the imagination, it must embrace a circle just wide enough to give it powerful impulse, and yet not too wide to exhaust its forces.

The valour of the clan not only stands parallel with religious fanaticism; that is to say, has one and the same Natural History; but is most often found in combination with it. The two classes of passion are so nearly allied that the one readily follows upon the other. The vehement patriotism of the horde or little free state puts the minds of men into a ferment that will not long fail to introduce the stirring conceptions of Invisible Power: and when so brought in, the two ingredients become intimately blended:—the civil and the religious frenzy form a compact sentiment of such vivacity as to carry human nature—if the solecism might be admitted, above and beyond the range of human agency. While the gods have been hovering over a field of carnage, the intrepidity of men has risen to the audacity of immortals; and their ferocity has resembled the rage of fiends!

Although it may be true, and we confidently assume it to be so, that a beneficial mitigation and refinement of the grosser elements of our nature accrues from their alliance with imaginative sentiments, yet it does by no means follow that such sentiments ought to supplant the genuine principles of morals, wherever these may take effect. No one would maintain such a doctrine in the abstract; nevertheless, when we turn to the real world, we find that true virtue and piety have always had to contend (and often with little success) against those splendid forms of excellence which are but vice in disguise, and which owe all their specious graces and fair colours to the admixture we are speaking of.

The unalterable maxims of rectitude, purity and mercy, such as we find them in the Scriptures, being well understood and firmly instated in their just authority, then indeed we may allow the imagination to take the part that belongs to it as the general cement—or as the common medium of the various ingredients of animal, social, and intellectual life. There meets us however a special difficulty in assigning its proper office to this faculty when it comes to mingle itself, as it readily does, with the malign emotions; and this embarrassment is much enhanced by those modes of feeling which are found to have got possession of every lettered people. How large a portion of the pleasurable excitement that attends the reading of history springs directly from the recommendations which vindictive or inexorable passions borrow from imaginative emotions! Then in the world of fiction—dramatic or poetic, perhaps half of the power which such creations possess over the mind is attributable to the same cause. The moralist and the preacher (especially when he has to do with the educated classes) and if he would discharge his office without showing favour to inveterate prejudices, finds that he has to loosen many of the most cherished associations of sentiment, and must denounce as purely evil very much that is passionately admired, and will be eagerly emulated.

To affirm in absolute and exclusive terms that the irascible passions ought in no case to be allowed to blend with the imagination, so as may fit them to enkindle emotions of pleasure or admiration, would be going very far, and might bring an argument into serious embarrassments. We stop short then of so stern a conclusion, and shall urge only this more general rule, that the principles of benevolence, and of forbearance, and meekness, and gentleness, and humility, as taught in the discourses of Christ, and as enforced by his apostles, should in all instances to which they are clearly applicable, be carried fully home, notwithstanding the repugnance of certain modes of feeling commonly honoured as generous and noble; and moreover that every one professing obedience to the Gospel should exercise an especial vigilance toward that entire class of sentiments over which profane history, romance, poetry, and the drama, have shed a glory.

The time perhaps shall come—nay we devoutly expect it, when by the universal diffusion of a sound and pure Ethics—the ethics of the Bible, no room shall be left, no need shall be felt for the chastening influence which hitherto the imagination has exerted over the ferocious dispositions of mankind. Yes, an age shall come, when the gods and heroes of history shall hasten to those shades of everlasting forgetfulness which have closed upon their patrons—the gods and heroes of mythology. In the same day the charm of fiction shall be dissolved, and the gaudiness of false sentiment, in all kinds, shall be looked at with the cold contempt which now we bestow upon the follies of false worship. Then, too, the romance (as well practical as literary) of this nineteenth century shall be bound in the bundle that contains the decayed and childish fables of olden times, and both together shall be consigned, without heed or regret, to sheer oblivion.

The slow but sure progress of society brings with it many substitutions of this sort, in which a less rational principle of action gives way to one that is more so. At the present moment we occupy just that mid-way position which, while it allows us to gaze with idle curiosity upon the blood-stained stage of chivalry, and upon the deluged field of lawless ambition, quite forbids that any such modes of conduct should find a place among us as living realities. We are too wise and virtuous to give indulgence to that to which we largely give our admiration! May not yet another step or two be taken on the path of reason, and then we shall cease even to admire that which we have long ceased to tolerate?

So already it has actually happened in relation to those malign and sanguinary religious excitements which a few centuries ago kindled entire communities, and inflamed kings and mendicants, nobles and serfs, priests and wantons, abstracted monks and the dissolute rabble, with one purpose of sacred ambition. Though we now peruse with wonder and curiosity the story (for example) of the Crusades, there are very few readers in the present day—perhaps hardly one, who can rouse up a sympathy with that vehement feeling which was the paramount motive of the enterprise. Only let us strip the history of the crusades of all its elements of martial and secular glory, and the simple religious residue—the proper fanaticism of the drama, would scarcely touch any modern imagination. How much more is this true of those horrid crusades of which the internal enemies of the Church of Rome have, at different times, been the victims! All feeling of alliance with the illusions that gave impulse to such abhorrent intestine wars has (do we assume too much?) utterly passed away, nor could by any means be rekindled; and the two emotions of pity for the sufferers, and of detestation of the actors in the scenes of fratricide, are the only sentiments which the narrative can call up. Yet there was a time when men—born of women, and fashioned like ourselves—yes, and men softened by education, and not uninformed by Christianity—saints and doctors, delicate recluses, and unearthly contemplatists—men who slept only three hours in the twenty-four, and prayed six or ten—when such men gave all the passion of their souls, and all the eloquence of their lips, to the work of hunting thousands of their fellows, innocent and helpless, into the greedy fires of the Church!

Thus it appears that the very order of sentiment which once was allowed and lauded as magnanimous, and even divine, we have learned to regard as either purely ridiculous, or as abominable. A like reprobation inevitably awaits (if mankind is really advancing on the road of virtue) every mode of feeling which, being essentially malevolent, draws specious colours from the imagination. That which is true and just, in conduct and character, must at lenght supplant whatever, if stripped of its decorations, is loathsome or absurd. So certainly as the calm reason of Christianity spreads itself through the world, will the ground fall in beneath the gorgeous but tottering edifice of spurious imaginative virtue. Let but the irresistible process go on a little further, and it will become as impracticable to uphold in credit the still extant opinion which admits of honour without justice or purity, and of magnanimity without benevolence, and of that thirst of glory which is sheer selfishness, as it would be now, after the mechanic arts have reached an unthought-of perfection, to keep in use the cumbrous hand-machines of the last century.

Much of the conventional law, and many of the usages of private life, and especially the unwritten code of international policy, have yet to undergo a revolution as great perhaps as that which makes the difference between the twelfth and the eighteenth centuries. All the vices, and all the talents, and all the institutions interested in the preservation of corrupt practices may oppose the advance of this renovation; but nothing short of the overthrow of Christianity and of civilization can arrest its progress. Nature (we use the word in a religious sense) NATURE is here at work with her noiseless mighty hand; whatever is spurious is marked already for oblivion, and moves on to its home.

SECTION IV.

FANATICISM THE OFFSPRING OF ENTHUSIASM; OR COMBINATION OF THE MALIGN EMOTIONS WITH SPURIOUS RELIGIOUS SENTIMENTS.

The Imagination, when inflamed by anger, or envenomed by hatred, exerts a much more decisive influence over the active principles and the character of men than otherwise ever belongs to it. Or we might rather say, that by the aid of those strenuous elements of our nature, imaginative sentiments extend their empire, and bring under their sway minds of a robust order which would never have yielded to any softer impulses. A thousand fanatics have run their course of mischief who would have spurned religious motives altogether in the simple form of enthusiasm. Rancour has been the true reason of their religion, and its rule and end.

And as the empire of spurious religious sentiments is greatly extended by their alliance with the malignant passions, so do they acquire, from the same quarter, far more energy than they could boast in their simple state. A malign Enthusiasm carries human nature to the very extreme boundaries of emotion possible to man; nothing which the heart may know lies beyond the circle occupied by fanatical extravagance; and this circle of vehement sentiments includes many enormities of feeling or of conduct of which scarcely a sample is to be found in a country and in an age like our own.

In truth, little more than the trite surface of human nature meets the eye among a people like ourselves. Our theories and system of morals hardly take account of upper and lower instances, while they are busied with what may be found in the mid region of mixed and moderate passions. Living as we do under the meridian of caution and mediocrity, history, when most faithful, often sounds like romance; or even if we give credit to its narrations, we regard its lessons as of little practical significance now, inasmuch as whatever is virulent or terrible has fallen, we think, from the usage of mankind.

It has become somewhat difficult even to place ourselves so far in sympathy with extreme emotions as is necessary for understanding them. In all things what is profound has given way to what is familiar; or what once was fact is now thought of only as fit subject for fiction. Men of the present age are care-worn much oftener than melancholy; merry or jovial, rather than joyous; sagacious or ingenious, more than meditative; and so keenly attached to the passing moment, as to throw up their interest as well in the past as in the future. Order, custom, and utility, set bounds—and very narrow bounds to all modes of conduct: the spirit of raillery quenches, or imposes a disguise upon whatever emotions are not trivial. It is not indeed to be regretted that the firm constitutions of society, in modern times, and its established notions, repress or confine so much as they do the profounder and more virulent impulses of the soul. But the fact of this change and improvement should always be kept in mind when the power of such emotions is to be calculated, or when conjecture is employed upon the possible events of another age. A free and equal government (and this is its praise) supersedes, nay almost extinguishes the stronger passions. Private life, happily is too secure, and public affairs are too well settled, to afford those sudden and extraordinary excitements which awaken the latent energies of men. It is despotism, plunging a ruthless hand into the bosom of domestic peace—it is ambition, immolating a thousand victims in an hour—it is popular fury, led on or repulsed by a single arm, that display the expansive force of the human mind when urged to the utmost excess of feeling.

Even those visible and natural excitements of the imagination, whence the deeper passions are wont to draw much of their vigour, are denied to us. England has all the beauties of picture; but they are beauties in miniature. What we look upon around us is the scenery of poetry, rather than of tragedy. And it is a fact, if not constant, yet ordinary, that those portentous corruscations of the passions which ally themselves readily with the imagination, have burst out from the thick gloom of a frowning nature. Such excesses have chiefly appeared where awful scenery, or extreme violences of climate have seemed well to comport with egregious sentiments and frenzied actions. Man (that is to say when once effectively roused to action) acts quite another part than we think of, if his lot be to roam through howling solitudes—to traverse boundless and burning sands—to hide himself among cloud-covered precipices—to gaze upon the unalterable and intolerable splendour of the sky;—if often he stand aghast amid the earthquake or the hurricane, or be overtaken by sultry tempests, fraught with suffocation. It is in the heart of forests that are the ancient domain of enormous reptiles, or of savage beasts—it is where horror and death lurk in the way, that the darker passions reach their fullest growth, and are to be seen in their proper force. All the principal or most characteristic forms of fanaticism have had their birth beneath sultry skies, and have thence spread into temperate climates by transportation, or infection.

No such rule must be assumed as absolute—few rules that relate to human nature are so, but it is one as uniform as most, that where neither reason, nor the genuine affections, but imagination, acts as the prime impulse in religion, the malign emotions are found in close attendance, and seldom fail to convert spurious piety into an energetic rancour. Then again this rancour reacts upon the enthusiasm whence it sprang;—the child schools the parent (an inverted order of things not unusual where the progeny has much more vigour than the parent). Enthusiasm, when it has come to sustain Fanaticism, is far more darkly coloured, is more profound, more mysterious, than the illusory piety that has no such load upon its shoulders. Things bright and fair, although unreal, are the chosen objects of this; but the other asks whatever is terrific and destructive. This sort of transmutation of sentiments, which happens when the enthusiast becomes the fanatic—when malignity is shed upon illusion, much resembles what often takes place in feverish sleep;—who has not seen in his dreams, splendid and smiling pageants, gradually relinquishing the brilliant colours they first showed, just as if the summer's sun were sinking from the skies;—but presently a murky glimmer half reveals menacing forms; and in the next moment some horrid and gory phantom starts forth, and becomes master of the scene!

The false religion then of the Fanatic includes elements not at all known to the mere Enthusiast; and before we descend to the particular instances it will be advantageous to ascertain the general (if not universal) characteristics of the spurious malign Religion which animates his bosom;—they may be reduced to three capital articles; namely, 1st. A deference to Malignant Invisible Power; 2d. The natural consequence of such a deference—rancorous contempt or detestation of the mass of mankind, as religiously cursed and abominable; and 3d. The belief of corrupt favouritism on the part of Invisible Powers, towards a sect or particular class of men; and this partiality is the antithesis of the relentless tyranny of which all other men are the objects.

I. We have named—A Deference, or religious regard to Malign Invisible Powers, whether Supreme or Subordinate, which will be found to enter, as primary ingredient, into every form of Fanaticism, ancient and modern, and may well be called its Germ.

To believe that evil has affected other races of rational agents besides the human, and that such depraved and malignant beings, though unseen, infringe in some manner upon the human system—is one thing: and it is a belief which reason admits, and revelation confirms; but either to impute in any sort, malignancy to the Supreme Power, or to make subordinate malignant powers the objects of deference, direct or indirect, or to grant to their agency the prime place among religious notions, is quite another thing; and it is a perversion of this sort, more or less gross, and more or less apparent, which imparts force to every species of rancorous religious sentiment.

On a field like this the imagination, if it be troubled by a gloomy temper, or made turgid by fierce passions, and especially if it be saddened by actual sufferings, will never want scope or fail of excitements. Nothing less in fact than the hope which it is the prerogative of true religion to impart can bar the entrance of the mind into this realm of fear—a realm upon which mankind has in every age eagerly sought to make incursions. If we are to employ phrases in accordance with the facts which history presents, we are bound to affirm that the Natural Religion of man, is the fear and service of Malignant Powers. Gloomy superstition springs up involuntarily in the human mind, depraved as it is, and exposed to so many pains, wants, and cruelties, and liable withal to death. Man does not become religious by mere force of gratitude: the unnoticed benefits of every hour lead him not to the shrine of the Supreme Beneficence: it is danger and sorrow that drive him to the altar. The necessities and miseries of the animal frame—the confusion and misrule that prevail in the social system—the stifled sense of guilt in every bosom, and the boding of future punishment, as well as the hatreds which woe and oppression cherish, are active and pungent elements, working in the soul with incomparably more force than belongs to the mild sentiments that may be engendered either by the spectacle of the order and beauty of the material world, or by the fruition of the common goods of life.

The theism of philosophers has never availed to counteract that natural tendency which draws on mankind to the worship of Evil Powers. Neither the ancient nor the modern systems of abstract philosophy have taken any strong hold of the spirits of men; and the failure has happened, not so much because such systems were too refined or too abstruse for vulgar apprehension; but because they have not made provision for the actual position of man in the present state. Sages have announced the Divine perfections, and there have stopped;—but to bring these perfections to bear, in any mode of effective relief, upon the guilt and sorrows of mankind, was a problem quite beyond their power. Let it be granted that philosophical theism may be true in some far distant upper sphere; but on Earth it serves to explain nothing; it assuages no trouble; it is no more applicable to the real occasions of life, than are the dreams of the poet. The sage and the poet must alike be looked upon as mere men of idleness and speculation;—their theories of the world—the one abstruse, the other gorgeous, ask to be carried back many ages, or carried forward as many, before space can be found where they may be lodged. Stern experience indignantly or contemptuously rejects both.

Of all the popular modes which have been devised for counteracting the tendency of mankind to malign superstition, that embodied in the mythology of the people of Greece may claim to have been the most successful, as well as the most rich and splendid. This system of worship—not so much the work of design, as the spontaneous product of the national mind, avoided provoking the resentment of tortured hearts by giving a direct contradiction to gloomy surmises;—it did not interdict sanguinary superstition; but rather occupied beforehand the elements of terror, and worked them up as the materials of its supernatural machinery. No example can be adduced, from any other quarter, of so skilful a substitution of the sublime and beautiful for the terrific. Delicious intellectual voluptuousness, with poetry, and the drama, with painting, architecture and sculpture, as its ministers, got the start of the violent passions, and of natural terrors; and without insulting human woe (as philosophy does) and without giving license to ferocious impulses, as was done by the oriental superstitions, it soothed every harsh feeling by the insinuating fascinations of melody, symmetry, and colour. The Grecian imaginative theology, after having preoccupied the human mind by its exquisite forms of ideal, or visible and tangible beauty, gave audience to the more fierce and malign emotions in their subdued and tranquil hour: or it brought them over unconsciously to such a mood.—Orpheus was immortal in Greece, and always present in the temples to lull the angry or destructive desires of the rude populace. The lion and the leopard are seen stalking along, if sullen, yet pacified, in the processions of revelry and joy.

The Malignant Powers had indeed their titles and images, and temples in Greece; but their tyranny was not permitted; and in accordance with this proscription the priestly order was denied the means of extending its power. Nothing dark or cruel was suffered, in a crude form, to irritate the minds of the people. Although Fanaticism could not be absolutely excluded from the land of beauty, it received there more effectual modifications than any where else—the very circle of pure and true religion excepted. Hesiod, Pindar, Homer, Æschylus, Sophocles, Apelles, Phidias, were in fact, though not in form, the Priests of the Grecian worship, and the doctors of its theology; and if they did not professedly teach religious truth, they yet disarmed religious error very much of its evil influence.

Historical justice demands that when the absurdities and the impurity of Grecian polytheism (both indeed very gross) are spoken of, its extraordinary influence in allaying the violence of fanaticism should be distinctly admitted. On this ground no other superstition of the nations can at all come into comparison with it. The same justice should moreover lead us to acknowledge—to acknowledge with bitter grief, that, in later times, the corruptions of the Jewish and Christian systems imparted a virulence of fanaticism, such as the contemporaries of Socrates and Plato would have shuddered to think of. The arrogant misanthropy of the Jew—the relentless intolerance of the Mohammedan, and most of all, the insatiate bigotry of the Papist, were forms of evil, new to the world when they severally appeared, and gave an appearance of reason to the calumnies of philosophers, who affirmed that the western nations had discarded the ancient mythology to their cost.

II. The conceptions we form of the Divine Being, and our feelings toward our fellow men, are always dependent one upon the other. As well by natural influence, as by mere contagion of sentiments, a belief in malignant divinities, or an imputation of malevolence in any form, to the Supreme Being, brings with it the supposition that the mass of mankind, or at least that certain portions of mankind, are the objects and the victims of Divine malediction; and therefore may be, or ought to be, contemned, tormented, destroyed.

Is it theory only, or is it matter of history, that Malign Theology has invariably been followed at hand by intolerance, execrations, cruelties? Or whichever may have been precursor, the other has quickly come up. Nor is a simple association all, for the style of the theoretic error will be found to have comported with the character of the practical mischief. Thus it is that, as the belief in malevolent divinities, or the imputation of malevolence (under any disguise of abstract terms) to the Supreme Being, contradicts or distorts the genuine notion of sovereign and impartial Justice, to the tribunal of which nothing is amenable but crime, so the correspondent feeling towards mankind which such a belief engenders, is not that of righteous disapprobation on the score of moral offences, but that of detestation or abhorrence, on the mysterious ground of ecclesiastical impurity. It is not as the transgressors of a holy law, but as the reprobate of Heaven, that men in particular, or that nations are to be shut out from the circle of our charities. The multitude or herd of mankind is spurned as abominable, much more than as guilty. And when once so grievous a perversion of feeling has taken place, then the whole of the force which belongs to our instinctive notions of retribution, or to our acquired belief of future judgment, is thrown into the channel of our sectarian aversions; and this force, like a mountain torrent, in so passing from an open to a narrow bed, gains new impetuosity.—Ingenuous disapproval becomes covert rancour: virtuous indignation slides into implacable revenge; and acrid scorn completely excludes, not only all indulgence towards the frailty of men, but all compassion for their sorrows.

A sense of justice founded on genuine notions of the Divine character and government, does not carry the mind further than to a mournful acquiescence in the infliction of due punishment upon the guilty. But it is quite otherwise with that perverted feeling which, while it draws its animation from hatred, derives its swollen bulk from the imagination.—The imagination inflamed by malignity, respects no bounds in its demand of vengeance. The very essence of Justice, which is strictly to observe a limit, scandalizes the fanatic, who must heap terror upon terror, and still fails to satisfy his conception of what might be fitting, as the doom of the accursed objects of his contempt. There is in the human mind, when profoundly moved, a strange eagerness to reach the depths of the most appalling ideas;—or, shall we say, to tread the very lowest ground of the world of woe and horror. This innominate appetite finds its proper aliment when a Manichæan belief is turned wildly loose upon the field of human misery:—carnage, murder, slavery, torment, famine, pestilence, pining anguish;—or hurricanes, earthquakes, volcanic fires, are all so many articles in the creed of the malign being. Under the influence of this cavernous inspiration, Pity is thought of, not merely as contemptible, but as impious;—Justice is injustice, and leniency the greatest of crimes.—Are we here only giving point to a paragraph?—or has not history often and again verified such a description of the enormities which the human heart, badly informed, may entertain?*

III. But the Fanatic, inasmuch as he is an Enthusiast born, must take up yet another and a more sparkling element of character; and it is nothing else than the supposition of corrupt favouritism on the part of the deity he worships, toward himself and the faction of which he is a member. The Fanatic, and this we must keep in mind, is not a simple misanthrope, nor the creature of sheer hatred and cruelty:—he does not move like a venomous reptile lurking in a crevice, or winding silent through the grass; but soars in mid heaven as a fiery flying serpent, and looks down from on high upon whom he hates. Imaginative by temperament, his emotions are allied to hope and presumption, more closely than to fear and despondency: he firmly believes, therefore, in the favour of the supernal powers towards their faithful votaries; and in expectation of still more signal boons than yet he has received, offers himself to their service, as the unflinching champion of their interests on earth.

And besides, as we have already said, the imagination, when brought into play by self-love, must draw its excitements from a circle which it can embrace. It will then be a tribe, a sect, a faction, that affords a sphere to fanaticism; and the infuriate religionist, how unsocial soever in temper, is compelled to love a few, so that he may be able, in the strength of that partial feeling, to hate the many with full intensity.—The supposition of special favour towards ourselves, on the part of heaven, will corrupt and debilitate, or will purify and invigorate the heart, precisely according to the quality of the notions we entertain of the Divine character. The idea of personal regard and affection from Him who love only what is good and pure like Himself, can never operate to impair the principles of the moral sense: nay, this very idea, when freed from illusions, imparts elevation to virtue, and makes the temper and conduct of man, on earth, to reflect the brightness of heaven. But on the contrary, theological notions, when sullied or distorted, vitiate in an extreme degree every sentiment of the deluded being who deems himself the darling of the skies. Let but such a pestilent doctrine be admitted as that the Divine favour is bestowed, not merely in disregard of virtue, but in contempt of it, and then religion, with all its power, goes over to swell the torrent of impurity, cupidity, and malice. Under patronage of a belief like this, virtue and vice change sides in the court of conscience, and the latter claims sacred honours.

We recapitulate our three elements of Fanaticism, which (as we assume) will be discoverable, in different modes or proportions, under all forms of religious extravagance—namely—the supposition of malignity on the part of the object of religious worship;—a consequet detestation of mankind at large, as the subjects of Malignant Power; and then a credulous conceit of the favour of Heaven, shown to a few, in contempt of the rules of virtue.

Now we might follow the tract of history, and exhibit the modifications these elements have undergone in the religious systems that have successively ruled in the world. But any method which observes the order of Time, though obvious and simple, is laden with the inconvenience of involving frequent repetitions of general principles. It will be better to sieze upon certain leading varieties of our subject, as marked by broad distinctions, easily traced in every age, and such as may be recognized, whenever they may recur, without hazard of mistake. These conspicuous varieties may be brought under four designations, of which the first will comprehend all instances wherein malignant religious sentiments turn inward upon the unhappy subject of them: to the second class will belong that more virulent sort of fanaticism which looks abroad for its vistims: the third embraces the combination of intemperate religious zeal with military sentiments, or with national pride, and the love of power; to the fourth class must be reserved all instances of the more intellectual kind, and which stand connected with opinion and dogma. Our first sort then is Austere; the second Cruel; the third Ambitious; and the fourth Factious.

Or, for the purpose of fixing a characteristic mark upon each of our classes, as above named, let it be permitted us to entitle them as follows—namely, the first, The Fanaticism of the Scourge; or of personal infliction: the second, the Fanaticism of the Brand; or of immolation and cruelty: the third, the Fanaticism of the Banner; or of ambition and conquest: and the fourth, the Fanaticism of the Symbol; or of creeds, dogmatism, and ecclesiastical virulence.

SECTION V.

FANATICISM OF THE SCOURGE.

The broadest distinctions in the exterior character of men, and the most marked dissimilarities in their modes of conduct, do not infallibly bespeak a difference equally great in the elements of their temper. On the contrary, it is sometimes easy to trace in the minds of those between whose visible course of life there has been little or no resemblance, a close analogy. Yet even when such an analogy may be discerned, it is not always practicable to discover the causes of the external diversity which distinguishes them. An obscure peculiarity of the bodily temperament, or a forgotten incident of early life, may have been enough to determine whether certain impetuous passions should take their course abroad, or should boil as a vortex within the bosom. So is it that when a stream gushes from its cleft, the mere bend of a tree, or the angle of a rock, may be all the reason either of its taking its course westward—to measure the width of a continent; or toward the east, soon to find a home in some pent-up gully, or sullen cavern of the mountains.

Causes so inconsiderable or so latent we must not hope always to detect. It will be enough if we can show reason for bringing together into the same general class, men who would both perhaps have recoiled with horror or with disdain to find themselves in each other's company. Yes, we should all learn much of the secrets of our personal dispositions, and see our peculiar tempers as if under a sudden blaze of light, could it happen that some superior Intelligence, descending upon earth, were to do nothing more as Discriminator of character, and Censor of minds, than silently to classify the crowd of men by the rule of their original propensities, or their essential merits. We should then read our hearts in the companions with whom we found ourselves assorted.

Why has the fanaticism of one man devastated the world; while that of another has spent itself within the walls of a cloister? we may not be able to say. Nevertheless there are instances of this sort which are easily explained. As for example:—violent or malign passions sometimes turn inward, and vex the heart that generates them, in consequence of the mere sluggishness or lassitude of the animal system which, while it insulates a man from others, as if he were enveloped in an indolent fog, yet does not much affect the interior of the character. There may exist a very high rate of moral or intellectual excitement, where the manners and mode of conduct indicate nothing but torpor. Just as, in some bottomless lakes, vehement under-currents or eddies make sport below, while the surface is still and stagnant. Not a few of our fanatics of the self-tormenting class come under this description.

There is too to be found, here and there, a pride of personal independence, and a misanthropic arrogance, which, as it spurns every sort of mutuality, compels the soul to feed on its own substance. It might seem enough for such a one to refuse to draw its satisfactions from its fellows; but there is a malignant pride more excessive than this, and which even refuses to be so far dependent upon other men as to call them the objects of its hatred or revenge. There is a haughtiness so egregious that a man will contemn and torment himself sooner than condescend to look abroad as if he stood in need of any beings as the objects of his ireful emotions. Although nature forbids that any such attempt at mental insulation should be altogether successful, yet the endeavour is made and is renewed, day after day, by spirits of the order we describe. On the other hand, there are instances in which a mild meditative humour, perverted by some false system of belief, or excessive sensibilites that have chanced to be torn and outraged in the world, or much physical timidity combined with lofty and exquisite sentiments, produce the effect of introverting gloomy emotions upon the heart.

Instances of a mixed or mitigated kind present themselves on all sides. In truth the cases of pure fanaticism (our definition being kept in view*) are rare; or rather, are not readily separated from those dispositions with which it naturally consorts. Whether certain extravagant modes of conduct are to be attributed to sheer superstition; or whether there be nothing in them worse than an absurd enthusiasm, it may be impossible to affirm. The best we can do is to catch the distinctive features of each kind, as the ambiguous instances pass before us. Of all the facts which might be adduced (and they would soon fill volumes) illustrative of the system of monkish austerity, very few broadly and incontestibly exhibit the virulent motives which, nevertheless, the entire history of the system demonstrates to have been in secret operation throughout it. Especially is it to be observed, that the prevalence of a certain accredited and admired style of expressing the monkish doctrine conceals, or half conceals, the passions that were working beneath the surface of its placid sanctity. No one who is conversant with the ascetic writers can have failed to discern the strong heavings of human nature under the pressure of that system, even when it might be difficult or impossible to adduce formal proof of the hidden commotion. What we have now to do is broadly to characterize this species of fanaticism;—not such as it seems in the encomiastic pages of Theodoret, Sozomen, Isidore, Macarius, Palladius, Cassian; or of Basil and Bernard; but such as, after a candid perusal of these writers, we are compelled to believe it to have been.†

There are three distinct elements upon which fanatical sentiment, when introverted, employs itself; and in each instance the product is very distinguishable.—These are, 1st. The miseries, physical and mental, to which man is liable. 2d. A consciousness of personal guilt, and dread of retribution. And, 3d. The supposition of supererogatory or vicarious merit. The working of the soul upon each of these excitements demands to be briefly exhibited.

1st. There is a rebellion of proud hearts against the calamities to which human life is exposed, such as impels sometimes the disordered mind to take up its burden of woe spontaneously, rather than wait till it be imposed "If pain, sorrow, and want, are to be my companions, I vow to have none beside. I will run forward and embrace wretchedness. I will live for Misery, so that she may never overtake me, or set me as the mark of her arrow. Disappointment shall for me hold no shaft which I will not have wrenched from her cruel hand, ere it can be hurled. The power of bodily pain shall have no anguish in store which I will not freely have forestalled. Famine, thirst, heat and cold, shall assail me with no new lesson of distress. No, for I will frequent their school. Every pang the flesh or the heart can feel, I will prevent by existing only for sorrow. Even that unknown futurity of evil which death may reveal, I will penetrate by continual meditation of horrors. So will I daily converse with ghastly despair, as to taste beforehand the very worst, and to nullify fear by familiarity." Modes of feeling such as this, have been indulged; and perhaps even now are not wholly unknown to some. While we are looking only on the frivolous, the busy, and the sensual field of common life as spread out around us, it may be hard to believe that the human mind has ever travelled on a path so deep-sunken.—But if we turn aside a little from the beaten road, we shall find instances of this sort actually to belong to the history of man.

† The Author having in another volume considered the Monkish institute and doctrine as the product and parent of Enthusiasm, has now only to advert to those stronger features of the system which mark it as Fanatical or virulent.

A desperate and sullen pride has always marked the oriental (polytheistic) austerities; and in India we see unmasked, that which in Europe has disguised itself under Christian modes of expression. Very little that offends against the professed humility of the ascetic life is to be found on the pages of the writers who give us the principles and rules of the system, and who, for the most part, were themselves happy under it, as Enthusiasts. What might be the bitterness of the heart in those who were its victims, we are left to surmise. There were more motives than one for imposing perpetual silence upon the inmates of the monastery. The founder of the order, or its reformer, might talk aloud, and disclaim as he would upon the felicity of his condition; for with him the fanaticism was of a sort that might be known and looked at; but not so with the fraternity at large. A de Rance or a Eustache de Beaufort may speak:—but their companions must utter no whisper of their sorrows.*

2d. A proud forestalling of misery, such as we have just spoken of, ordinarily combines itself with the consciousness of guilt and the dread of retribution; and both together lead to the same voluntary endurance of extreme pains; he who thinks himself both a Victim and a Culprit would fain take the engine of retributive torment into his own hand, lest it should be laid hold of by the Vindictive Power he dreads. And the hope he entertains of acting always as proxy for the minister of Justice in his own case, bears proportion to the rigour with which he exercises the function of executioner.†

What spectacle in nature so monstrous, what, at first sight, so inexplicable, as that of an excruciated devotee who scorns even to writhe or to sigh under tortures which other men would not endure an hour, to save or to obtain a mountain of gold! Yet he sustains, year after year, his burden of woe in the mere strength of the obduracy of his soul!—Bound to the stake;—yes, but bound only by the cords of pride!—Does then a spectacle like this afford no lesson? After we have scoffed at the folly, or wondered at the infatuation of the voluntary sufferer, let us return and ask, whether so strange a perversion of the power of the spirit over the body, does not furnish evidence of an overthrown greatness in the human mind, such as the atheist and sceptic quite leave out of their theory of man? If it be said that these witless personal inflictions take place in consequence only of an error of belief, and may properly be compared to the ill-directed fatigues of a traveller, who, on wrong information, pursues a worse road when he might have found a better, let only the experiment be tried of leading, into a parallel error, any being to whom the body and its welfare is the supreme and only interest to be cared for. Not a step could ever be set by such a being towards a folly of this order. The liability of man to go so far astray springs from those ulterior principles that are involved in his nature, and which bespeak an immortal destiny. Every such practical absurdity is an implicit proof of the presence of a latent capacity for entertaining the highest truths; and if man be the only fool among the tribes of earth, and the only wretch, it is because he alone might be wise, virtuous and happy.

On this ground the voluntary endurance of torment, from motives of religion, may be assumed, as demonstrative evidence of the intrinsic superiority of the mental over the animal principles of our nature;—for when the body prevails, as too often it does, over the mind, it is by the means of seductions and flatteries; and we know that in this manner the noble may readily be made to succumb beneath the base. But when, as in the instance before us, the mental force triumphs over the physical will, it does so in the way of an open trial of relative strength;—and the stronger principle is found to prevail. We receive, moreover, from these extraordinary facts, a striking proof of the supremacy of the MORAL SENSE in the constitution of man; for it this chiefly that gives impulse to the practices of self-torture. And again, the relation of man to Invisible and Retributive Power, is by the same means established; the secret of every sort of self-infliction is a tacit compromise with Future Justice; and when notions such as these take effect in a paramount manner, carrying all other reasons before them, we have evidence that, in the order of nature, Religion is the sovereign motive.

The fanatic is much in error; yet let it not be thought that he subverts the first principles of virtue. He is wrong on certain points of morality, calling good evil and evil good; but still it is good and evil that are the elements he works upon. And so in Religion. His correspondence is with a Power of retributive Government on high; but he thinks amiss of that Power. His error is to impute an intrinsic malignancy, or a sheer vindictive purpose to the Invisible Authority; and then he conceives of himself as having, by his transgressions, fallen into the hands of the irresistible avenger, who, as he thinks, can take advantage of mankind only so far as sin brings them within the circle of his wrath; or who, once and again starts forth and catches an opportunity against men, when he finds them unwary or at fault.

In a form so preposterous as this, fanatical belief is hardly perhaps to be met with, except on the banks of the Ganges or in the wilds of Africa. We describe the feeling in its extremes, and then, in turning to instances where a purer creed has softened whatever is harsh, and where an accredited theological style has disguised whatever is offensive, we trace the elements of the very same order of feeling under the concealments that recommend them. We must not expect to hear from the Christian ascetic a genuine expression of the emotions that torment his bosom: these are to be divined by a fair interpretation of his behaviour. It is by the same rule that we shall presently have to estimate the dispositions of those who have signalized themselves in scenes of cruelty. To read the extant writings—the epistles, the meditations, the homilies, of some of these sanguinary personages. one would think them unconscious of every thing but meekness and charity.

Dread or dismay, when of long continuance, naturally settles down into some sort of calculation or of compromise with the apprehended danger. And it is thus that there arises, within the troubled spirit of the man whose consciousness of guilt was at first intolerable, a whispered controversy with the vengeful Power, or a dull wrangling debate concerning the precise amount of the mulct, and the mode of payment. The culprit, confessing that he has fallen under the power of his adversary, nevertheless does not, after a while despair of making terms more advantageous than at first he had thought of. With this hope he looks about for the means of righting his cause, or even of quite turning the balance in his favour.

* St. Bernard, intending no doubt to recommend the monastic state, pleasantly compares the monks to the fish in a puddle! "Sunt et in stagnis mundi pisces, qui in claustris Deo serviunt in spiritu et veritate. Merito siquidem stagnis monasteria comparantur, ubi quodammodo incarcerati pisces evagandi non habeant libertatem." (Serm. in Fest. S. Andr. Apost.) And a horrid prison, according to his own confession, was the monastery: "Duro me carceri mancipavi." (Epist. 257.) So much so, that it seemed to the saint himself the greatest of all miracles that men should be found who were willing to endure its discipline. Let us hear him when, on a high day, he is haranguing the fraternity: "Quid mirabilius, &c.—Quod majus miraculum, quando tot juvenes, tot adolescentes, tot nobiles, universi denique quos hic video, velut in carcere aperto tenentur sine vinculis, solo Dei timore confixi: quod in tanta perseverant afflictione pœnitentiæ, ultra virtutem humanam, supra naturam, contra consuetudinem?" (Serm. in dedicat. eccles.) A general fact, on the ground of which we may argue more confidently than from the disguised language of men whose enslaved spirits knew nothing of ingenuousness, is this, that as the monastic system sprung up amid the persecutions of the second century, so has it flourished most, and been carried to the greatest extremes, in times of public calamity and disorder.—The miseries of the open world have been reflected upon the austerities of the cell—that camera obscura. It appears plainly that the excessive abstinence and the savage habits of the Egyptian eremites—so much admired by the Church writers of the fourth and fifth centuries, were little more than a fantastic form of the wretchedness of the people of the country. As much as this is confessed by some of the eulogists of these horrid saints. Thus for example Palladius.—As to what relates to eating and drinking (speaking of a certain Macarius and his companions) I need say little, since nothing like gluttony is to be found there, even among the most indulgent of the monks, who live at large; or any thing to distinguish them from the people of the country; and this as well by reason of the scarcity of food, as from the impulse of a Divine zeal—και δια την στασιν των χωρων, και δια τον κατα θεον ζηλον. —Lausaic Hist. c. 21.

† Christian sentiments modify the feelings of this sort, and give them a more humble guise. Ergo qui pœnitentiam agit, offere se debet ad pœnam, ut hic puniatur a Domino, non ad supplicia æterna servetur: nec expectare tempus, sed occurrere divinæ indignationi. (Ambrose in Ps. xxxvii.) Do the apostles speak in any such style? The transition was easy from a doctrine like this to the extremest austerities.

Yes, and he goes so far as to harbour the thought (natural to the mind when it is the prey of rancorous emotions) of justifying, to such an extent, the difference between himself and the Avenger, as that, if after all, punishment should be inflicted, it shall be, and shall seem to others—unrighteous and cruel, so that while writhing under it, the sufferer may console himself with the proud consciousness of merit, and may, even on the ground of severe justice, gain a right of retaliation.

At this point then there comes in hope, and a new emotion to give alacrity to the fortitude of the soul. The conscience-stricken man discovers that he possesses within himself (as if it were an inexhaustible fund) the power of enduring privations and pains:—he may deny every gratification, he may sustain without a groan the most extreme anguish, he may live only to suffer. And in his mode of estimating the absolving value of bodily torment he reckons that, whatever price may be put upon those pains or wants which a man endures unwillingly, and from which he has no means of escaping, the merit of the same amount of affliction borne voluntarily, is tenfold greater.* Whoever then has the fortitude to inflict misery upon himself, may boldly defy vindictive Power; for he commands the means of adding merit to merit, at such a rate of rapid accumulation as shall presently outstrip the reckoning of the adversary.†

Fanaticism (the fanaticism of personal infliction) is not ripened until it approaches this point. That is to say, it wants spring and warmth;—it is not tumid;—it has no heroism so long as mere dread, and the sense of guilt, are uppermost in the mind. But when pride takes its high standing upon the supposition of merit won, and when Invisible Powers are deemed to have been foiled, then the spirit gets freedom and soars. Pitiable triumph of the lacerated heart that thus vaunts itself in miseries as useless as they are horrid!—Must we not mourn the infatuations of our nature, as we watch the ascent of the soul that climbs the sky only to carry there a sullen defiance of Eternal Justice!—So the bird of prey, beat off from the fold, and torn with the shepherd's shafts—its plumage ruffled, and stained with gore, flaps the wing on high, and fronts the sun as if to boast before heaven of its audacity and its wounds!

It is after it has passed this stage, or when fear and humiliation give way to hope, to pride, or perhaps to revenge, that secondary motives are brought in, and fanaticism becomes a mixed sentiment, and is lowered in its tone; not seldom degenerates into farce or hypocrisy, and at length perhaps quite evaporates. Secondary motives of this kind would never be listened to if it were not for the alleviations that arise from habit. The pains of mere privation, terrible as they seem to the luxurious, the human mind soon learns to endure without repining; nay, it derives at length a sombre satisfaction from the very paucity of its sources of comfort. A reaction, such as this, is not of rare occurrence. Certain tempers are alive to an emotion of personal independence which, when fully kindled, makes it delicious to a man to find that, in comparison with those around him, he is free from solicitude, because free from wants; that a mere morsel of the coarsest food is all he is compelled to ask from the grudging world; and that the thraldom of artificial life is a bondage he has broken.‡

The habitude of positive pain, as well as that of mere privation, brings too its relief:—there is a torpor partly of the nerve, but chiefly of the mind, which more and more blunts physical sensibility;—and there is an art learned in the school of chronic suffering, which teaches so to shift the burthen of anguish as that it may not any where gall to the quick. Moreover, there is a power of abstraction from bodily sensations which long experience calls into exercise, and which may at length (even while matter and mind continue partners) almost set the conscious principle at large from its sympathy with mere flesh and nerve. Pain, at its first onset, condenses the soul upon a point; or brings the whole of the sensitive faculty to the one centre of anguish; but habit of pain loosens this concentration, and allows the mind to occupy a wider surface.

The eulogists of the ascetic saints boast often of the absolute insensibility to pain, to thirst, and to hunger, which some of their heroes had attained to. In certain instances the leathern girdle—zona pellicea, hoc est, ex crudo corio—ad macerationem procurandam—was found, after death, to have lodged itself (shall we say as a seton?) in the integuments around the loins; so as (in ordinary cases) to have occasioned intense suffering: yet never had the secret been betrayed to the fraternity by any indications of uneasiness. Instances still more extreme, and far too revolting to describe, abound in the monkish records. If the facts are admitted as true, and they cannot altogether be rejected, it must be believed that a state of extreme mental abstraction not merely diverts the sense of pain, but prevents also that physical excitement which ordinarily attends excruciating torture, and which wastes the animal force. We must attribute to the same influence of the mind the power acquired by some of the hermits of northern Europe to resist the most intense cold—unclothed and unsheltered. The instances are numerous, and are too familiarly spoken of to be reasonably called in question. In the tenth, eleventh, and twelfth centuries, the forests of France and Germany were haunted by naked anchorites who, round the year, roamed about, refusing even the comforts of a cavern, and were wont to repose at night on the fresh fallen snow.*

When so much proficiency as this has been made by the voluntary sufferer, he gains leisure to look abroad. Conqueror, so far, of himself—of nature, and of the vindictive powers, the fanatic stalks about as a hero, and may even begin to think how he shall turn his victory to profitable account.—Vanity and ambition, when once they gain a lodgement in the heart, imperceptibly, yet quickly, sap more imaginative and passionate emotions. This substitution of ignoble sentiments for those of a deeper sort meets us every day. In truth the constant tendency or gravitation of the human mind is from the more to the less vehement class of emotions; and then its progress is from the simple and ardent, to the complex and turbid, in its habits of feeling. It is thus that the sincere enthusiast so often becomes (perhaps unconsciously to himself) a religious knave; and thus, too, that the man who commenced his course of mortification and extravagance under the impulse of genuine passions, and who, at the outset, might have been looked at with wonder, if not admiration, degenerates into the charlatan or public fool.

3d. It is not till after the fanatic has acquired some familiarity with self-inflicted torments, and is at ease in his character of voluntary martyr, and especially until he believes him-

* Οὐ γὰρ ὁ ἀπεῖρων τῶν ἀναγκαίων, κατατείνει, ἀλλ' ὁ ἐθίσας τὴν ἀτελεστέραν ἡδονὴν τῆς τελειοτέρας τοῖς δεινοῖς. So says Basil; and the sentiment might be put at the head of volumes of spurious morality.

† Not a few of those who peopled, first the deserts, and afterwards the monasteries, were such as the "Blessed" eremite whom Palladius describes (Lausaic Hist. c. 19.)—a homicide—we take his word for it that he was not a murderer, who, in terror of justice, and under horror of conscience—μηδεὶ μηδεν εἰρηκὼς, κατανυχθεὶς τὴν ψυχὴν—where, unsheltered, he wandered, lost to all feeling, three years; but afterwards built for himself a cell, and acquired celebrity as an eminent practitioner of austerities. I wished to know from him, says our author, with what feeling he now regarded the fatal act that had driven him into solitude:—he replied, that, far from thinking of it with regret, it was a ground of thanksgiving—γέγονται γὰρ μοί φησιν ὑπόθεσις σωτηρίας ἡ ἀκούσιος φύσις. The profession is susceptible of a good meaning, and charity requires that we should so receive it. Nothing indeed would be more outrageous than to deny universally the piety and sincerity of even the most extravagant class of the anchorets. Better speak on such subjects like Alban Butler than like Gibbon.

‡ To a naked eremite St. Bernard, pro signo caritatis, sent a cloak and boots, which he kindly received, and, as an act of humility and obedience, put on; yet presently, like a true New Zealander, laid aside as intolerable. Et nunc, said he, pro amore ipsius, vestimenta transmissa obedienter accepi, et indui; diutius tamen ea portare non valeo, quia nec opus est mihi; nec ipse mandavit. Dico autem vobis, amicis meis carissimis, quia nihil est mihi molestius quam ut curæ carnis sarcinam odiosam, cum tanta difficultate depositam, lassatis et dolentibus humeris denuo imponere cogar.

* After deducting from these narratives all the miracles, the bare fact is miracle enough. These stories could not have been sheer inventions. It is difficult to choose among the abundance of examples;—and so much the more difficult, because it is hard to find one in which the venerable language of Holy Scripture is not frightfully misapplied to the follies of superstition. The author of the Book de Miraculis Cisterciensium Monachorum, thus speaks of one who, pro Christo quotidie moriens, non unam tantum, sed innumeras cruces et mortes sustinuit: quia quot diebus in eremo vixit, quasi tot martyria duxit. . . . . Annis siquidem quatuor decem solivagus ac toto corpore nudus, montibus et silvis pro Christo amore oberrans et latitans perduravit, cœlum habens pro tecto, aerem pro vestimento, pecorinum victum pro cibo humano. Ten years, without flinching from his purpose, the hermit lived abroad; but at length yielded a little to the weakness of nature. Postmodum autem quatuor fere annis ante suam dormitionem, in corde hyemis, bruma sæviente asperrima, cum tellus, nivibus obruta, et gelu acriore coercita, nec herbas foris exsereret, nec radices effodi sineret; tunc a facie famis et hujus frigoris sustinere non prævalens, tandem ut homo jam fere præmortuus, obeso corpore, pelle sola circumdatus, cogebatur interdum deserta deserere, atque ad proxima rura, volendo nolendo, descendere.

self to have reached a vantage ground in relation to Vindictive Powers, that he entertains the bold ambition of undertaking to suffer vicariously for those who may be less resolute than himself.*

Master of a fund of supererogatory merit—how shall he dispose of it to best advantage? Can any thing be more noble than to dispense the hardly-acquired treasure among feeble souls, who are quite destitute of that in which he is rich? Absurdities such as this, if not now common, nevertheless, have in past ages often prevailed, and are not only what may be looked for if we calculate the influence of certain motives upon the common principles of human nature. That law of our mental conformation has already been adverted to which makes it highly difficult, or quite impracticable, to kindle the imagination within the home-circle of selfish interests. The fanatic, therefore, all whose sentiments are more or less dependent upon that faculty, very soon feels a need—a craving, which not even the most egregious illusions of self-love can satisfy. He must then spread himself over a larger surface, and take up many more elements of emotion. Every mind, and especially a mind highly sensitive, seeks some object of meditation, the dimensions of which it does not exactly measure. In moments of depression, in hours of languor, we want a defence against the chilling calculations of mere reason. And the more a man's course of life is substantially absurd, the more urgent need has he of a store of vague, unlimited motives, such as shall be in no danger of an assault from common sense. When the fanatic has began to tire on his wearisome pilgrimage of woe, how may he reanimate his purpose if he can think himself a public person who has freely become responsible for other men's salvation; and especially if he can believe that the Vindictive Powers whom he is holding at bay with a strong arm, are watching for the fall of so notable a champion, and would rush upon the spoil were he to faint!

And besides; it is only by heading-up the merit of penance to such a height as that there shall always be a large amount in store, that the public martyr can feel to be himself quite secure against the demands of justice.—May not a man who is every day expiating the sins of others assume it as certain that his own are discharged?—Thus the warfare against ghostly exactors is carried on upon advanced ground! and the knight-spiritual has a space in the rear to which, if pressed, he may retreat.

A contrast, curious at least, and perhaps instructive, presents itself, when we bring into comparison the Mohammedan and Popish superstitions, on the ground of the encouragement they have severally given to the practice of voluntary inflictions. Now it appears that, while the former has not been exempt from extravagances of this order, they have always constituted a main element of the latter; the Romish polity and doctrine having both broadly rested upon the principle (variously applied) of personal austerity. More causes than can be soon enumerated have concurred to produce this marked difference between the religions of Asia and of Europe. The oriental faith burst upon the world, full-orbed, among an energetic and enterprising race. It was the religion of MEN, and the faith of warriors. But the faith of the West was the slow-born creature of the cloister—the religion of recluses and of priests; the child of sour and mopish imbecility. The one was modelled in the youthful season of national existence; the other during a course of melancholy ages which saw the human mind fall back from the high position it once had occupied, to the point of extreme depression.

Yet a somewhat different doctrine of penitential infliction has sprung up from intellectual and moral degradation in the instance of the Jewish people. Nothing can be much more absurd or ludicrous than the Rabbinical penances. It is hard to believe that the mortification, the abstinence, or the punishment, was ever thought of, either by those who issue the injunction or by those who listened to it, otherwise than as an acknowledged mockery. The modern children of Abraham, suffering as they have done in almost every age, and in every country, substantial miseries which might be well reckoned to supersede any voluntary pains, and yet not deeming their theology complete without penances, have taken care to impose upon themselves such only as were too severe to be put in practice, or such as were penal only in name. Besides; the Rabbinical Judaism, with its lumber of frivolous traditions, has left no room for the working of these profounder sentiments whence the monkish austerities drew their motive. The religion of the modern Jew, what is it but a ponderous vanity, under the pressure of which the human bosom may hardly heave?—that bundle of beggarly elements which he bears about upon his shoulders, allows him not the liberty of emotion which men of other creeds enjoy, and which the fanatic of any creed must possess.*

But to return to Mohammed, and to mention specific causes, it must be noted that the Arabian teacher, by means of his prime doctrine of the merit of military service undertaken for the propagation of the true faith, and by the large and attractive rewards promised to pious valour, appropriated, to the enterprises of active life, all those springs of action which, when left to pend upon the conscience, impel men to inflict upon themselves expiatory torments. Beings of the very same native temperaments who, in Christian countries, clad themselves in hair-cloth, and mercilessly twanged the scourge over their own shoulders, put on, in the East, the caparison of war, and wielded the scimeter, and this because the Koran offers paradise to those who die in battle.†

A subsidiary means of diverting the fanaticism of personal

* We pass by, as uninstructive, the gross examples of this kind of fanaticism which might be brought from India or Thibet, and rather adduce instances which, though milder in appearance, may well amaze us more. Let us listen to St. Bernard: Videtur quidem et in nostris aliquando tribulationibus esse NONNULLA LIBERTAS, cum videlicet pro peccatis proximorum, libera et liberali caritate; laborem pœnitentiæ sustinemus, lugentes pro eis, jejunantes pro eis, vapulantes pro eis, et quæ non rapuimus exsolventes.—(De Diversis, Serm. 34, c. 3.) Yet the pious and respectable abbot of Clairvaux was not the inventor of this doctrine; nor, on the other hand, had it reached its maturity in his time; indeed his own language is often irreconcileable with the preposterous notion of supererogatory merit. Ubi ergo macula propria, propria quoque purgatio jure requiretur, says he; but in the very same sermon (de Diversis, 38) he leaves room for the then nascent error.—Per multas enim tribulationes in regnum Dei intrare necesse est; et nemo nisi per tribulationes ingreditur, aut proprias, aut alienas. An indistinct belief of a transferable merit in the good works and voluntary penances of the saints, is to be traced in many of the Christian writers from the fourth century and onward. Sed quid mirum, says St. Gregory (Pope) si ad absolutionem peccatoris propria merita suffragantur, quando in sacri eloquii auctoritate discamus, quia alii pro aliis liberati sunt?—(In I. Regum, c. 14.) And Ambrose, (de Pœnit. lib. i. c. 15.) . . . . Ut per universos ea quæ superflua sunt in aliquo pœnitentiam agente virilis misericordiæ aut compassionis velut collativa quadam admixitone purgentur. Or again (Expos. Luc. c. 5.) Si gravium peccatorum diffidis veniam, adhibe precatores, adhibe Ecclesiam quæ pro te precetur, cujus contemplatione quod tibi Dominus negare posset ignoscat. The task is unpleasing and invidious to gather proofs of fatal error from the pages of writers who, taken altogether, are worthy of respect—often of admiration. We stop short then with the specimens above adduced.

* Maimonides saw in Egypt enough of the follies and horrors of monkery to sicken him of austerities. On this subject he speaks like a man of sense, and in a strain of which, alas, we find few instances among the Christian writers of the time. He condemns as positively sinful, all voluntary inflictions, not directly enjoined by the law, (see Bernard's Selections from the Yad Hachazakah, p. 170, and the entire chapter). The doctrine of Repentance, as we find it in this writer, might with advantage to the Jew be compared with the Romish doctrine on the same point, from the age of Pope Gregory I. to the present day. His rule of confession (p. 222) is incomparably more sound than that of the doctors of the church. But Maimonides must not be taken as a sample of Rabbinical instruction:—he boldly appealed to Moses and the prophets.—The Rabbis issued nothing which they did not first deform and render absurd. Qui, &c. . . . . diebusque æstivis accedat ad locum plenum formicarum, inter quas nudus sedeat. Diebus vero hybernis, frangat glaciem, et in aquis sedeat usque ad nares. Qui, &c. . . . . sedeatque in aquis diebus hybernis, quantum temporis requiritur ad coquendum ovum. Qui, &c. . . . . jejunet quadraginta dies continuos, atque singulis diebus vapulet bis, aut ter. Qui, &c. . . . . sedeat in nive et gelu per horam unam singulis diebus; sic faciat per totam hyemem quotidie semel, aut bis. Diebus vero æstivis objiciat se muscis, sive vespis et apibus; aliosve pœnas subeat morti similes. That these penances were matters of form only one might infer from the fact that a forty day's fast is enjoined upon whosoever exacts usury (interest) and that the taking of interest even from the Gentiles is reprobated. See the book called Reschit Cochma, as quoted by the annotator in Raimond Martin's Pugio Fidei. It is curious to observe that the practice of penance has never comported with the sentiments and habits of a trading people.

† Verily God hath purchased of the true believers their souls and their substance; promising them the enjoyment of paradise, on condition that they fight for the cause of God; whether they slay or be slain, the promise for the same is assuredly due by the law, the gospel, and the Koran. And who performeth his contract more faithfully than God? When ye encounter the unbelievers, strike off their heads until ye have made a great slaughter among them, and bind them in bonds. . . . . And as to those who fight in defence of God's true religion, God will not suffer their works to perish: he will guide them and will dispose their heart aright, and he will lead them into paradise, of which he hath told them. (Sale's Koran, c. 9 and 27.) We shall presently find occasion to match these passages with some of similar import from other quarters.

austerity, was also the importance attached by Mohammed to alms-giving—almost the only positive virtue of his system. The aspirant to immortal sensualities could not indeed every day wet his sword in the blood of infidels; but he might at all times purchase, if not always conquer for himself the future pleasures. Or if the system still seemed to want a vent for those feelings which give rise to ascetic practices, it was found in the rigour and universal obligation of the annual fast, which afforded to every Moslem such a taste of mortification as might effectively cool the ambition of voluntary hunger. The frantic austerities of the Dervish did not spring out of the Mohammedan theology; but either grew upon it; or have been merely farcical and mercenary; or have been practised in continuation of idolatrous usages which the faith of the Prophet did not extirpate.*

The Roman Superstition embraced many more elements of meditative emotion, and those of a more profound sort than were included in the Koran. Although if we are to speak of it as a whole, and especially if we have in view its condition in the eighth and ninth centuries, Popery was a more corrupt system than that of the Arabian prophet, so that Mohammed and the Caliphs may almost claim the praise of religious Reformers; yet did it retain those potent principles of hope and fear—of remorse and compunction, of tenderness too, and of keen sensibility, which put the soul into deep commotion, and set it working upon itself. On the contrary, Mohammed, by strangely admitting into his theology the expectation of a sensual paradise, the pleasures of which were not to differ in substance from the delights of an oriental palace, effectively cashiered from his system every pure and spiritual conception of virtue.† For if the heaven which a man is thinking of as his last home be grossly voluptuous, of what avail will be fine abstract axioms or grave discourses to teach him purity.

No perversion such as this ever gained ground among Christian nations, even in their lowest state of religious degradation. And as some spiritual conceptions of the Divine character, as well as some just notions of the sanctity of the upper world were generally prevalent, the correspondent belief of the guilt and danger of man as a sinner retained its force. Nevertheless as, at the same time, the genuine and evangelic scheme of remission of sins, was nullified, or quite forgotten, the tormented conscience was left to contend as it could with the dread of future retribution.

The doctrine of Purgatory sprang up naturally in the bosoms of men from this mortal conflict of fear and conscious guilt, with the obscure hope of impunity; and although the "fond thing, vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture," may be traced in its elements to very early times, and although it became at length, in its practical bearing, a device well adapted to serve the purposes of a rapacious priesthood, it should be regarded, in its essence, as nothing more than the proper product of elevated and spiritual notions of virtue, cut off from that solace which the Gospel affords. Some opinion equivalent to the doctrine of purgatory, has been seen, even in our own times, to be associated with the two conditions, namely—a damaged Gospel, and a severe morality.

It belongs to another subject, namely Superstition, to trace the origin and growth of the doctrine of Purgatory. This ancient and widely-diffused dogma went hand in hand with that which led to the invocation of saints, and the belief of their efficient intercession in the court of heaven. The latter doctrine seems to have been ripened, or to have reached a definite form rather earlier than the former; nor is the mode of its birth quite so obscure. When at length both had become the accredited doctrine of the church, a brisk commerce between the visible and invisible worlds was carried on, and in this traffic the clergy were the brokers and the gainers—the gainers to an incalculable amount.‡

The idea of future expiatory torments having lodged itself firmly in all serious and devout minds, no other consequence could be looked for but the practice of penitentiary inflictions, having for their motive the hope of abating the demands of justice in the region of chastisement. The most excessive abstinence, a shirt of haircloth, a bed of straw, continued watchings, perpetual silence, sanguinary flagellations, and positive tortures, were willngly resorted to as assuagements of the dread which the belief of purgatory inspired; and if we are to wonder at all in looking at these severities, our amazement must be, not that men could be found who were willing to submit heartily and permanently to the rule of St. Benedict, or St. Dominic; but rather that the miseries of the monastic life were not carried to a much greater extent than we actually find them ordinarily to have reached. It would not have seemed strange if sincere believers in the doctrine of purgatory had gone the length of the ancient worshippers of Baal, or of the modern devotees of Indian divinities.*

It is in the glare of a doctrine such as this that we should peruse the rules of the ascetic life, and the blood-stained story of the monastery. Is it any wonder that men who first had tortured themselves at the instigation of this belief should think it a light matter to ply the rack and the brand upon others?—The fanaticism of austerity was proper parent of the fanaticism of cruelty. But the mild and meditative spirit of Cristianity happily came in to moderate, in some degree, that extravagance into which the human mind naturally runs when highly excited by a ferocious theology.—The Christian flagellist might, it is probable, draw as much blood from his back in a year, as did the frantic priest of Moloch from his sides and arms;—or perhaps more; but yet it were better done with the scourge than with the knife. The Romish fanaticism did not rise to a horrid and murderous pitch until after it had become the instrument of sacerdotal rancour, and had been directed against the heretic.

The derivation of fanatical cruelty from fanatical austerity it is by no means difficult to trace; nor is the line of descent far extended. Often indeed has the one generated the other in the same bosom; or if the history of the Church is looked to, it will be seen that, within the circuit of a century, or

---

* Sooffeeism, with its varieties, is a far more ancient and a more widely spread system than the doctrine of the prophet. The philosophic pantheist of Persia and Upper India, the frantic fakir, and the dervish, are personages of all times, and of almost all countries.—The ascetic tribe is older than history, and presents the same general features wherever we meet with it. In reading Arrian's account of the Bramins, or Sophists, as he calls them, of India, one might believe he was describing so many Romish saints. Οὗ τοι γυμνοὶ διαιτῶνται οἱ σοφισταὶ, (Indian Hist.). The Koran neither created nor cherished infatuations of this kind.

† The contemplative or more refined class of Moslems have strenuously endeavoured to put a figurative construction upon those passages of the Koran which describe Paradise, and have maintained that the prophet never intended to be literally understood. The mass of his followers have taken things as they found them.

‡ Not only the doctrine of Purgatory, but the practical abuses of it, stand forth almost in the grossest form in the writings of Gregory the Great; and it would be really hard to choose between the faith of the Christian Pope, on this subject, and that of his contemporary—Mohammed;—both announcing eternal damnation as the doom of the uninstructed mass of mankind; and both preaching a purgatorial state to those whose religious advantages were of the highest kind. Assuredly the Koran is more free from suspicion of a sinister purpose on this point than are the Dialogues of Gregory:—if indeed these dialogues can be trusted to as the unaltered productions of the writer to whom they are attributed—or are his productions at all—a point deemed questionable.

A service perhaps might be rendered to sincere and candid Romanists if the history of this doctrine—a capital article in his belief, and one which he knows to be of high antiquity, could be satisfactorly traced. Our materials, it is to be feared, are too scanty to sustain the inquiry; for between the close of the apostolic age and the time of Cyprian or Tertullian, more is wanted than actually exists to enable us to give a good account of the state of the opinion as we find it in the pages of those two writers. The expression so often quoted by the Romanists, from Tetullian,—Oblationes pro defunctis, pro natalitiis annua die facimus (de Corona) is not of itself conclusive; but becomes so as compared with other passages. Dic mihi soror, in pace præmisisti virum tuum? Quid respondebit? An in discordia? Ergo hoc magis ei vincta est, cum quo habet apud Deum causam. . . Enimvero et pro anima ejus orat, et refrigerium interim adpostulat ei, et in prima resurrectione consortium, et offert annuis diebus dormitionis ejus. (De Monogam). Every one has seen quotations to the same effect from Cyprian, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Cyril of Jerusalem. But in these, and similar instances, the true import of certain phrases is to be gathered from each writer's general strain on those topics which are most nearly allied to the opinion in question: especially on the subject of repentance and remission of sins. The doctrine of purgatory, it is pretty evident, sprang out of an early corruption of those principal articles. Here we find a confusion of notions, and a perverted exposition of Scripture, in almost the earliest of the Christian writers.

* The Romish writers use no reserve in describing the pains of the purgatorial state; and as they have, in the doctrine itself, supplied to the Church an article on which Scripture is silent; so, in furnishing the particulars, have they drawn largely upon that special knowledge of the infernal regions which their privileged commerce with invisibles has supplied. "A soul," says the Rev. Alban Butler, "for one venial sin shall suffer more than all the pains of distempers, the most violent colics, gout, and stone, joined in complication; more than all the most cruel torments undergone by malefactors, or invented by the most barbarous tyrants; more than all the tortures of the martyrs summed up together. This is the idea which the fathers give us of purgatory, and how long many souls may have to suffer there we know not."—Lives of the Saints, Novem. 2.

more, those outrages upon human nature which had been going on in the cells of the monastery, and those preposterous sentiments which the ascetic life enkindled, reached their proper consummation when the friar and inquisitor took in hand to rid the church of her enemies. Far was any such consequence from the minds of the early and illustrious promoters of the monastic system; but though not foreseen by them, it demands to be attentively regarded by us, since the instruction which history conveys is drawn from considering, rather the commencements than the issues, rather the germs than the fruits, of whatever excites admiration or surprise upon the stage of the world's affairs.

And so, if it be intended to receive in the most efficacious manner those lessons of practical-wisdom which spring from the contemplation of individual character, we must select as specimens, not the most distorted instances, but those rather wherein the peculiar tendency we have in view is moderated by fine qualities of the heart, or lost almost amid the splendour of rare mental powers and accomplishments.—For inasmuch as it is only when so recommended that spurious virtues produce extensive ill effects, our caution against the evil should be drawn from examples of that very order. Let the sardonic historian, whose rule it is to exhibit human nature always as an object of mockery, crowd his pages with whatever is most preposterous in its kind. A better motive will lead us to bring forward the worthiest exemplars; and yet not as if the illustrious dead were to be exhibited that it might be said of them how little were the great! but rather that the admonition, of whatever kind, which the instance presents may come with the fullest force.

Forgetting then the frenzied anchorets of the Egyptian deserts, of the rocks of Sinai, and of the solitudes of Syria, and leaving unnamed the savage heroes of the Romish calendar,* let us take an instance in which a due admiration of great qualities must mingle with our reprobation of mischievous sentiments. Instead of a St. Symeon, or a St. Columban, we turn to Basil—the primate of Cappadocia.†

But how obtain the simple and living truth in the instance we have chosen? Nothing belonging to that age in which the Church ascended to the place of worldly greatness is to be found in its native form and real colours. Flattery and clerical arrogance confound all distinctions, violate all modesty, and in the interested idolatry of human excellence, commit frightful outrages upon the just rules of piety. Those calumniators of his friend and patron against whom Gregory Nazianzen inveighs,‡ could not have injured the true frame of Basil so fatally as himself has done by his hyperbolic encomiums. We turn as well with suspicion as disgust from the turgid oration,§ and are fain to relinquish the attempt to rescue a good and accomplished man from the suffocating embrace of his eulogist. Well might a warning be taken by the Church, even now, against the danger of indulging the spirit of exaggeration and of fond adulatory regard to the illustrious dead. It was this very spirit as much as any other influence we can name, which effected the ruin and hastened the corruption of early Christianity. Hence, directly, sprang some of the very worst errors which in a matured state strengthened the despotism of Rome, and made its services idolatrous, and its practices abominable.

A reasonable distaste of the inflation which offends the eye so often on the pages of the early Christian writers (as well as motives of indolence or levity) has almost cut us off from correspondence with the worthies of the ancient Church; so that men whose vigour of mind, whose copious eloquence, and whose universal learning, should attract us to the perusal of their works, are little more thought of than the demigods of the Grecian mythology. Yet undoubtedly by this oblivion we not only forfeit the advantage of justly estimating things that are, by comparison with things that have been; but fail of that special and highly important benefit which an exact knowledge of history conveys, namely—a timely caution against the first inroads of insidious errors and spurious sentiments.

It may be too much to affirm that Basil, eminent as were his qualities, or indeed that any single mind could have turned the tide which, at the opening of the fourth century, was in full course, bearing the Christian world—eastern and western, fast toward that swamp of superstition wherein all its virtues were soon after lost. Yet it is certain that although he might not have had power to divert the course of things, his influence was great and extensive in accelerating the unhappy movement. As well in the Latin as the Greek Church, and during many successive centuries, the writings of Basil formed the text book of monkery, and gave sanction to its follies.* His friend and biographer assures us, and his own writings attest the fact, that, not like many who, so long as their private interests go well, trouble themselves not at all on account of the evils that may prevail abroad, Basil anxiously occupied himself with whatever concerned the welfare of the Christian community throughout the world:† and seeing the Church "split into ten thousand sects, and distracted with errors,"‡ laboured, as well by his writings as by personal interposition, to remedy the existing evils. Nor were his labours without fruit. The specific heresies with which he contended were held in check by his eloquence, and by the weight of his personal character. False dogmas he discerned, and refuted; but alas, the false temper of the times—the universal wrong tendency of men's notions of religion and piety, this he did not discern; on the contrary, while fighting with errors in the detail, himself immensely promoted the grand error which had already poisoned the Church, and

* No literary enterprise can well be named, or perhaps thought of more undesirable—more humiliating—at least if a man retains any feeling of self-respect, than that which the worthy and learned author of the Lives of the Saints has executed. The Romish Church is rich in the boast of upwards of a thousand saints—a number so large that she is able to allot as many as three or four glorious patrons, on an average, to each day of the year! Now most men would think it a formidable task to undertake merely a cold apology of every one of any thousand frail human beings that could be brought together in a list. But what must it be, not simply to excuse, but to commend every one of a thousand? And what, not only to commend, but to find proof that every one is a fit object of adoration, and an efficacious mediator between God and man? Yet such is the achievement that signalizes the name of Alban Butler! A thousand saints, one after another, to be hoisted upon the pedestal of canonization, or defended there! Truly one of the loftiest of these enviable standing places should be reserved for the author himself! Those who, without a cause to serve, or a church to prop (or to pull down), look calmly at human nature as it is, and who read history for themselves, will, with a sort of mournful contempt, bring into comparison the foolish exaggerations of Butler on the one hand, and the malign representations of Gibbon on the other; and will learn to hold very cheap, as well eulogists as calumniators, when it is truth we are in search of.

† Let ninety-nine of every hundred of the Saints of the Calendar retain their title. If the Romanists please; it shall be Saint George, Saint Dunstan, Saint Dominic, and so forth; but we are disposed to withhold the sullied honour from the few whom we believe, notwithstanding the misfortune of their canonization, to have been good and honest men, and sincere Christians. And certainly we so think of Basil of Cappadocia. He governed the churches of that province rather more than eight years, during the reigns of Valentinian and Valens.

‡ See the funeral oration in praise of Basil, Morell's Greg. Nazianzen, 1680, Tom. I. pp. 360, 363.

§ The twentieth oration above referred to, ἐπιτάφιος, in which Gregory exhausts the powers of language in the service of his deceased friend and spiritual father, upon whom indeed, while living he had lavished the hyperpolas of praise; as in the sixth, seventh, and nineteenth orations, and in various places of his Epistles. Could the simplicity of the Gospel, and the honour of Christ comport with that style of adulation which in the age of Gregory was accredited and common in the Church? The epistle, the nineteenth, in which he excuses himself from the charge of neglecting his friend, would astound the modern reader. No wonder that those should have fallen into an idolatry of the saints in heaven, who had already gone so far in worshipping one another.

* The praises of Basil and of his institutions are on the lips of most of the contemporary and succeeding church writers, as well Latins as Greeks; and most of the oriental monkish establishments were founded upon the model of which he was the author. Isidore, (Lib. I. Epist. 61,) reproaches one who, while he professed high regard to the words of our DIVINELY INSPIRED FATHER—Basil, practically set his authority at naught. Equivalent expressions are employed by other writers. By a strange catachresis the monastic rule was called generally by the writers of that age (as by Isidore in the epistle here referred to) κανὼν φιλοσοφίας, and the institution itself the true and divine philosophy. See a fond and frequent use of this phrase in the epistles of Gregory Nazianzen.

† ... ἀλλ' ὑψοῦ τὴν κεφαλὴν διάρας, καὶ κύκλῳ τὸ τῆς ψυχῆς ὄμμα περιαγαγών, πᾶσαν εἶτα περιεῖται τὴν οἰκουμένην, ὅσην ὁ σωτήριος λόγος ἐπέδραμεν. Greg. Naz. Orat. 20. His assertion is borne out by several passages in Basil's own writings, from which it appears that the state of the Church universal was the subject of his frequent (and not very happy) meditations: for instance, in his treatise on the Holy Spirit, c. 30, where, with admirable force of language and vigour of conception, he makes a comparison between the distracted state of the Church and a sea-fight during a storm: or again in that remarkable epistle to the bishops of the West, in which he entreats them to send delegates to the eastern church, who might raise it from the dust. The same catholic and patriarchal solicitude appears in his epistles to Athanasius, and in those of similar import, to the bishops of Gaul and Italy. Basil's monasticism did not at all seclude him from public interests.

‡ ... εἰς τε μυρίας δόξας καὶ πλάνας διεστασμένην.

which, after a century or two, laid her prostrate as a corrupting carcase. So it is that what is special we can see: what is general escapes our notice. A hundred times, while following Basil through his track of cogent argument and splendid illustration, one stops to ask, Why did not so comprehensive and penetrating an intelligence question itself, and question the Christian body, concerning the soundness of its first principles of practical piety? Why not inquire whether a system of conduct manifestly at variance with the course of nature, and with the constitutions of the social economy, was indeed enjoined by Scripture, or could, in its issue, be safe and advantageous? Not a surmise of this sort, so far as we can find, ever disturbed the meditations of the Cappadocian primate. No;—but these only may fairly blame and wonder who themselves are habituated to entertain and indulge severe inquiries concerning the opinions and usages they most zealously affect.

Far from seeming fanatical or malignant, the monastic system, as it stands on the shining pages of Basil, bears quite a seductive form. His descriptions of his own seclusion among the mountains of Pontus, and of the pleasures of abstracted meditation and holy exercise, can hardly be read without kindling an enthusiasm of the same order.* In his ascetic rules, too, there is very much of admirable and elevated sentiment, and of spiritual discretion; as well as a thorough orthodoxy. More easy is it to yield the heart and judgment to the persuasive influence of the writer, than to stand aloof, and call in question his principles.

Nor perhaps, apart from the aid of that comment which the after history of the Church has made upon those principles, would it have been easy to demonstrate their pernicious tendency: and yet there is little or nothing among the enormities of the ascetic life which might not be justified on the grounds assumed by Basil; as for example, That the domestic constitution of man is abstractedly imperfect, and irreconcilable with high attainments in piety.†—That Religion—or at least that the only admirable order of religion, consists—not in the worthy and fruitful exercise of virtuous principles amid the occasions and trials of common life; but in cutting off all opportunities of exercise, and in retreating from every trial of constancy:—That, in a word, piety is a something which in every sense is foreign to the present state, and can flourish only in proportion as its laws and constitutions are contemned and discarded.

The first practical measure necessary for giving effect to maxims such as these, was of course that of breaking up the conjugal economy, and of gathering men and women (destined by God for each other as sharers in the joys of life, and helpers in its labours and sorrows) into horrid fraternities and comfortless sisterhood of virginity.‡ This violence once done to nature—and then every lesser enormity was only a proper consequence and a consistent part of the monstrous invention. All fanaticism—all cruelties, all impurities were in embryo within this egg.§ Strange does it seem—or strange to us of this age, that the authors and prompters of the unnatural usage, while reading the evangelic records, did not see that the virtue of our Lord and of his Apostles, if we are not to think it quite inferior to that of which the monks made their boast, was altogether unlike it, and must have been founded on different maxims. Of our Lord it is said that he was continually accompanied in his journeys by women who "ministered unto him." But the doctors of monkery assure us that the society of woman is altogether pernicious, and wholly incompatible with advancement in the Christian life;—yes, that the mere touch of a female hand is mortal to sanctity! The sanctity of the monk, then, and the purity of the Son of God had not, it is manifest, any kindred elements.—Of the Apostles and first disciples it is said that they consorted together "with the women," and throughout the history of the Acts nothing appears to have attached to the manners of Christians that was at variance with the genuine simplicity and innocence which is the characteristic of a virtuous intercourse of the sexes. The "angelic life," described and lauded by every Father, from Tertullian, to the Abbot of Clairvaux, is not any where to be traced in the au-

* It was customary with the monks of a later age to select for the site of their establishments the most horrid and pestilential swamps, and this professedly with the intention of mortifying the senses, and of rendering life as undesirable and as brief too as possible. Not so Basil: fully alive to the beauties of nature, he exults in his enjoyment of them. The following description, though perhaps too long for a note, tempts us to turn aside a moment from our path. Addressing the friend of his youth, Basil says—In Pontus God hath shown me a spot precisely situated to my turn of mind and habits.—In truth it is the very scene which heretofore, while idly musing I had been wont to picture to myself. It is a lofty mountain, enveloped in dense forests: on its nothern front it is watered by gelid streams that sparkle to the eye as they descend. At the foot of the hill a grassy plain spreads itself out, and luxuriates in the moisture that distils perpetually from the heights. Around the level space the woods, presenting trees of every species, take an easy sweep, so as to form a natural rampart. Calypso's isle, so much praised by Homer, one might contemn in comparison with this spot: in fact itself might almost be called an island, since it is completely encircled and shut in—on two sides, by deep and precipitous ravines; on another, by the fall of a never-failing torrent, not easily forded, and which like a wall excludes intruders. In the rear the jagged and uneven heights, with a semicircular turn, rise from the skirts of the plain, and deny access, except through a single pass, of which we are masters. My habitation occupies the ridge of a towering height, whence the landscape, with the many bends of the river, spreads itself fairly to the view, and presents, altogether a prospect not inferior, as I think, in gay attractions, to that which is offered by the course of the river Strymon, as seen from Amphipolis. That stream indeed moves so sluggishly in its bed, as hardly to deserve the name of river; but this on the contrary (the most rapid I have ever seen) rushes on to a neighbouring rock, whence thrown off, it tumbles into a deep vortex in a manner that excites the admiration of every beholder. From the reservoir thus formed we are abundantly supplied with water, nor only so, for it nourishes in its stormy bosom a multitude of fishes. What might I not say of the balmy exhalations that arise from this verdant region, or of the breezes that attend the flow of the river? or some perhaps would rather speak of the endless variety of flowers that adorn the ground, or of the innumerable singing birds that make our woods their home. For my own part, my mind is too deeply engaged to give much attention to these lesser matters. To our commendation of this seclusion we are moreover able to add the praise of an unbounded fruitfulness in all kinds of produce, favoured as it is by its position and soil. To me its principal charm (and a greater cannot be) is this—that it yields me the fruits of tranquillity. For not only is the region far remote from the tumult of cities, but it is actually unfrequented by travellers of any sort, a few huntsmen excepted, who make their way hither in search of the game which abounds in it. This indeed is another of its advantages; for though we lack the ferocious bear and the wolf that afflict your country, we have deer and goats, sylvan flocks, and hares, and other animals of the sort.....

Who would not turn monk if he might lead the angelic life in a paradise such as that of Basil?

† Throughout the ascetic writings of Basil every thing commendable or desirable in the spiritual economy is assumed to attach exclusively to that mode of life which could be followed only in the monastery; nor does he think it practicable to maintain faith and virtue in the open world, or while encompassed with the cares and duties του κοσμου τουτου. Not so Paul and Peter. In a letter to his friend Gregory Nazianzen, after describing the distractions of ordinary life, and the cares of matrimony, he says—From all which there is only one way of escape—namely, an entire separation from this world:—not indeed a being absent from it corporeally; but a rending of the soul from every bodily affection;—to be no citizen—to have no home—no property—no friends—to be destitute, and in absolute want—to have no concerns or occupation—to be cut off from commerce with the world—to be ignorant of human learning;—and so to prepare the heart for the due reception of the divine instruction. Such were the principles which this good man diffused throughout the Christian world:—himself did by no means carry them out fully into practice—this part was left for his admirers. So it is that great minds indulge in exaggerations which small minds interpret literally to their cost. It would be useless to quote fifty passages of like import—a hundred might be found.

‡ The author of the Lives of the Saints would fain rid the reputation of St. Basil of the ambiguous honour of having written the tract on Virginity. If there be a doubt on this point, we will assuredly give the Archbishop and the Monk of Cæsarea the benefit of it. Whether it be his or not, the doctrine it mantains is in substance, though not in so unpleasing a form, found in his unquestioned writings. The passages that might the most aptly be quoted in this instance, are best left in their concealment of Greek.

§ The subject of celibacy, and its influence on the character, must again, and more copiously be treated. See next section.

§ We turn for a moment from Basil, who nevertheless is strong on this point. "So far as possible," says Isidore, "all converse with women is to be shunned: or if this cannot altogether be avoided, they should be spoken with only, the eye fixed on the earth..... In the case of almost all who have fallen by their means death hath entered in by the windows!" Lib. I. Epis. 67. Cassian, and still more, his commentators, might be quoted at large on matters of this sort. Gregory the Great says—Qui corpus suum continentiæ dedicant, habitare cum feminis non presumant; and he tells a long story to enforce his advice. Dialog. Lib. III. c. 7. Sulpitius Severus thinks it necessary to excuse his hero, St. Martin, in an instance (referred to in Nat. Hist. of Enthus. Sect. IX.) in which he had suffered the touch of a woman: and in the same spirit, an unknown monkish writer—

> Causa gravis scelerum cessabit amor mulierum,
> Colloquium quarum nil est nisi virus amarum
> Præbens, sub mellis dulcedine, pocula fellis.

thentic story of the first and purest years of the Christian Institution. Why was not a fact so conspicuous perceived by Chrysostom, by Gregory, by Basil? Alas! such is the original limitation, or such the superinduced infatuation of the human mind, that, when once it takes a wrong path, not the most eminent powers of reason, nor the most extensive accomplishments avail to give it a suspicion of its error!

All that could be done by a vigorous and comprehensive mind, well furnished with Scriptural principles, to render the monastic institution as good as its nature admitted, was actually effected by Basil;* and his ascetic writings—his Rules, the longer and the shorter, and his monastic constitutions, if they could, in translation, be purged of their characteristic asceticism, would form an excellent and edifying body of instructions in the practice of piety.—But our time and labour might be better spent. Happily the principles and maxims of religion we can draw from purer sources; and while it is unquestionably incumbent upon the few who aspire to exercise a correct and comprehensive judgment concerning the various phrases of Christianity, to make themselves familiarly conversant with the voluminous remains of ecclesiastical literature, it is certain that the private Christian, with the Bible and with modern expositions in his hand, need not sigh that those treasures are locked up from his use.

In its rancorous stage the fanaticism of austerity is not to be looked for in a writer so great and good as the Bishop of Cæsarea. For instances of this we must turn to some of his contemporaries of less note; and to those who afterwards followed in the same track. Nevertheless the germs of malignant religionism (such as in a preceding section we have briefly stated them to be) are not wanting even in Basil. It is evident, for example, that the very serious impressions he entertained of the Divine Justice, and its bearing upon man, were not balanced, as in the minds of the apostles, by a clear and auspicious understanding of the great article of justification by faith:—his faith therefore was comfortless, severe, and dim.† Again, the scriptural belief of the agency and malice of infernal spirits, had become, in that age, and before it, so turgid and extravagant that it filled a far larger space on the circle of vision than properly belongs to it. In truth, among the monks, the subject of infernal seduction quite occupied the mind, to the exclusion almost of happier objects of meditation. The devil, whatever may be the title of the piece, is the real hero of the drama of monastic piety:—that piety therefore has all the proper characters of superstition.‡

Furthermore, the broad distinction made between what was insolently termed "the common life," and the "angelic," or monastic, and upon which Basil so much insists, could not fail to generate, as in fact it did, a supercilious disdain of the mass, not of mankind at large merely, but of the Christian community, and with it, a preposterous conceit (ill concealed beneath the cant of humility) of peculiar privilege and celestial dignity, as the distinction of a few. Thus was it that all the stones of the foundation of the pandemonium of pride, impurity, and cruelty, were laid by the hands of men whom we must venerate and admire.

The most benign in its elements, and yet perhaps the most destructive in its actual consequences, of all the forms of fanaticism (under this general head) remains to be mentioned;—we mean the custom of pilgrimage. What enterprise can seem more innocent than that of a journey to gratify the tranquil yearnings of pious affection toward a sacred spot?—But what usage more fatal, if we look at its products through a course of ages? Well may it be questioned whether the most ferocious of the ancient superstitions ever made such havoc of human life as have the tranquil pilgrimages of the eastern and western nations. Even the merciless military executions perpetrated by zealot kings upon their own subjects at the instigation of friar-confessors, have probably not caused more death and misery than pilgrimage has occasioned. The reader might startle perhaps to hear it affirmed that, looking only to modern times, the wars that have raged in different parts of Europe and Asia have not wasted the human species to a greater amount than the noiseless processions that, during the same era, have been streaming toward the centres of Brahminical, Mohammedan, and Romish superstition.

Travel by sea and land—the latter not less than the former, does indeed include a hundred chances of death unknown to the resident portion of mankind. But journeys prompted by motives of religion seem to invite and concentrate every ill chance that can possibly belong to a passage from country to country. Among the many routes beaten by the foot of man, which catch the eye as we look broadly over the earth's surface, if there be one that stares out from the landscape—whitened with bones, we shall always find it terminate at some holy shrine. A spot made important by nothing but the dreams of superstition, has become, by the accumulated mortality of ages, the very Golgotha of a continent; and death has fitly erected his proudest trophies on the paths that have led to the place of a sepulchre.

Besides other, and incidental reasons of the difference, it is enough to say that, while men are engaged in mercantile adventure simply, and are acting upon the common inducements of worldly interest, they naturally foresee dangers, and provide against them. But the train of pilgrimage, at first mustered by Folly, has renounced as an impiety, the guidance of reason, and hurrying onward, every day with a more desperate haste than before, has at length poured itself as a torrent along the very valley of death.

It is hard to conjecture to what extent the mischief might have reached—especially in those ages when the frenzy was at its height, if it had not been checked by the saving admixture of grosser motives with the pure fanaticism which was its prime impulse. How greatly are we often indebted (if pride would but own it) to those whispered suggestions of common prudence which we should indignantly spurn if they dared to utter themselves aloud! Yes, and in the wondrous complexity of human nature, provisions are made for the clogging or diverting of every power that tends to run up to a dangerous velocity. Religious delusion is in fact found to coalesce readily, on the one side with soft sensualities, and on the other—strange amalgam!—with mercenary calculations. Oftener than can be told has pious heroism slid down by a rapid descent into sordid hypocrisy, and the stalking devotee of yesterday has become to-day a sheer knave. Just so does a torrent tumble from crag to crag of the mountains, and sparkle in the sun as it storms along;—until, reaching a level and a slimy bed, it takes up the impurity it finds—gets sluggish as well as foul, and at length creeps silent through the oozy channels of a swamp.

The wan and wasted pilgrim—shall we call him devotee or pedlar?—who left his home warm with genuine fervours, unluckily for his reputation, discovered as he went, the secret of profitable adventure. Become dealer, either in articles of vulgar merchandize,* or, still better, in the inestimable wares of superstition—rags—bones—pebbles—splinters, he took his course, barely knowing at length of what sort his errand was, but actually reached his home a wealthy trader, who had gone forth a crazy mendicant. The important effect however of a transmutation of motives such as this, was to impart caution and forethought to the pilgrim enterprise; for it is a singular inconsistency of human nature that men will ordinarily take much more care of life for the sake of goods and property, than they will do of life by itself. If it had not

* Evidence might without difficulty be adduced to prove that the monastic institution, such as it had become in the times of Basil, was rather corrected and purified, than rendered still more extravagant by the influence of his writings. In his own age therefore (if the fact be as we presume) he was a Reformer. His influence, on the contrary, as extended though succeeding ages, has been to hold in credit a system which, but for the support of men like himself, must soon have fallen under the general reprobation and contempt of mankind. Remove from this institution what Basil, Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and Bernard did to sustain it, and not all the exploits of a thousand fanatics could have availed to keep it going.

† The disorders, the corruption, and the religious feuds of the age had evidently affected the mind of Basil in a manner not favourable to his dispositions. A genuine lover of solitude, he was a passionate admirer of Ideal Perfection, and turned with alarm and distaste, as well from the church as the world, in the actual state of both. Yet his was a mind of the governing class. From public interests he could not refrain;—not his paradise in the depth of the wilderness could hold him, when a sphere of power opened itself before him; but he ascended the archiepiscopal throne an anchoret in heart, more even than in discipline and garb;—might we say, an anchoret by imaginative taste. We regard his ascetic writings as the product of the original incongruities of his character: seated in the place of power, he aimed not so much to govern the church-secular and actual; and as a Latin would have done, as to create or to mould a celestial community that should yield itself fully to his plastic hand.

‡ At a very early time the belief of Christians, and especially of the monks, concerning infernal agency, had assumed a form from which nothing could follow but the follies and horrors of superstition. A far extended and exact inquiry would be needed to place this subject in a just light. Though intimately connected with the rise and maturity of Fanaticism, it is too copious a theme to be entered upon in this volume. It demands, however, to be fully considered if we would obtain a comprehensive and satisfactory understanding of the early corruption of Christianity.

* See Robertson's Disquisition on India, sect. 3.

been for these mitigations, pilgrimage, during certain eras, might almost have swallowed up the human race in the countries where chiefly the madness raged.*

A portion only of this system of religious vagrancy belongs to our immediate subject; for it is very far from being true that all pilgrims have been fanatics. Some, as we have said, should be reckoned mere traders, or hucksters under pretext of religion; just as valiant knights were often freebooters, under the same guise. Some, we cannot doubt, have been instigated mainly by that taste for adventure and love of roving which, in certain bosoms is an irresistible impulse. Some, moreover, and not a few, have been flogged on, through their weary way, by pure superstitious terror, or by the well-founded dread of the future retribution of their enormous crimes. And lastly, we must except those (perhaps not many) whose motive may have been only a mild poetic enthusiasm, wholly free from virulence or gloomy fear, and not very difficult to be conceived of, if we are ourselves at all open to imaginative sentiments, and if we will surrender the fancy awhile to the seductive ideas that are called up by long meditation of a distant and hallowed region.†

There was a time—long gone by, when the streams of pilgrimage (if the anachronism of the phrase may be pardoned) flowed from all points around the Mediterranean toward the principal centres of philosophy, or of legislative science. First India, or Chaldea, then Egypt, then Greece, drew from all lands the votaries of wisdom. How marvellously must the love of pure wisdom have declined since those ages!—or else wisdom has become the produce of all climates. More nearly analogous to the pilgrimages of later times, though still very unlike them, was that widely extended practice which brought every year multitudes of the Greeks of all the settlements, even the most remote, and not a few of the still more distant barbarians, to the oracular temples of the mother country, or to those of Ionia and Æolia;—to Oropus, Aba, Dodona, Delphi. Yet although the errand in these cases was often a fruitless one, and the belief whence it arose superstitious, the motive (had but the premises been sound) was calm and rational, and not at all of the sort to kindle the imagination, or to disturb the passions. Instruction, advice, or what perhaps might be equally serviceable—a final decision on some perplexing occasion of public or private life, was needed, and sought for; and, whether for the better or the worse, actually obtained from the ministers of the mephitic cavern. Now it must be granted that an authoritative determination (even supposing there to be an equal chance of truth and error) might, in many an instance, well repay a journey of three hundred miles, or a voyage of five. The common business of life, and the affairs of state too, were often much advantaged among the Greeks by their appeals to what one might call a court of Chancery, in which the god gave verdicts generally without delays—always without pleadings—and most often for moderate fees.

We have yet to search for the pattern or the origin of the practice of pilgrimage; but find resemblances rather than actual analogies. Such may be deemed, and it is not more than a resemblance, that usage of the Jewish people which brought the male population of the country three times in the year to the centre and only sanctioned place of public worship. An auspicious institution—well adapted to diffuse, and to keep in brisk circulation among a simple and agricultural people, the several elements of social and religious prosperity. Then it is evident that the shortness of the distances, the frequency of the visit, and the universality of the obligation, must have obviated the evils which attend the custom of pilgrimage. No danger, ordinarily, nor perilous adventure, and no extreme privations, could beset a journey of fifty—a hundred, or a hundred and fifty miles, through a home-land, densely peopled; nor could any but the calmest and happiest sort of excitement spring up on an occasion which, instead of being a single and solemn act of a man's life, was the habit of his life. But the main circumstance of difference is this, that the resort of the people to the tabernacle and temple, being a national duty, and a general or universal practice, it could never be made the ground of boasting or honour to individuals, nor could be thought of as a meritorious enterprise, by the aspirants to religious reputation.

The Mosaic institution seems to have set the habit of journeying in the Jewish character, and to have fixed it there so firmly and tranquilly, that in after ages, when the circumstances of a visit to the "Holy City" were altogether altered, and were such as might readily have kindled an active fanaticism, dangerous to the governments which allowed it, the ancient devout serenity held its place in the feelings and manners of the people of the dispersion. Those who, during the Persian, Macedonian and Roman eras (the early portion of it) came to appear before the Lord from the remotest settlements of Libya, or Scythia, or India, went "from strength to strength" with a feeling nearly the same as that of their happier ancestors, whose journey lay only through the olive vales of Palestine. It is not until we approach the dark hour of the catastrophe of the city that we meet with the indications of a different spirit. Then indeed a frenzy had seized the obdurate race, both at home and in the lands of its exile; and the resort of the scattered nation to the ill-fated Jerusalem, was like the rush of acrid humours to the heart and head of a delirious man. This season excepted, the Jewish pilgrimages to the holy city were not, as it appears, marked by fanatical turbulence. The purpose of the worshippers was rational, and their religious notions were, in the main, of a substantial and healthy sort;—they did not travel a thousand miles—to kiss a stone, or to purchase a relic; but to take part in the services of that Temple where alone, in all the world, the first principles of theology were understood, and the true God adored. The journey, and its attendant sentiments, were such as befitted its object.

It is a preposterous creed that makes pilgrimage fatal. In this case Delusion leads the way; Crime attends the route; and Despair and Frenzy at the last comes up to urge the infatuated troop toward the horrid spot where Misery and Death are to be glutted with victims. Such, in brief, and with circumstantial differences only, have been the pilgrimages that have beaten the roads of India, of Arabia and of Palestine. To the latter, we should remember, is due the blood-stained glory of giving birth to the Crusades; for if there had been no resort of the pious to the desolated sepulchre, there would probably have been no heroes of the cross:—if no Peter the Hermit, no Tancred, no Godfrey, no Baldwin, or Richard!

Should we not in this place, note the fact that while superstition, as if with a power of fascination, has always been drawing men from extensive surfaces toward some one vortex of delusion, true religion, on the contrary, has shown itself to possess an expansive force, which has rendered it a point of radiation, or an emanative centre, whence light and blessings have flowed to the remotest circumference. Is a criterion wanted which, by exterior facts only, might discriminate between a false and a true belief? little hazard would be run in assuming such a one as this—that the former will be seen to be gathering up, and accumulating, and devouring;—while the other spreads itself abroad, and scatters and diffuses, as widely as it may, whatever benefits it has to confer. Christianity is not the religion of a shrine, of a sepulchre, of a chair, or of a den; but of all the broad ways of the world, and of every place where man is found.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTE.

In treating of the Fanaticism of the Scourge, a passing notice, at least, of the miserable Flagellants of the 13th and 14th centuries, may be looked for. The pitiable frenzy, though of fatal consequence for a time, and horribly suppressed, does not seem to merit much attention either as a matter of history or of philosophy. What has been handed down concerning those dolorous vagrants, is familiar to most readers. Froissart's account (Vol. ii. p. 263) relates to the last eruption of the Flagellants. "This year of our Lord 1349, there came from Germany persons who performed public penitencies by whipping themselves with scourges having iron hooks, so that their backs and shoulders were torn: they chaunted also, in a piteous manner, canticles of the nativity and sufferings of our Saviour, and could not by their rules, remain in any town more than one night; they travelled in companies of more or less in number (it is elsewhere affirmed that they amounted sometimes to ten thousand, and included persons of the highest rank) and thus journeyed through the country, performing their penitence for thirty-three days, being the number of years Jesus Christ remained on earth; and then returned to their own homes. These penitencies were thus performed to entreat the Lord to restrain his anger, and withhold his vengeance; for at this period an epidemic malady ravaged the earth, and destroyed a third part of its inhabitants." This fanaticism was of too turbulent a kind to be suffered by the Church, which, after severely denouncing it, and in vain, at length let loose upon it the armed ministers of her power. Eight thousand persons were massacred in a day by the Teutonic knights at the command of Pope Clement VI. There is reason to believe that some articles of the dominant superstition had been called in question by these penitents.

* It was not merely as venders of relics, or of the productions of the East, that the pilgrims found the means of refunding the expenses of their journey; for it appears to have been customary for them on their way home to perform sacred dramas in the streets and squares of the towns through which they passed. Ceux, says a French writer, qui revenoient de Jerusalem et de la Terre Sainte, &c. . . . . composoient des cantiques sur leurs voyages, y meloient le recit de la vie et de la mort du Fils de Dieu, ou du Judgment dernier, d'une maniere grossiere, mais que le chant et la simplicite de ces temps la sembloient rendre pathetique . . . . . Ces Pelerins qui alloient par troupes, et qui s'arretoient dans les rues et dans les places publiques ou ils chantoient le Bourdon a la main, le chapeau et le mantelet chargez de coquilles et d'images peintes de diverses couleurs, faisoient une espece de spectacle qui plut. . . . .

SECTION VI.

FANATICISM OF THE BRAND.

Galerius, Alva, Bonner, cross our path in every street of a populous city; and moreover the agents and ministers of such formidable personages might be found in every crowd. The chief and his company, fit for the labours of religious cruelty, we must not think have passed away with ages long gone by; but rather believe that they are about us now, and wait only the leave or bidding of circumstances to re-act their parts. Or, to confess in a word the whole humiliating truth, it is Human Nature, such, alas, as it is harboured in each of our bosoms, that offers itself with more or less readiness to the excitement of malign and even murderous passions!

At once therefore justice toward the signalized authors of persecution, whom we are apt to regard as beings of infernal origin, and a due caution, having respect to the possible events of some day which may yet come in the world's history, demand that instead of taking a distant glance at the gloomy tragedies of remote times, we should look into the heart in search of those deep sunken motives whence the worst atrocities might take their spring. The man is indeed to be envied whose spirit contains no such elements as might enable him to institute an analysis of this sort. Few will make the profession; and perhaps among those who would, there may be one or more that, if actually drawn into the eddy of turbulent passions, would be found foremost in deeds of violence; for it is certain that the prime impulses of a sanguinary fanaticism act and re-act one upon another until an emotion is generated which quite bears down the gentler feelings of our nature.

The offence given to self-love, and the wound inflicted upon pride by resistance in matters of opinion, is deep in proportion, not simply to the importance of the question debated, but to its obscurity also; for in this case a secret dread of being at length overthrown and humbled, adds asperity to arrogance. It is obvious then that no subject can equal religion in furnishing occasion to these keen resentments. The vastness and unlimited range of the matters it is concerned with—the infinite importance of its capital truths, and the readiness with which the weight of what is substantial may be made over to what is not so—even to the most trival of its adjuncts, fit it well to impart the utmost vehemence to whatever feelings attend the contests of mind with mind. All this hardly needs to be affirmed; nor can we wonder to see the bitterness of ordinary strife assuming, when religion is the subject of controversy, a solemn virulence, such as makes secular contentions seem vapid and trivial. Common hatred now rises to an immortal abhorrence; wrath swells to execration, and every ill wish breaks out in anathemas.

That feelings so strong should vent themselves in vindictive acts, when opportunity serves, is only natural; and we might, without advancing further, account in this manner solely for the cruelties in which religious discords have so often terminated. But there seems to be something yet deeper in the tendency to employ torments and death as means of persuasion. It should be expected that a course of action so preposterous as that of destroying men in professed love to their souls,* will be found to take its rise from a sheer absurdity:—such, for example, as that of putting an antagonist into the position with which we associate the idea of atrocious crimes in order to confirm ourselves in the belief that he is indeed an atrocious criminal. This we grant is reasoning in a circle; but it is a logic not strange to the human mind. A secret influence not to be resisted, impels us to do homage to the primary elements of virtue, even when most we are violating its particular precepts. This homage, although tacit, and rendered unconsciously, is not the less real in its effects. We can in no case hate and curse our fellow-men until after we have wrought ourselves up to the persuasion that they are condign objects of such treatment. But in the instance of religious animosities such a persuasion is not ordinarily to be attained, except in a circuitous track. Even the slenderest pretext for charging upon our opponent moral delinquencies is often wanting: on the contrary, perhaps a life and temper absolutely blameless put to shame every attempted calumny. Woe to our victim if this be the case, for then the cruel work of vilifying him must be so much the more elaborate! To establish to our own satisfaction the guilt of our enemy by the method of argument—by fair inference and evidence, is a process too slow to keep pace with the velocity of the vindictive passions. What then remains but by the forms of law—if law be at our bidding, and by the sword of justice—if justice be our obsequious servant, to consign the hated impugner of our will to the class of malefactors? When once we have looked upon him covered with ignominy—and if we can but see him pale with the paleness which a dungeon sheds on the face—and if we do but catch the clanking of a chain about his neck which a Barabbas yesterday wore; yes, and if we hear him groaning under torments that are the necessary schooling of obdurate wickedness—then we can fill up with ease what before was wanting to tranquillize a just revenge. The circle of our ideas is complete, our moral instincts come round to their close; we breathe again, and by inflicting those heavy injuries which are presumptive evidence of demerit, we prove to ourselves, as well as to the world, that the object of our hatred was indeed worthy of detestation!

A mode of reasoning analogous to this (if reasoning it should be called) is not of rare occurrence. "The man must be odious, or should I thus maltreat him?" and then greater outrages must be committed, if it be only to justify the first assault. The bystanders in a common quarrel may often follow angry spirits around a circle of this sort. Perhaps in the first burst of resentment a much more grievous imputation of bad motives was advanced than the facts of the case would at all sustain; or indeed that the accuser had himself seriously intended. But his position is now taken, and hatred can make no backward step. At once to bring over to his side the sentiments of others, and to fill out his own vindictive emotions, he goes on to deal with his antagonist as if the exaggerated indictment were fully established. Then, from the overt act of vengeance an inference is brought back upon the demerit of its object.

Religious rancour once generated, whether in the manner we have described, or in some other which we have failed to penetrate, gets aggravation from incidental causes, some of which demand to be mentioned. Such as arise from specific opinions we shall presently have occasion to speak of. To look then to external causes, one of the most ordinary and obvious is the mixed feeling of jealousy and interested pride that floats about the purlieus of every despotism, and especially of every religious despotism. It is trite to say that cruelty is produced or exasperated by the consciousness of impotence; and as the foundations of spiritual tyranny are less ostensible, and more precarious than those of secular government, its alarms will be more vivid, its jealousies more envenomed, and its modes of procedure more rigorous and intemperate. The natural temper of men being supposed the same, it can hardly happen otherwise than that the rod or

* There is no cruelty comparable to that which wraps itself in a villanous hypocrisy. The Romish Church (nor that alone) has always professed the tenderest regard to the spiritual welfare of those whom she was about to let drop into her fires. And thus the Holy Office, in the instructions which guide its agents, provides that—"If a prisoner falls sick, the inquisitors must carefully provide him with every assistance, and more particularly attend to all that relates to his soul." See Llorente.

staff of ghostly supremacy should be a more terrible engine than the sceptre and the sword of temporal power. Must we not admit, too, and may we not admit without offence, that, if once he gives way to the taste for cruelty, the man of the cowl and cloister will prove himself a more inexorable and a more ingenious tormentor, than the man of the field and cuirass?*

In its very worst condition, and during those ages when every thing human was broken up or corrupt, the sacerdotal order, looked at in the whole of its influence, must be allowed to have been a benefit to the nations: and how incalculable a benefit has it proved in happier eras! Yes, and who shall imagine the happy fruits of the same institution when it shall come to take effect upon the social system with the unembarrassed power of its proper motives? What now we have to speak of is the special sacerdotal temper, such as we find it when all those motives were forgotten, or were spurned.

The moral sentiments are almost always, or in some degree, put in danger by the possession of privilege; still more so if the beneficial distinction be of an undefined and intangible sort. This danger is much enhanced if serious privations, or disabilities, are the price paid for indistinct honours; because in that case a perpetual petulance, or dull revenge, works itself into the character, and adds the bitterness of concealed envy to the arrogance of rank; so that the malign sentiments of the pauper and of the oligarch are concentred in the same bosom. If moral disadvantage can yet be aggravated, it is so when the being who already is too much alienated from his species by the destitution of real sympathies, and by participation in a ghostly nobility, is, in his mode of life, actually secluded from the open world, and breathes the poison of a cell.

Nevertheless the pernicious consequence of circumstances so unfavourable will be found open to many more exceptions than theory may lead us to expect: for it might naturally be thought that not one human heart in a thousand would fail to become depraved from long exposure to influences so bad: whereas in fact it is not perhaps more than a third of every thousand that undergoes to the full the perversion of its genuine sentiments; while another third appears scarcely at all impaired by a process that might seem of efficacy enough to break down the virtue of a seraph.

Yet our anticipations will not fail us in relation to the third or the fourth of any body of men so cruelly placed in the very focus of spiritual ruin. Some such proportion will always exhibit in temper (and in conduct if opportunity permits) what a vicious system may do in rendering men—men like ourselves, abhorrent, malign, or foul. Especially shall we find in such a body frequent instances of a peculiar species of ferocity, like to nothing else in the circle of human sentiments;†—a rancour from which has been discharged all that is vigorous and generous in manly resentments, and all that is relenting in those of woman;—a rancour which, although some few single examples of it had before been shown to the world in the course of twenty centuries, had never attached to a body as its characteristic until the sacerdotal institution, under the fostering care of the Romish Church, reached its maturity.

What modern heart would not leap with fear if it were permitted to us for an hour to step back from the nineteenth century to the age of Vespasian, and to push our way into the theatre of imperial and popular diversions, just when the gladiator was about to die for the sport of a philosophic prince, and of sumptuous citizens; or when hungry beasts were to be glutted with the warm flesh of the nobility of a conquered kingdom! And yet the ancient Roman theatre, with its mere sprinkling of blood, and its momentary pangs and shrieks, quite fades if brought into comparison with that Colisæum of papal cruelty, in which not a hundred or two of victims, but myriads of people—yes, nations entire—have been gorged! If we must shrink back, as assuredly we should, from the one spectacle, we shudder even to think of the other.—Though it were possible to summon courage enough to gaze upon the mortal, yet equal, conflict of man with man in the theatre, how shall we contemplate torments and burnings inflicted by the strong upon the weak; or if we might endure to see the lion and the panther spring upon their prey, could we force ourselves to the far more horrid sight, when the priest and the friar, athirst, were to rush upon men, women, and babes!

Agitating emotions, whether of indignation or of terror, are however to be restrained, and in a calmer mood—a mood compatible with the exercise of reason, and which may allow us even to intermingle, where it can be done, excuses and pity for the perpetrators of crime (often far more unhappy than the sufferers), we should survey that strange scene of wo whereon the Romish priesthood, age after age, has figured.

But is it equitable, some may ask, to single out the Papal Hierarchy as the prime or incomparable example of religious ferocity? Were not the ancient idolatries—Druidical Syrian, Scythian and Indian, cruel and sanguinary; and have not the more modern superstitions of Mexico and Hindoostan been deeply stained with blood? This is true; but a broad distinction presents itself, which places the papal immolations and tortures on a ground where there is nothing to compare with them. It might be enough to say that an annual or triennial sacrifice of a few victims, or the gorging of captives reserved for that very purpose from the slaughter of the field, have in no country amounted to a tenth of the numbers that, in equal portions of time, have fallen around the altar of the Romish church. But leaving this point, there is a clear difference, much in favour of the pagan rites, between the shedding the blood of a victim (using the term in its restricted and proper sense) at the impulse of a sincere superstitious dread; and those executions and exterminations that have sprung, not from horrors of conscience, not from error of belief, but from a sheer rancour. Superstition does indeed tend to blood, and often is guilty of it; but Fanaticism—fanaticism such as that of the Romish Hierarchy, breathes revenge, and murder beats from its heart.

Historic justice demands however that another comparison should be made, and it is one which seems to relieve a little the horrors of the papal tyranny;—we speak of course of the severities under which the Christians of the first three centuries suffered, from the pagan predecessors of the Popes, on the seven hills. Might we not believe that the demon of blood, though dislodged for a season when the house of Cæsar fell in ruins, had lurked a century or two in the mists of the Tiber, or had slept in the swamps of Campania, until scenting its new occasion, and springing up refreshed, it entered with greetings the halls of the Vatican. It may be difficult or impossible, imperfect as is our information, equitably to decide between imperial and papal Rome, on the question of ferocity. Yet some points of difference present themselves very clearly;—as, 1st. The imperial persecutions of the Church are, in most instances, to be attributed to the personal temper or the fears or jealousies of the emperors, as individuals.* Whereas the papal cruelties sprung from the system, and never failed to be displayed, whatever might be the character of the Pontiff, as often as the specific provoca-

* One of the earliest and most zealous advocates of the practice of burning heretics is said to have been the Abbot Theophanes, who himself suffered extreme severities under the Iconoclast, Leo V. Pain (for beside his voluntary penances he was subject to the stone) was the unhappy man's element; and he doled it out to others with a freedom corresponding with the alacrity with which he bore it himself. This connexion between the infliction and the endurance of torments has been a very frequent one; frequent enough to bring under just reprobation every specious form of asceticism. The Abbot Theophanes, we are told, commenced his course of abnegation by an act well fitting the part he afterwards acted as author or promoter of ecclesiastical cruelties. "Being arrived at man's estate, he was compelled by his friends to take a wife; but on the day of his marriage he spoke in so moving a manner to his consort on the shortness and uncertainty of this life, that they made a mutual vow of perpetual chastity. She afterwards became a nun; and he for his part built two monasteries in Mysia."—Lives of the Saints, March 13.

† In that particular species of ingenuity which exercises itself in the invention of torments, the sacerdotal artists have certainly outstripped all competitors. Happy is the reader if he be still ignorant—and continue so, of the mechanical secrets of ecclesiastical prison-houses. Descriptions of this sort injure the mind; they rack the imagination, and engender emotions of resentment and disgust which do not well comport with Christian feelings.

* The first persecution (to follow the vulgar computation) was the act of Nero—Religionum usquequaque contemtor; the second of Domitian—non solum magnæ, sed et callidæ inopinatæque sævitiæ: what shall we say of the emperors to whose jealousies or philosophic pride are attributed the third and fourth? The fifth took place under Severus—natura sævus—vere Pertinax, vere Severus. The sixth under Maximin—a genuine savage, as jealous as fierce:—the seventh, horrible as it was, should be attributed to the political fears and energetic resolves of Decius:—the eighth persecution perhaps had its origin in the envy of an obsure individual. The austerity and vigour of Aurelian, qui esset, says Lactantius, natura vesanus et præceps, if not diverted, would probably have given to the ninth more than a name. The tenth and the heaviest was the fruit partly of the personal dispositions, but more of the political fears of its two imperial authors.

tion arose.* 2dly. More than one or two of the ten persecutions (to follow the common computation), appear to have been, on the part of the imperial government, a desperate endeavour, prompted by serious alarms, for ridding the state of a formidable intestine foe. A reluctant use, as it seems, was made of means so severe, but which were deemed indispensable to the preservation of the vast and shaken edifice of the empire.† Now if it be alleged that the papal persecutions had often similar motives, and might therefore admit of a parallel excuse, we must rest the difference on the ground, that the maintenance of civil polity (if the means be lawful) is a duty and a virtue in public men; while we can regard the supporters of a ghostly domination in no other light than as hateful usurpers;—never can it be a virtue to uphold that which, in its essence, and under any condition, is wicked. Then 3dly. The pagan persecutions were (for the most part) enacted and executed by men schooled in the field of war—and of war often against barbarous hordes. They were men indurated, too, from youth by the spectacles of the theatre—that is to say, taught ferocity as much by their pastimes and festivities, as by their campaigns. From the hands of beings so trained what could be looked for?‡ But it is quite otherwise with the popish cruelties; for these, in every age, have been devised and executed by men of the cloister; men emasculate in habit, and whose nerves should have had the sensibility which sloth, study and indulgence engender. An atrocity perpetrated by the hand of a delicate woman is always deemed to indicate a more malignant soul than if it be the act of a bandit or a pirate. By the same rule, should not the priest be somewhat more humane than the soldier? Yet in fact the principals and the agents in the destruction of heretics were men who had personally learned none of the bad lessons of war, and had witnessed no scenes of torment or bloodshed but those in which themselves were the actors. Should it be forgotten, while this comparison is pursued, that the emperor and the senate, the proconsul and the centurion, knew nothing more than the darkness of paganism could teach them; but popes and cardinals, legates, priests and monks, held the Gospel of peace in their hand!§

The bas-reliefs and bronzes of the age of Roman greatness have brought down for our inspection the form and visage of the Roman soldier, such as he was under Nerva, Trajan, Aurelius, Domitian. The contracted brow declares that storms of battle have beat upon it often: the glare of that overshadowed eye throws contempt upon death: the inflated nostril breathes a steady rage: the fixed lips deny mercy: the rigid arm and the knit joints, have forced a path to victory, through bristled ramparts and triple lines of shields and swords. And withal there is a hardness of texture that seems the outward expression of an iron strength and rigour of soul—a power, as well of enduring as of inflicting pain; and the one with almost as much indifference as the other. Shall we conceive of encountering, on the open field, a being so firmly fierce, and so long accustomed to crush and trample upon man? But who shall imagine himself to have been delivered into the hands of the Roman soldier armed, not as a warrior but as executioner! This indeed is terror. Alas, then, let us commiserate the fate of our brethren and sisters in Christ—the early martyrs!—What had they to look for when the centurion's band, such as we see it now encircling the column of Trajan, was let loose upon a flock of trembling victims, with license and command to torture and to kill!*

Yet we have not reached the extreme point of horror:—there remains a picture which still more chills the blood. True, the Roman soldier, as well by his murderous occupations, as by his brutal usages, had become hard and cruel; yet there was no mystery in his rage:—savage more than malign, his purposes of evil sprung only from the provocations of the hour; they were not profound as hell. We turn then from the bas-reliefs, and the sculptures, and coins of ancient art, and open an illuminated codex—choice treasure of a monkish library. At the head of homilies and prayers, and of meditations and miracles, and set in flowers of purple or gold, we find the veritable effigy of the canonized zealot;—abbot or brother—a Dominic or a Fouquet. How delicate was the bodily frame and outward texture of the man:—the soft contour bespeaks physical and mental laxity; yet is there, too, in the mobile features an indication of that resolution which excitement may give, if not that which animal courage imparts. An abject habit of soul, together with a boundless insolence;—a usage of submission to every tyranny, and an arrogance that would crush a world when provoked, meet in the tortuous brows. Under how many impenetrable coverings are the secrets of that heart concealed; if we are to judge by the wily closing of the lips, and the wrinkled temples! The face, taken at a glance, is the very pattern of penitence and ecstacy; but to look at it again is to find it wanting in the traces of every human affection. The man, beside that his occupations have not been of the sort that give vigour to the animal system, and cheerful alacrity to the mind, has no kindly relationships, no natural cares, no mild hopes: he is not social, not domestic; but in the place of all genuine impulses, harbours the rancid desires of a suppressed concupiscence. Who could imagine him to be husband, or father, or friend, or neighbour, or citizen, or patriot? Hover where it may, this is an alien spirit—foreign to whatever is human; at home only in the world of ghostly excitements:—it haunts earth; not dwells upon it.

What then, think we, shall this being show himself when he comes to be inflamed by spiritual revenge, and quickened by the virulence of those boundless hatreds which a malignant superstition engenders! And what when the engines of a mighty despotism are entrusted to his zealous hands! Horror has now nothing worse to conceive of:—the ghastly ideal of cruelty is filled up. Who would not rush from the grasp of the irritated ascetic to cling to the knees of the Roman soldier, and there plead for human compassion!

Yet is this same horrific personage human, nor perhaps worse than many, if we deduct all that the bad system it has been his wretched lot to live under, has done to pervert him. The Franciscan—the Inquisitor, once sucked the breast of woman, and joined in the mirth and gambols of childhood; and even now, if it were possible to take him apart for a moment from his rules and his crucifix, we might find in his bosom the germs at least of the common charities of life: yes, doubtless he is human; and if the sinewy fabric were exposed by the knife of the anatomist, the transformation that has made him so unlike to other men could not be detected.—The brain, for aught that appears, might as well have entertained reason and truth as another brain;—the heart, for aught that we can see, might, as readily as another heart, have throbbed with pity.

System and circumstance deducted—the Franciscan or the Inquisitor may be found in all communities.—Look, for example, at that grave and abstracted, yet youthful countenance

* The personal character of the Pontiff has no doubt often made itself felt in the measures pursued by the Church. But in quite as many instances the handling of the keys has seemed to effect a total metamorphosis of dispositions:—the cardinal was one being—the pope another; and the college has had reason almost to doubt the identity of the person whom they had lifted to the summit of power. Thus the very man who had been singled out as more likely than any other to respect his oath, and to achieve desired reformations; has been the one most audaciously to brave the amazement of his comrades, and to defy the clamours of Christendom. The average date of each pontificate, taking the entire series to the present time, has been little more than seven years—and those, generally, the last years of decrepid age. But a system of government which, from century to century consigns the reins of power to trembling hands, must of course derive its temper and character much more from the body than from the head. The average reigns of the Roman Emperors was about ten years;—and those, for the most part, the mid years of life;—few of the series reached the extreme verge of mortal existence.

† Putting out of view the violent dispositions of Galerius, there is abundant reason to believe that the fatal decision which burst like a thunder over the Roman world from the palace of Nicomedia was the result, in the main, of purely political calculations. Nothing beyond such calculations appears (two hundred years before) to have influenced the conduct of Trajan, such as himself holds it up to view in his letter of instructions to Pliny.

‡ The Roman soldier had become a far more ferocious being in the age of the emperors than he was in that of the consuls. In the early era he was a member of a limited community, and had his home—his virtues—his personal sentiments; in the latter period he was ordinarily nothing better than an enlisted barbarian—how unlike to the warrior-citizen of whom, subaltern as well as chief, it might be said, in the words of Florus, ... expeditione finita, rediit ad boves rursus triumphalis agricola.

§ It is customary to speak of the middle ages as being destitute as well of scriptural as of profane learning; and this may be true of the mass of the people; but certainly not of the principal actors in Church affairs. By the ecclesiastical writers of those times Scripture is quoted as largely and familiarly as it is in modern religious books. St. Bernard (of whom we shall have occasion presently to speak more at large) in the tracts and letters by which he instigated the second crusade, scarcely moves through a paragraph without a text. Every thing is thought of—but the morality of the enterprise!

* The cruelties endured by the Christians were often inflicted to appease the ferocity of the rabble. Και γαρ και τον Αττακλον τω ὀχλω χαριζομενος ὁ ηγεμων, εξεδωκε παλιν προς θηρια. Epist. Vienn. et Lugd. Similar expressions abound in the early martyrologies.

—pallid, and somewhat fallen from the salient outline that should bespeak the actual years. What intensity in the glare of the sunken eye! What fixedness of purpose in the lips! and the movements of the youth seem inspirited with some intention beyond simple locomotion, or mechanical agency:—as he walks one would think that he was hastening onward by the side of an invisible competitor for a prize at the goal. Or hear him speak:—he is terse and precise: his tones, too, have a certain mystic monotony in place of the natural modulations of a voice so young. But listen to his opinions; how vehement are they; how darkly coloured his representations of simple facts;—exaggeration swells every sentence: and how far from youthful are his surmises; and his verdicts how inexorable!—not a look, not a word, not an action of his belongs to the level of ordinary sympathies: all is profound as the abyss, or lofty as the clouds. But, strange to say, you may find this our instance, perhaps, to be one of a community that boasts itself as the especial enemy of intolerance.—He has been bred in the heart of the very straitest sect of liberality, and would die gladly in the sacred cause of religious freedom! Ah! how like is man to man, strip him only of a garb!—Take now our fervent youth, and immure him a year or two with twenty like himself, in some dim seclusion:—there work upon his passions with whatever is acrid in the system he already holds, and draw him on with a little art—the art of sacred logic, from inference to inference, until he comes into a state of mind to which nothing, the most exorbitant, can seem strange. You must then find for him a sphere of excitement; and without beads or a cowl he will act the part of the worthiest son of the Church that has lived.

We return to matters of history.—By what rule of equity is a balance to be held between the cruelties of the papacy, and the exterminating wars of the Moslem conquerors? Without affirming absolutely on which side the scale might turn, certain points of comparison at once present themselves:—such for example as these.—The fury of the early propagators of the doctrine of Mohammed was that of warriors who, having launched upon the great enterprise of conquering the world, could not mince their measures. Or if we turn to those who in a later age took up the cause of the Prophet, we must remember that the ferocious hordes that pressed upon Christendom were Scythian before they were Mohammedan, and had long been used to drink the blood of their enemies from skulls, when they came to be taught a new religion from the Koran. The Moslem conquests (under the caliphs) were a storm that wasted the countries it passed over, and died away; and it is to be remembered that the conquerors, when once firmly seated in their fair possessions, exhibited in their polity and manners far more that was liberal and humane than the world had long before seen, or than it saw elsewhere, during many ages afterwards.* Of the intolerance of the modern Mohammedan world, Turkish and Persian, it may fairly be said that, though in a sense attributable to the religious system of those nations, their despotic policy is nothing more than a homogeneous part of the oriental economy. This intolerance is Asiatic, rather than Mohammedan. What but rigour and a tyrannous dogmatism can be imagined to find a place among nations whose theory of government springs from the relation of lord and slave?† Whether this theory belongs to the climate, or to the physical conformation of the race, or to what else, we will not say; but come whence it may, it is much older than the age of Mohammed; nay—as old as history.

That measure of liberty of opinion (we may remark in passing) or of liberality of sentiment and of sceptical indifference, which of late has worked its way through the widening fissures of the Persian and Turkish governments, is not merely inconsistent with the abstract idea of those political structures, but incompatible with their continuance. If already the dyke of despotism had not bulged and gaped, the insidious element of freedom could not so have penetrated its substance:—the fact of its having penetrated is at once a proof of decay, and a prognostic of that coming rush of waters that must, within a century, lay waste (lay waste to fertilize) the eastern world, from the deserts of the Indus to the mouths of the Danube:—shall we add—to the shores of the Baltic, and the banks of the Elbe?

But the elements of the social system, and the principles of its construction have ever been, even from the remotest times, altogether of another sort in the west. Notwithstanding all oppressions and degradations, the love of liberty, through a long course of ages, yes, during the lapse of three thousand years, has clung to the European race. If some of these families, anciently as free as others, have, in modern times, quite sunk to the dust under the foot of despotism, it has only been by the presence and aid of the spiritual Power—by the Incubus of the Church, that the people have fallen. Popery apart—every nation west of the Euxine had long ago been free:—nay, had never been enslaved. The papal usurpation (thinking of it now only as a system of polity) has resided in Europe, not as a form of things in harmony with the spirit and temper of the region; but malgre the aboriginal character with which it has always had to contend.* Popery is not to Europe what Mohammedism is to Asia, but rather a long invasion of a soil which nature had said should bear nothing that was not generous. When shall the European families drive the exotic tyranny for ever from their shores!

There is little difficulty then in finding a sufficient reason, though not the sole reason, for the incomparable cruelties of popery; its restless jealousies, its exterminations, its inexorable revenge, have all been proper to it as a precarious and alien despotism. The consciousness of an inherent hostility between itself and the temper of the nations it has seduced and subdued, has made it a tyranny more merciless than any other mankind has tolerated. Even popery, we may fairly believe, might have been less sanguinary had it from the first seated itself in some congenial torrid climate—native to abjectness and slavery.

Were it true that this ancient, and now decrepit Mother of corruption had actually disappeared from the real world; or even could we believe without a doubt, that she was very speedily to vanish, time might be better spent than in searching any deeper for the secrets of her power. But alas, it is not so; and moreover it is true that a portion at least of the bad qualities whence this power arises, attaches to other systems beside the Romish Church, and may be discovered in dogmas not covered by her scarlet mantle. On all accounts then we must advance in our scrutiny, and expose, if it be possible, the hidden impulses of that malign fanaticism which popery has so largely engendered.

With this purpose in view, something must be said, 1st, of the doctrine of the Romish Church; 2dly, of its constitution as a polity; and something, 3dly, of its sacerdotal institute.

1. We are, of course, to speak of the Romish doctrine only in the single point of its tendency to generate, or of its fitness to sustain, a sanguinary fanaticism.

The prominent article of the New Testament, and which distinguishes Christianity from all other religious systems, is a doctrine of Mercy incomparably full, free, and available. And yet this happy announcement of forgiveness of sins takes its stand upon a much more distinct and alarming assertion of the rigour of Divine Justice, and of the extent of its penal consequences, than hitherto had been heard of, or than the natural fears of conscious guilt would suggest, or readily admit. This ample promise of Grace, and this appalling declaration of Wrath, may fairly be assumed as the prime elements of true religion, working always, and intended to work, one upon another, for the production of those vivid emotions, that are becoming to man in his actual relation to God.

What less than the most serious evils can then accrue from disjoining in any manner these two essential and correlative principles, or from any sort of tampering with the efficacy which the one should exert upon the other? If, for example, the doctrine of immutable justice and future wrath be brought into question, or abated of its force and meaning, then instantly the doctrine of mercy loses its significance, its moment, and its attractions; and fades into the vague idea of an indolent clemency on the part of the Supreme Ruler—an idea which at once relaxes the motives both of piety and morality. Such (we appeal to facts) has been the invariable result of every attempt to reduce the plain import of certain passages in the Gospels. Or, on the other hand, if the rule

* In the next Section the Mohammedan military fanaticism will come to be considered.

† The reader may perhaps think that the southern states of the American Union, where no other marked distinction exists between man and man, except that of lord and slave—or of sallow skin and black, present an instance directly at variance with the position advanced above.—We assume this very instance, on the contrary, as the most pertinent that could be adduced in confirmation of the general truth.

* Every one knows that the several eras in which the papal despotism consolidated and extended its power were those in which the civil polities of Europe were in the feeblest or most distracted condition. The termagant watched the moment always when the virile power of the nations was spent or fallen.

and method of forgiveness, as declared in the Scriptures, be in any way abused, then will the theatened wrath take a wrong direction, and not fail (from its own intrinsic quality) to produce the most dire effects. The tremendous doctrine of eternal perdition, loosened from its proper hold of the conscience, will remain at large, and be at the disposal of the spiritual despot, to be drawn on this side or that, as may best subserve the purposes of intimidation and tyranny. Nor is this all, for the same appalling doctrine so perverted by the despot, will take effect upon his own heart and imagination, and school him to act his part as the unflinching instrument of every horrid barbarity.—The zealot tormentor, taught from the pit, wants nothing but power and tools to render him indeed terrible and ruthless.

If it were demanded to give in a few words the chief incentive of the ferocity of Romanism, we must plainly say, that the doctrine of eternal damnation—as held and perverted by the Romish Church, is the germ of its cruelty. Or the truth (such we deem it) may be expressed in general terms—That a malignant fanaticism of some kind (truculent if opportunity permits) will attend every misrepresentation or misapplication of what the Scriptures affirm concerning future punishment. It should be added that an error of this sort naturally follows in the track of an abused doctrine of grace.

Let it be noted that our Lord and his ministers speak of the wrath of God as provoked by nothing but impiety and immorality; and they leave us in no doubt of what it is specifically which they mean when they issue their comminations. It is the blasphemer and the impenitent; it is the murderer, the thief, the liar, the slanderer, the impure, the adulterer, the perjured person, and the rapacious; or, in a word, the sensual, the malignant and the unjust, who have to expect the fiery indignation—the future "tribulation and anguish." Terrible as it is, this doctrine leans with its whole stress to the side favourable to virtue; nor is there any thing mystic, indefinite, or obscure attached to it. If any complain of the severity of the threat—let them forsake the evil of their ways, and its severity shall not touch them. Does any complain? nay rather, let him repent, and it shall go well with him.

And not only, in the preaching of our Lord, and in the writings of his Apostles, is the threatening clearly attached to a vicious and irreligious life, and to nothing else; but it is employed in no other way, and for no other purpose, than to enforce, or to give solemnity to the invitations of mercy. How cogent is the reason why men should humble themselves before Almighty God, and instantly sue for the pardon of sin!

Thus defined, and thus employed, the doctrine, appalling as it may be, was clearly an engine of benevolence:—it must have been grossly perverted if, in any case, it has ceased to deserve this commendation. So was it at first, and so, in any age, whoever, after the example of Christ—the Saviour of the world—spends life and strength in the endeavour to lead his fellows to the arms of the Divine compassion, because there remains a "fearful looking for of wrath" which shall fall on the impenitent, is not only no fanatic, but deserves the praise, and will win the recompense, of the highest and purest philanthropy.

Not such is the Romish doctrine of wrath; nor such the spirit or style of its preachers; nor such its pit of perdition. What is the Papal Hell but the State Prison of the Papal Tyranny? The future woe, converted into the instrument of its oppresions, has made it natural that the inflictions of the infernal dungeon should be taken as the exemplars of sacerdotal barbarity. All offences of a moral kind, even the most atrocious, having come under the management of the Church, and being made the subject of a mercenary commerce between her and the transgressor, so that while he submits implicitly to the direction of the priest (who farms heaven) he has nothing to fear, the bearing of the doctrine of retribution is wholly turned off from the consciences of men; and the genuine association of ideas, which connects sin and punishment, is broken up. The preacher may still declaim about the righteous judgment of God; but in fact, and in every man's personal apprehensions, the terror of justice has passed off obliquely, and is no more thought of in its due place. The future Retribution remains therefore at large to serve the turns of the hierarchy: it is nothing else than an ecclesiastical terror. The Romish place of perdition awaits—the infidel, and the heretic, and whoever provokes the jealousies of the Church. Let us fix our minds a moment upon the natural consequences of this perversion of so momentous an element of religion.

We will imagine then that he have received and firmly embraced this Romish dogma as true. How does it affect our general sentiments toward the bulk of mankind; or what impression does it convey of the Divine character and government? Under such an influence, in the first place, we learn to think that the most heinous crimes—crimes aggravated by a full knowledge of religion, and committed in the face if its sanctions, enjoy perpetual impunity by the means of a villanous and interested misprision on the part of the functionaries of Heaven; so that in fact Justice takes no hold of those whose fortune it is to be born upon a canonical soil, and where, the dispensing power having its agents, pardons are always in the market. The actual state of morals in countries where, age after age, nothing has been tolerated that might serve to correct the proper influence of popery—Spain, Portugal, Italy, is proof enough that these suppositions are not imaginary.*

Yet the dogma has another, and perhaps it is a worse aspect. Imbued with its spirit, we turn toward the millions of mankind—pagan and Mohammedan, whose misery it has been to have possessed no religious light—or a mere glimmer, and who, if we are to trust to our Lord's rule of equity, are to be "beaten with few stripes," for this proper reason, that they knew not his will:—but upon these, we are taught to think, the unrelieved weight of the future wrath is to press.—These, because they have no holy water, no holy oil, no absolving priest, are to suffer without mitigation. Thus have we subverted the order of reason and justice, and have rendered the righteous retribution of Heaven, which, as expounded in the Scriptures, is altogether of a sanatory influence, horribly corrupt and despotic.

The practical inference is natural and inevitable.—If God thus deal with his creatures—inflicting the heaviest penalties where there has been the lowest responsibility; and allowing a mercenary commutation of punishment in the case of the most aggravated guilt, why may not man, in his dealings with his fellows, follow in the same track, though at a humble distance? Who can affirm that, to carry the brand of exterminating war into the heart of pagan and Mohammedan lands—to hack and rip up and dash to the ground, and burn, detested tribes of misbelievers—miscreants, is not a religious work? If it be not so, then the harmony that should subsist between divine and human virtue is broken. Such has actually been the belief and practice of the Romish Church in every age. Did the feeble nations of the Mexican Isthmus, and of Peru, fall under the feet of the most Catholic people of Europe? Yes; but the mere avidity of gold would not have prompted so many torments and so many massacres:—the soldier was pushed on by the friar, with this very dogma of perdition burning in his bosom.

And yet an inference which had to be carried out a thousand miles, or across the Atlantic, would not immediately affect more than a portion of the people in any country. Not so the inference which fell upon the heretic at home. In this application of it every man—every husband, and every wife, every father, and every child, might be concerned.† Especially did it affect the sacerdotal order, through all its ranks, and at every moment; nay, every motive of corporate interest, and pride, and jealousy, bore upon it with the greatest force. The heathen world out of view, then the lake of perdition was to be peopled only by heretics, and by the contumacious impugners of Church power.—"Submit, recant, and be saved; persist and be damned."—Such was the voice of the Church, and such the rule of its proceedings; and the history of Europe during a full thousand years—a history written in blood, has been the comment on the rule.

True it is, that the Ecclesiastical Hell of the Romish despotism has, of late, been closed, and a seal set upon it by the strong hand of the civil power, or the stronger hand of popular opinion; but the dogma is what it was, and where it was. The pent-up fire of its revenge still murmurs through the vaults of the spiritual edifice, from the mouth of the Tagus to the Carpathian mountains; give it only wind, and how should it rage to the skies! The Waldenses, the Lollards, the Reformed of Germany, Italy, Spain, Holland, England, and the Huguenots of France, were the victims, not of a cruel age, but of a cruel doctrine; and that doctrine is as cruel now as it was in the pontificate of Innocent III.

* The state of manners in the southern countries of Europe is now unhappily but too well understood in England; for the profligacy of the continent has of late been shed over the entire surface of our ephemeral literature. No reference on this subject need be made to authorities. If it be alleged that the manners of the northern and protestant states are but a shade or two better than those of the south, we shall then have to balance the unobstructed influence of popery against the scarcely at all obstructed influence of infidelity—and the scale is seen to turn a little in favour of the latter.

II. A vindictive spirit and ferocious acts belong of necessity to a polity such as that of the Romish Church. Already we have mentioned the contrariety which subsists between the aboriginal European temper (as compared with the Asiatic) and a tyranny so excessive as that of the Church, and have noted the consequent severity of the hierarchial power. But this is not all; for while it is true that popery is alien to the climate and to the races of the western world, it exists also, and in another sense, as a foreign power in every single country of Europe—Italy excepted. Need we then defend the general principle that a foreign domination is more jealous, and oppressive, and less placable than a domestic government? Or if there be exceptions to this rule, assuredly the Romish church does not afford one. But the theme is trite. Every reader of modern history must have observed the pernicious influence which Italian churchmen and monks have exerted in the councils of the European states. This influence has made itself seen in the rigour of those measures which kings, under terror of excommunication, have been compelled to adopt for the maintenance of the far-stretched authority of Rome;—and especially when the skirts of the Church fell over countries that were quickening into freedom.*

Over the same area, or nearly so, Imperial Rome extended her sway; but her instruments of power were visible, intelligible, and readily applied; and therefore admitted of leniency and reason in the use of them. A military despotism, founded on the right of conquest, confides in its means of securing obedience, and is often less afflictive to a country in fact than in name. It must be otherwise, and always has been so, with a ghostly despotism. The conscious indistinctness of the grounds on which it demands submission inspires it with an anxiety that leads it to overdo its severities. And then the abominable hypocrisy of not itself touching the sword of justice (alack, the cleanness of its hands!) but of setting the civil power at work when blood is to be shed, can never fail to render its executions so much the more cruel and severe. To be tried and condemned by one authority, and punished by another, is a hard fate, and can differ very little from that of becoming a victim of blind fury.

Besides as the spiritual Despotism rules by usurping the imagination of men, and is seated upon their fears of an awful futurity, it will, by a natural connexion or harmony of causes have recourse, when provoked, to those means of intimidation that, by the horror they inspire, call up the faculty on which the tyranny takes its hold. When endangered by resistance, it will endeavour to regain its ground by such displays of intolerable anguish in the persons of its foes as shall fitly symbolize the torments that await them in the world to come. The doctrine of perdition, as held by the Church, will be visibly typified in the modes of punishment it employs. Fire is the chosen means of its chastisements.†

III. We have to speak, lastly, of the Romish clerical institution, and to exhibit that natural connexion of motives which has drawn upon the temper of its sacerdotal order a fanaticism more intensely ferocious than the world has elsewhere seen.

If the secular influence of the papal superstition be now immensely diminished, and if the engines it once wielded have been broken; if no longer it can breathe the rage of war into the hearts of kings; and if the humility it effected in the twelfth century, is forced upon it in the nineteenth, and if therefore the danger of its hurling a brand again into the bosom of the European community be extremely small—it is nevertheless true that the Romish Clerical Institution does still exist on all sides of us: and that its elements are, in the nineteenth century, precisely what they were in the twelfth. And it is true moreover that an institution so incurably pernicious should be looked at, notwithstanding its actual feebleness at any moment, as a virulent germ, that waits only a favourable season to spring up with all its native properties about it.

The errors of Romanism, doctrinal and practical, we are so much accustomed to regard as objects of theological reprobation, that it is not easy at once to look at them in the light of what may be termed their physical quality. We propose however now to consider the Romish clerical institution in that light, (all Biblical argument apart,) and especially to trace in it the natural generation of the spirit of cruelty.

A word already has been said of the moral peril to which the sacerdotal order, under even the most auspicious circumstances is exposed. Of the several points of disadvantage there alluded to, we now select only one;—but it is the chief, and it is that one which our proper subject points to. We affirm then that the law of celibacy, taking effect, as it does, upon a large and promiscuous body of men, cannot fail to produce, in a certain proportion of instances, a rancorous fanaticism. The broad fact that it has done so, we take as the guide and support of our argument, and turn to the common principles of human nature for the interpretation of the fact.

Nothing intelligible can be meant by the phrase—the laws of Nature; if we do not understand—Divine Constitutions wise and good, which are not to be tampered with, but at our cost. To say that such or such is the intention of nature, is to imply that some severe, and often incalculable mischief will accrue when that specific intention is thwarted. The usages of nations, or their political institutions, or their religious practices, have in a thousand modes contravened the beneficent purposes of the Creator; but never have done so without entailing innumerable woes. Yet is it remarkable that in such cases the actual ill consequence, often, has not been altogether of the sort that would have been looked for; or has not been apparently the direct effect of the special cause. An evil, such as none had foreseen, breaks out, on the one hand or the other, and stretches, we know not how far. In truth, the great machine of the world—intellectual and physical, is so intricate, and so remotely compacted part with part, that when we disturb a power, no human sagacity can say where, or at what stage our presumption will meet its punishment. Thus we shall find it to have been with the celibacy of the Romish priesthood. The direct and obvious

* The native free spirit of the European stock, which in England has long had its scope, has in no age been altogether broken down in France. The Gallican Church, century after century, has hung loose upon Rome; and the papal court has well felt how precarious were her spiritual possessions west of the Rhine and the Rhone. The horrors of St. Bartholomew, and the cruelties perpetrated by Louis XIV. were only the proper expressions of the conscious alarms of the Romish power in regard to France. When shall France learn to blush at once at her atheism and at her superstitions? Is it any thing but her atheism and her superstitions that have compelled her to cede to England the first place of moral influence in the world at large, and of foreign empire! The horrors committed in the Netherlands by the Duke of Alva afford another illustration of the rule that has guided the Romish despotism in measuring out its vengeance.

† A curious comparison might be drawn between different nations on the point of the modes of capital punishment in use among them. The subject can only be glanced at here; but well deserves a more ample treatment. The Jews had three or four modes of inflicting death, but chiefly used the most summary—hanging or stoning. The Greeks had seven or eight; yet very rarely had recourse to those which were excruciating:—the poisoned cup was the most usual; or casting from a precipice. But fine, slavery, or banishment, were much oftener employed than capital punishment. The Romans, after they had conquered the world, and had amalgamated the usages of barbarous nations with the ancient practice of the Republic, added to their list of penal terrors several excruciating deaths; especially empalement or crucifixion. Yet, if the acts of a few execrable tyrants are excepted, none but horrid and incorrigible criminals are consigned to lingering agonies. The institutions of Mohammed rather mitigated and restrained, than aggravated the penal severities of the oriental nations. Fines, whipping, or cudgeling, were admitted instead of death, very freely. And whatever horrors may have been perpetrated by savage Scythian chiefs, it cannot be affirmed that cruelty is the character of the Mohammedan penal code.

The Romish Church, simplifying its practice, has fixed upon that one mode of inflicting death which must altogether be deemed the most horrible of all. She admits indeed, in certain cases, of strangling before burning; but again, in other cases, has used slow roasting instead of burning at the stake. But the three main circumstances that distinguish the papal executions from those of any other polity are these—1st. The prodigious number of the victims of her courts. 2d. That all but a very few of these victims were confessedly guiltless of crimes visibly injurious to society. And 3d, That, while other polities have reserved ignominious and excruciating punishments for rare instances of obdurate wickedness, or for frightful crimes, and for persons of the vilest rank, the Romish polity has put out of view all such distinctions, and has, without respect for rank, or habits, or personal merit, consigned to the flames—nobles, prelates, men of letters, women, children. Nothing at all comparable to the blind ferocity of the Romish executions has elsewhere been seen in the world:—the world has seen no such judges as her priests.

inconveniences and evils of the institution have indeed followed it every where, and have been seen in the profligacy it has spread over the face of society, in the abominations it has fostered, and in the personal sorrows it has entailed. But these, shall we say, have not been the MAIN MISCHIEFS of the system; for we regard as deeper and more extensive than any of them, the encouragement it has given to exorbitant and inexorable opinions, to portentous modes of feeling, to outrageous courses of conduct, and, in a word, to the spirit that delights in destruction and torture. The sanguinary fanaticism of the Ron ·h Church we trace, through no very circuitous track, to the unnatural personal condition of its ministers.*

The true extent of the violence done to human nature by the practice of religious celibacy has been in a great measure concealed from notice by a partial fact that seems to excuse it. It is always true that, in a body of men taken at random, a certain number will be found (we need not hazard a conjecture as to its amount) to whom, from peculiarity of temperament, a life of celibacy cannot be deemed unnatural, and to whom it will be no grievance. At least it may be affirmed of such that some moderate and accidental motive of prudence, or taste, or the vexations of an early disappointment; or perhaps a praiseworthy regard to the welfare of relatives, will abundantly suffice to reconcile them to their singular lot. Then beyond this small circle there will be a wider one, including not a very few, to whom a motive some degrees stronger will prove efficient to the same end. A vigorous selfishness, abhorrent of disturbance in its comforts, or fearful of the diminution of its dainties, will answer such a purpose:—are there not those who would never marry lest they should be compelled to dine less sumptuously? Or a strong intellectual taste produces the same effect:—there have been artists and philosophers, many; yes, some of the most illustrious of men, who, having wedded a fair ideal, have sought no other love. Still more (and to approach our specific subject) the powerful sentiments of religion, have in very many instances, and in a manner not culpable, (sometimes commendable,) separated men from the ordinary lot, and rendered them in a genuine sense virtuous, as well as happy, in single life. Such cases—exceptions made without violence, it is proper to take account of;—they are Nature's exceptions, and those who come fairly under the description shall be styled, if they please, a physical aristocracy—born to illustrate the supremacy of Mind.

Now inasmuch as religious motives—being more profound than any others, can never be brought within calculation, so as that we might fix a limit to their power, it must be deemed impracticable to ascertain to what extent they may operate safely, and without engendering much positive evil, in swelling the company of the unmarried. A large space should be left open for exceptions of this kind; and we should be slow to inculpate motives, or to condemn a course of conduct which, in the eye of Heaven, may not be reprehensible. In times of great religious excitement, and especially during the undisputed prevalence of enthusiastic opinions, who shall say whether ten or twenty in a hundred might not devote themselves to celibacy, and yet neither undergo nor diffuse a sensible injury? Human nature has a pliability that admits of its adapting itself to very great variations of sentiment and practice.

The exceptive fact, such as we have stated it, was manifestly the rudiment of the ancient religious celibacy; and it ought to be granted that, so long as a high and genuine excitement lasted, and moreover before spiritual despotism came in to avail itself of the usage, and to stretch the anomaly beyond its natural limits, the ill consequences would not be extreme. But how immensely different is the state of things, and how must the mischief be aggravated, when the law and custom of celibacy, having come to constitute an essential and permanent element of the social and political system of a country, not merely takes up the little band of cœlibes by destination of nature; but is every day applied, by priestly or paternal tyranny, to temperaments of all kinds, and with a blind cruelty is made to include those very instances upon which it will not fail to inflict the worst imaginable injuries! In thinking of the celibacy of the Romish clergy, we are too much accustomed to regard it under the palliation of supposing that it is an institution which just serves to draw into a company the scattered individuals of that frigid class which every where exists;—whereas in fact it observes no such rule of selection. The age at which youth are devoted to the service of the Church makes it certain that, in by far the greater number of instances, this decision is altogether irrespective of any physical aptitude to submit to the condition imposed upon the ministers of religion.* Might we advance a step further, and conjecture that, so far as personal fitness is at all thought of, there is a double probability that the most unhappy cases will be thrown into the toils of the presumptuous vow? Who does not know that an early destination to the Church very often is the consequence (in the first place) of a manifest sluggishness of the animal and mental faculties—a sensual and indolent propension, which, though it must cut off a man's chance of success in the arduous engagements of common life, is likely to be no bar to his advancement in the sacred calling; and certainly can never expose him to cruel mortifications in the discharge of its even-paced functions. But alas, what will the oath of virginity probably do for constitutions of this order—the very idea must be dropped. Or (in the second place) a youth is not seldom devoted to the clerical profession from reasons of an opposite kind, namely, a precocious display of intellectual tastes, with its attendant irritable delicacy or debility of constitution, which is foreseen to preclude laborious employments. And yet these very cases (nine out of ten of them) are precisely those in which the most lamentable consequences must ensue from the violence done to nature by the sacerdotal institute.

The high importance of the subject—the incalculable extent of the evils that have attached to it—the actual existence of the abuse in our own times; and (may we add) some appearance of the rise of a general indignation against it even in the heart of catholic countries, invite and may excuse (notwithstanding the difficulty of doing so) our advancing;—nay, the subject is inseparable from the specific theme we have in hand.

Before we insist upon some more special matters, let us for a moment consider what, though often adverted to, can never be too much regarded—the negative influence of clerical celibacy, as it cuts off from the unhappy class of men to whom it applies, the very means which God has provided, and the only generally efficacious means of generating sentiments of compassion and tenderness in the bosoms of men. Doubtless there are born a few milky natures, soft and sensitive, that, without wife or child, feel and weep, and are kind as woman. But taking men at large, and taking them exposed as they are to the rude operation of laborious occupations, and to the ungentle collisions of sordid interest, it is only as husband and father, and as possessors of the enjoyments of home, that the rough force of the mind, and the harshness of the temper, are broken down—that gross selfishness is attempered; and especially that the habit is formed of considering and of realizing by sympathy, the pains, infirmities, wants, and sorrows of others.† It is in this point peculiarly that human nature needs a softening power; and admits it too. Barbarities often of the worst sort spring from the mere want of the habit of regarding the feelings of others; but this habit is not of spontaneous growth; it must be inwrought by the repetition of proper occasions.

* A multiplicity of independent circumstances had influence in ripening the two principles—namely of clerical celibacy and ecclesiastical intolerance: but it is fair to point out the coincident growth of the two. In truth the latter followed so closely and constantly upon the former, that to deny all connexion of causation is to be resolutely incredulous.

* In boyhood ordinarily. Although celibacy was not imposed upon the secular clergy until long after the monkish system had reached its settled form, yet when it was so imposed, what had been the usage of the monastery became the usage of the clergy universally. And as the monastic vow was often taken before the eighteenth year (for we find Gregory the Great, fixing that as the earliest age in certain exceptive cases) so was it usual for the sacerdotal function to be chosen irrevocably at the same period of life. Nay, it would seem that ordination, and church preferment even, were often conferred upon mere striplings. Scholares pueri et impuberes adolescentuli ob sanguinis dignitatem promoventur ad ecclesiasticas dignitates, et de sub ferula transferuntur ad principandum presbyteris; lætiores interim quod virgas evaserint, quam quod meruerint principatum.—St. Bernard de Officio Episcoporum, c. 7. Cautions against the ordination of beardless youths are of frequent occurrence, proving the abuse to have been common: Pueri ad sacros ordines nullatenus admittantur, ne tanto periculosius cadant, quanto citius conscendere ad altiora festinant. In later times, as it is well known, the transition has been immediate from school to the church. It has been the policy of the Jesuits especially to make their selection of youths from the schools under their care. The earliest display of intellectual power fixed the eye of the superintendant; and forthwith the venom of the society's fanaticism was shed into the victim's mind.

Amid the stern contentions of public life, or under the severe labours and dangers of the field, a man is learning to discard as an incumbrance every gentle emotion, and is arming himself to bear down opposition. But he comes home (and unless unblessed indeed) is schooled in another and a better lesson. Taken even at the lowest calculation, the amount of this counter-influence is vast.—What would be the world if we can imagine it to be wholly withdrawn?—Look but to the rugged labourer, impenetrable and insensible as he seems, and follow him, when his task is done, to the door where he meets helpless playful infancy—where he finds that his wants have been thought of—where he has offices of kindness to discharge:—follow him, and admire the provision made for correcting in one hour the ungracious influences of twelve! Nor is our supposition romantic.—Whoever has been conversant with the lower classes, and whoever has an eye and an ear to catch the expressions of human charities, as rudely uttered or uncouthly displayed, must often, in the crowd that gathers in a street about distress, have detected home-taught hearts, and paternal sympathies, where the aspect and the tones indicated only a sensual ferocity.

Should we count it then a light matter to come in upon the circle of the domestic remedial influence (God's beneficent ordinance) with our monstrous institutions, and at a stroke to cut off from a numerous body of men, and for ever, and from the class that are to be the teachers of mercy, all their part in the economy of human kindness? If indeed the design were horrid, the means would be fit; but if it be religious, how preposterous are the means!

Let it only be imagined that the preservation of the social system demanded some necessary office, at once foul and sanguinary, hard and loathsome, to be discharged, and that, to secure a supply of wretched beings to go through with the cruel function, it were deemed proper to train from the cradle a certain proportion of mankind.—Among the various means that might be devised for effecting the initiation of such a miserable class, and for securing to it an education exclusive of every gentle sympathy, and of rendering our agents both impure and rancorous, what measure more efficacious could be imagined than that of imposing upon the unfortunate band the very celibacy in which the Romish Church breeds her ministers?

We must yet look at this institution in its operation upon specific temperaments.

It is fair to assume that, of a body of men taken at hazard from the mass, and placed under the restraint (or rather the profession) of continence, a considerable portion—perhaps a third, will very early in their course throw off every thing but their hypocrisy, and become thoroughly profligate. The notorious condition of those countries where nothing has forbidden the natural expansion of the Romish system, would warrant our affirming that two-thirds of its clergy come under such a description. Nay, perhaps our English credulity would be ridiculed at Madrid, Grenada, Lisbon, Florence, Lima, or Rio Janeiro, if we persumed that any more than a very few of the sacerdotal class were not utterly debauched.* Now if men of this sort are to be placed by the side of the licentious "out of orders," then the difference against them will consist in that aggravation of crime which his sacrilege and blasphemy heap upon the head of the Churchman. As violator and corruptor of every family about him, he makes his way, as it were, through the presence chamber of the Eternal Majesty, and, as he goes, formally invites the Omniscient Purity to look upon his deeds of shame!

It cannot but happen that the dissolute priest—one hour surpliced and before the altar, and the next—where we must not follow him, should become intensely more wicked than the secular man of pleasure. So foul at heart will he become, that no enormity can distaste or alarm him. Not often are such men in any sense fanatics;—of enthusiasm they are incapable, and rancour is not their characteristic. Nevertheless, in times of general excitement, or at the call of superiors, and for the support of corporate interests, they will fall into their places around the scaffold, or the stake, with much composure;—and lend their hands too in the work if needed. Nay, human nature admits, when it has reached this stage of corruption, of an infernal frenzy; sensuality and cruelty in a moment collapsing, and the herd of swine suddenly seized of the demon of malice rush on—not themselves indeed to dash from the precipice, but to fall upon the innocent.

To omit lesser distinctions, we may next adduce the instance of those, and they will not be a few, of a middle sort, who though they may once and again have fallen under peculiar temptations, and so may have lost that mens conscia recti which their vow should have preserved, are nevertheless ordinarily retained in the path of virtue by the motives proper to their order;—by a sense of professional decorum, by ecclesiastical pride, and by sentiments too which, for want of an unexceptionable term, must be called—religious. And yet the continence of men of this class is not at all attributable to coldness of temperament. We must stop short of a full explication of the state of feeling likely to grow out of a position such as this; it may however be said that the human mind can hardly be placed in circumstances more pitiable or injurious. Quite unlike to it is the voluntary celibacy of secular men of similar constitution. The iron girdle of a solemn irrevocable oath, galling the conscience, because a violated oath, and yet not to be laid aside—the Churchman's prudery of spotless virtue, wounded to the quick by humiliating recollections, and the impulses of nature fought off from disadvantageous ground, leave no tranquillity, allow no repose within. Rather a tempest of passion rages in the bosom—a tempest so much the more afflictive, because it may gain no vent.*

To the tumultuous stage of this mental conflict there succeeds perhaps, either a dead hopeless debility, most pitiable to think of, or perversions of the mind still more sad. But if the character have more vigour, and does in fact repel the assailants that would tread it in the dust, such men will be found in a state of peculiar preparation for admitting malignant excitements,—the very substance of the soul has become combustible—a spark kindles the latent heart, and the passions blaze to heaven. A settled feeling, hard to define or describe, but which might be called a chronic revenge, of which humanity at large, and all forms of enjoyment are the objects, is the habit of the mind, and is always in readiness to be shed forth upon whatever it may meet. Some grateful alleviation of the inward torment is obtained by merely witnessing sanguinary scenes;—the hidden anguish which has so long silently preyed upon the heart, is diverted for an hour while torture is inflicted upon another; and the woe of the soul, which might not express itself in words, or hardly in sighs, seems to be vented in the groans of a victim.

Such transitions of strong and turbid emotions from one channel to another are not very unusual. Few sensitive minds can be at a loss in recalling analogous instances from the page of personal history. If the torrent of feeling is

* The Romanists can have no more right to boast of the purity of the Catholic clergy of England, or to appeal to the manners (confessedly respectable) of English priests, as a fair specimen of the sacerdotal body, than modern deists have to take a parallel advantage of the mild temper and irreproachable character of some who now reject Christianity. To judge equitably of Deism, we must look at it where it has received no correcting influence from Christianity. Popery must be judged on the same principle. We do not ask what Romish priests are when surrounded by protestantism; but what where the system develops itself without restraint. Most readily and cheerfully is it granted that, notwithstanding the cruel disadvantages of his condition, the English priest is ordinarily correct in behaviour, and crimable as a member of society.

* It were better to sustain in patience the imputation of advancing exaggerated statements, and of giving a stronger colour to an argument than the facts of the case would justify, than to do the uninitiated reader so serious an injury as to bring to light the evidence that bears upon this question. An appeal therefore is made to whoever has actually perused, or at least looked into the ascetic writers from Macarius, Ephraem, Pelladius, and Cassian, downwards to those of the twelfth century. On the ground of the evidence which might from those sources be adduced, a general result may be stated under three heads—namely,

1st. That the monastic vow and the life of celibacy FAILED TO SECURE THE PROFESSED OBJECT of the institution in all but a very few instances, and that it did not promote that purity of the heart which was acknowledged to be its only good end.

2d. That beside the evil of cutting men off from the common enjoyments, duties, and sympathies of life, the work of maintaining and defending their chastity (exterior and interior) absorbed almost the whole energies of those (a very few excepted) who sincerely laboured at it:—so that to be chaste, in fact and in heart, was pretty nearly the sum of what the monk could do, even with the aid of starvation, excessive bodily toils, and depletic medicine—to say nothing of his prayers, tears, and flagellations.

3d. That the monastic institution, even during its earlier and better era, entailed the most deplorable miseries, and generated the foulest and most abominable practices, so that, for every veritable saint which the monastery cherished, it made twenty wretches, whose moral condition was in the last degree pitiable or loathsome.

Now shall we leave these propositions unsupported by proof?—or will the Romanist—the pride and prop of whose Church is monkery, challenge us to make good our allegations.

choked on one side, it swells and bursts a passage in another: and strange as it may seem—not strange perhaps if we scrutinize attentively the structure of the passions, it is a fact that the gentle and genial affections have a specific tendency, when cut off from their natural flow, to take the turn of rancour and ferocity. The spirit baffled in its first desires and defeated, not subdued, suddenly meets a new excitement, although altogether of a different order;—combines with the novel element, and rushes on, it knows not whither.

Will it seem paradoxical to affirm that some of the most portentous exhibitions of ungovernable violence that have amazed the world, or have been signalized in history, have been nothing but the out-bursting of long suppressed passions of some other kind than those which appear? We venture to say that certain extreme cases of religious ferocity might be explained (were we in possession of the secret history of the individuals) on this principle: and then would be cleared up the mystery of the union of virtue and piety (of a spurious kind) with a horrible cruelty of temper.* Could we delve in some spots of the earth's surface, far down towards its secret caverns, we might come upon the laboratories of nature, where chemical agents in constant turmoil have, age after age, convulsed the abyss—yet unfelt above. Yes, perhaps low beneath some of the most tranquil and smiling landscapes, where no such terror has been ever seen or surmised, furious tempests of fire are continually shaking the infernal vault. But in a moment, by the heaving of the cavern, a new element rushes down, and egress too is made:—heat tenfold more intense than before is suddenly generated. The very bowels of the world swelter and are molten:—the jagged jaws of the pit are sundered; torrents of fire rush up, and are flung to the clouds, and kingdoms are covered with dismay.

We grant at once that our comparison in appearance goes beyond the occasion, and is disproportioned to the subject.—Let it then be condemned as inappropriate. Nevertheless the truth remains certain that the mischiefs occasioned by even the most dire of volcanic eruptions have been trivial, if compared with the sorrows, and pains, and devastations, that have, in more than a few instances, sprung from the burning cavern of only a single human bosom. What is the descent of a river of lava through vineyards and olive groves, or what the overthrow of hamlets and the burying of villages or castles, compared with the torments and imprisonments, the conflagrations, the famines, the exterminating wars, and the ages of national degradation, all of which have had so simple and narrow an origin as the fiery malice of a friar's heart? Better were it, incomparably better for mankind, that a new volcano should heave itself from the abyss, and spout sulphur in the centre of every province of every European kingdom, than that Dominicians and Franciscans, papal legates and Jesuits, should find leave to repeat the massacres and executions which so often have stained the soil of France, and Spain, and Portugal, and Italy, and Germany, and Holland, and England.

There is yet another, and a very different order of men upon whom the vow of celibacy cannot fail to produce the most pernicious effects. We mean those stern natures that are, in a sense, pure and clean, but not so much by poverty of temperament, as by hardness of mental structure. They are not cold as water but cold as marble; not solid as ice, but solid as iron. They shed no tears, and have no power of relenting, because there are no humours or lymph at all in their constitutions. Every nerve is a chord, stretched till it vibrates, and which will sooner snap than relax. There are born a few men (men, for they have bones and muscles—senses and bodily organs) and especially do such make their appearance under the wing of gloomy superstitions, who themselves quite exempt, as well from animal appetites as from social affections, and unconscious of the soft alternations of hope and fear, grief and joy, look with grim contempt upon humanity;—even as man may look upon the most ignoble of the brutal orders.

The state of celibacy, which cost such men no struggle, they will esteem their glory, as being a fit outward sign of the intrinsic dignity which lifts them above their fellows. Celibacy to such is but a visible seal of spiritual supremacy—a scutcheon of nobility in the kingdom of heaven. Conscious of immaculate and unalterable personal sanctity (if continence be sanctity) and conscious of a sort of ecstatic indifference under the voluntary pains of penance—floggings, fastings, and vigils, how can they doubt themselves to have reached the utmost summit of virtue? Their virtue, is it not seraphic, rather than human? What can sully such excellence?—as easily slur the bright sky of noon, as contaminate a piety so celestial!*

Yes, but of all the preparations for atrocious crime, none is more ominous or complete than a presumption of possessing superhuman virtue. Sanctity of this heroic and immortal order may dip its hands in blood and fear no stain! Illusions such as these, egregious as they may seem, are not foreign to the human mind. The holy arrogance of the soul, so long as it can be held entire, is a warrant that will cover all extents of guilt. There is no murder in murder, no falseness in perjury, no sin in any sin, if but the perpetrator is inflate with the persuasion of himself being a demigod in goodness. No self-deception so extreme can be maintained by men who walk along with others upon the vulgar level of human interests; whoever would be mad at this rate, assuredly must not be citizen, neighbour, husband, or father; for the duties and offices of these relations teach even the most preposterous minds some common sense. It is celibacy and the cell that skreen the infatuation, and that foment it.†

Surrounded as we are in the present day, happily, by circumstances altogether of another sort, nothing less than a vigorous and continued effort of the imagination can enable us to follow those links of transition by which, so often, the stern ascetic, whose devout meditations we may even now peruse with pleasure and advantage, has passed to the fervours of a truculent zeal. These links are fewer than at first we may think. Let any one conceive himself to have laid down, as he may put off a garment, every social affection, remote and intimate, and to have thrown off every sympathy

* Mr. Butler strenuously denies the imputation ordinarily cast upon Guzman (Saint Dominic), of instigating and personally enacting the barbarities of the Crusade against the Albigenses. It is probable that his conduct in this instance was in harmony with that of the Church generally, and especially of his spiritual progeny—the Inquisitors, who, abhorring to soil their own fingers with blood, delivered the condemned to the civil power to discharge the last "offices of Mercy." The point in question may seem of infinitely small moment. Nevertheless, as a signal and unmatched instance of the sort, the character of the Founder of the Dominican order is worthy of the labour that might be needed to set it clear from the misrepresentations of all kinds, which cover it. The author hopes to be able, in a future work, to give the result of an examination of authorities touching the reputation of this dread personage. We find modern Romanist writers far more discreet and cautious on points of this kind than were their predecessors of the sixteenth century. Thus while the Author of the Lives of the Saints takes pains to keep the reputation of St. Dominic clear of blood, an Italian annalist, speaking of the pontificate of Innocent III. plainly says, Nacque allora l'eresia di Tolosa, che fu da S. Dominico ammortata. But how extinguished? not until fire and the sword had converted the finest countries in Europe into a wilderness.

* It is surely more than a mere coincidence that the very age in which the folly of conferring celestial titles upon illustrious churchmen reached its height, was the era also wherein the execrable intolerance of the papacy burst forth with the greatest fury. While torrents of blood were flowing in the east and the west, at the instigation of spiritual heroes, the interior of the Church blazed with the superhuman virtues of ANGELICAL doctors, and SERAPHIC doctors—and so forth. Yes, and at the very moment that the duty of the civil power to aid the Church in the extermination of heretics and infidels was loudly preached, the fervours of the saints were reaching such a pitch (if we are to credit their devoted biographers) as often to lift them while in prayer many feet from the ground. "F. Leo, the secretary of St. Francis (of Assisi), and his confessor, testified that he had seen him in prayer raised above the ground so high, that his disciple could only touch his feet, which he held and watered with his tears; and that sometimes he saw him raised much higher." Lives of the Saints, October 4. It was in one of these elevations that the saint received those far-famed stigmas of which his order have so much boasted—unless indeed we listen to the story which affirms that St. Francis and St. Dominic, while together at Rome, fell out, and actually proceeded to blows; when the latter seizing a spit, inflicted some severe wounds upon his unarmed friend. This story perhaps should be regarded as an allegory, intended to prefigure the hot animosities that afterwards prevailed between the ghostly progeny of the two Founders. It is remarkable that, besides other "bones of contention," these very stigmas became the subject of a fierce warfare between the rival orders; the Dominicans having the audacity to claim for their founder the very honour which the Franciscans had long thought their own without dispute. But we have wandered from our purpose, and return to it to remind the reader that, at the very time when the miraculous wound in the (right) side of St. Francis was oozing gore in attestation of his seraphic piety, the soil of Languedoc was soaking in the blood of the luckless inhabitants—blood shed at the instigation, or under the eyes, of these same superhuman saints.

† There are exceptions. Simon de Montfort was bred not in the cell but the camp; and although, as Mr. Butler assures us, "his zeal and piety equalled him to the apostolic men;" yet had he acquired it all in the open world.

with what animates the open world, and to be mulct at once of manhood and humanity, and with a sort of desperate apathy to look down upon the theatre of life. Add to this supposition the heats of a turgid piety, and then ask whether much would be wanting to open the way to cruel or vindictive desires.

Or let any one entertain another supposition—as for example, that being arraigned on the indistinct ground of some political offence, in relation to which prejudice and passion have much scope, he stood at the bar, and saw his jury to consist of a dozen cowled anchorets, just summoned from their dens of morose meditation. Who would indulge a hope of receiving justice from such a band? Aye, would not a man shudder were he to descry only one such being among the twelve; and must he not believe that the pertinacious rancour of that one would effect his destruction?

Shall we pass from the light and air of an English court, to some pestilent cavern of the Holy Office?—an atmosphere in which Justice has never borne to remain even an hour, and in which Mercy never spoke.* The reverend assessors, with their obsequious ministers—tools in hand, are, we will imagine, drawn in even proportions from the three classes just specified. To the right and left sit those of the first sort—the lookers on, whose vote for the use of the rack and pully has often had a motive more detestable than even the most horrid malice, and who hasten the consent of the court to a fatal sentence that they may save the hour of some adulterous appointment. Next are those of our second class, in whose bosoms mingled passions, and alternate irreconcilable desires, are beating like the waves of a tempest-troubled sea. To them is not this very hour of gloomy service the season toward which tumultuous emotions have long been tending, as the time when they should get vent? It is then that the grinding torments of wounded pride or despair are to relax awhile; as if the culprit (Jew, or Moor, or heretic) who is to groan his hour upon the wheel, were to take up as substitute the anguish that grasps the heart of his judge. Nay, we do not carry imagination too far;—it belongs to human nature thus to feel;—the sight, and even the infliction of extreme suffering, loosens for a moment the gripe of internal distress. The vulture of remorse or revenge forgets his part to glare upon other agonies, and rests appeased in listening to another's sighs.

But what say we of the President of the Court? to him we must allow the praise of loftier motives. Not since sunset of yesterday has he tasted bread, or moistened his shrivelled, bloodless lip. Watching and prayer, though they have not spent him, have wrought up the chronic fever of his pulse to a tremulous height, that almost reaches delirium. Yet settled and calm is his front, and his eye glazed:—the spirit, how is it abstracted from mortal connexions! human sympathies are as remote from his soul as are the warmth, the fruits, and the pleasures of a sultry Syrian glen, from the glaciers and snow that encrust the summits of Lebanon. The communion of the soul is with the things of another world.—Alas! not the world of love and joy, but the gulph of misery! In every sense, immediate and figurative, this terrible personage is son and minister of hell. And now he comes from his cell to his chair that he may again realize, in a palpable, visible, and audible form, those conceptions of pain, horror, revenge, perdition, upon which the monotonous meditations of his cloister are employed. The dark ideas that haunt his imagination, night and day, stoop the wing to this hour, in which the implements of anguish are to bring forth shrieks and groans, such as shall give new vividness to the fading impressions of misery which he delights to revolve.

Idle, ah how idle is the hope entertained by the cold and shuddering culprit, when, as brought up from his dungeon, he rapidly peruses each reverend visage in expectation of descrying on one, or upon another, the traces of reason and mercy!—Alas, it is for this very purpose, and no other, it is to sigh, to shrink, to writhe, to shriek, that he has been dragged to the dim chamber of the Holy Office:—he stands where he stands, because the men who sit to mock him with forms of law, have need (each in a special manner) of the spectacle of his misery.

Does the history of popish tyranny bear out, or does it refute our descriptions?—let them stand or be condemned by an appeal to records that are open to every eye.

We have not however quite done with the heavy theme of that preparation which the Romish Church has made for training her ministers to become the scourges of humanity: and let it be remembered, as we proceed, that a just horror of the system should generate so much the more pity for the agents, even with all their loathsome vices and cruelties, who, age after age, have undergone its influence. The doctrine and the Institute we execrate:—for the men we mourn.

It might well seem as if circumstances so unfavourable to virtue and goodness as those we have already mentioned could hardly admit aggravation. But in fact they have a climax. The practice of auricular confession would entail a thousand evils and dangers upon the parties concerned, even apart from the unnatural condition to which one of these parties has been reduced. But what must we think of auricular confession when he into whose prurient ear it is poured lives under the irritation of a vow of virginity! The wretched being within whose bosom distorted passions are rankling, is called daily to listen to tales of licentiousness from his own sex (if indeed the ambiguous personage has a sex) and infinitely worse—to the reluctant or shameless disclosures of the other. Let the female penitent be of what class she may, simple hearted or lax, the repetition of her dishonour, while it must seal the moral mischief of the offence upon herself, even if the auditor were a woman, enhances it beyond measure when the instincts of nature are violated by making the recital to a man. But shall we imagine the effect upon the sentiments of him who receives the confession? Each sinner makes but one confession in a given time, but each priest in the same space listens to a hundred! What then, after a while, must that receptacle become into which the continual droppings of all the debauchery of a parish are falling, and through which the copious abomination filters?*

* The author will be thought to have forgotten that the great Ximenes de Cisneros presided eleven years in the court of the Inquisition. Did then neither Justice nor Mercy accompany the cardinal in his descents to the vaults of the Holy Office? Yes, the Justice and the Mercy of the Romish Church went with him there. By what rule are we to think of men—that of their professions, or that of their deeds? During the inquisitor-generalship of Ximenes, fifty thousand Moors, under terror of death and torture, received the grace of baptism; while more than an equal number of the refractory were condemned. Of these, two thousand five hundred and thirty-six he burned alive. Or, supposing the whole number to have been evenly distributed through the period of his presidentship, it will appear that between Sunday and Sunday of every week of those years he committed (to reject the odd two hundred and forty-eight) four men or women to the flames! Let it be affirmed that, in the "New Regulations," some regard was paid to the rights of the accused; yet was the entire process a horrible snare, so contrived as to render the escape of the victim almost impossible. Besides, is not reason insulted by talking at all of the justice of the details of a judicial process, the object of which was to maintain an execrable usurpation? We may mourn indeed that a mind of fine quality should be found in company with a Torquemada; but we must not so outrage the great principles of virtue as, on account of talents or accomplishments, to skreen one murderer of thousands, while we consign another to infamy.

* Neither the oath of secrecy, nor the penalty which sanctions it, has prevented the disclosure of more than enough of the abominations of the confessional. The discreet and well-informed Romanist will not challenge evidence in justification of the strong language which the Author uses on the subject: the Romanist, we presume, does not need to have certain notorious books named to him in which, with astounding insensibility, the Confessarius has divulged the mysteries of his art. Of one of these infamous books a respectable Romish writer says, Ce prodigieux volume contient un examin tres subtil de toutes les impurities imaginables; c'est un CLOAQUE, qui renferme des choses horribles, et qu'on n'oseroit dire. On l'appelle avec justice un ouvrage honteux, compose avec un curiosite enorme, horrible et odieux par la diligence et l'exactitude qui y regne, a penetrer dans des choses monstreuses, sales, infames, et diaboliques. Il est impossible de comprendre comment un Autheur peut avoir renonce a la pudeur jusqu'a pouvoir escrire un tel livre, puis qu'aujourd'huy un homme qui n'a pas despouille toute honte patit efficyablement en le lisant. And again speaking of the same writer, ... prodigioso volumine, velut Cloaca ingenti, fanda infandaque convolvit.

The Church rigorously enjoins the faithful, as they would escape perdition, to make the most intimate and circumstantial disclosures of their guilt, without which, it says, the "sacred physician cannot be qualified to apply the proper remedy." And we are not left in doubt as to the result. Constat enim, says the Council of Trent, sacerdotes judicium hoc, incognita causa, exercere non potuisse, nec æquitatem quidem, illos in pœnis injungendis servare potuisse, si in genere dumtaxat, et non potius in specie, ac sigillatim, sua ipsi peccata declarassent. . . . . Without the most unreserved confession, say these doctors, there is no hope of remission—qui secus faciunt et scienter aliqua retinent, nihil divinæ bonitati per sacerdotem remittendum proponunt. Nor was it enough to disclose the mere facts of guilt; the Church must know all circumstantials; Colligitur præterea, etiam eas circumstantias in confessione explicandas esse, quæ speciem

It is hard to suppose that the Romish Church, in constituting her hierarchy, had wittingly kept in view the purpose of rendering her clergy the fit instruments of whatever atrocity her occasions might demand them to perpetrate; and so had brought to bear upon their hearts every possible power of corruption. Not content with cashiering them of all sanatory domestic influences, she has by the practice of confession, made the full stream of human crime and corruption to pass—foul and infectious, through their bosoms! Having to construct at discretion the polity of the nations, the Romish architects have so planned it, as that the sacerdotal order should constitute the Cloacæ of the social edifice; and thus have secured for Rome the honour of being, through these channels, the great Stercorary of the world; How fitly in the language of prophetic vision is the apostate church designated—sitting as she does at the centre of the common drainage of Europe—as the Mother of abominations, and as holding forth in shameless arrogance, the cup of the filthiness of her fornications!

The Church of Rome is without doubt entitled to the pre-eminence we have given her as the Nurse of sanguinary fanaticism.—Her doctrine begets cruelty;—her polity demands it;—and her clerical institute trains her ministers to the service she has need of. And that which the theory of this superstition would lead us to expect, history declares to have had actual existence. There is no other volume of human affairs that can for the abundance of execrable acts, come into comparison with the story of the papal tyranny.—If the THEORY only of this system should go down to posterity, and its HISTORY be lost, no credit would be given to the affirmation that a scheme so unnatural had ever found a place in the world; much less that it had maintained its influence over civilized nations during a longer course of ages than could be boasted by the firmest and most extensive secular monarchies. Or if the History of the Romish Church were to descend to distant times, and the theory of the system be forgotten, then must it certainly be thought that, during the thousand years, or more, of its unbroken power, a licence extraordinary had been granted to infernal malignants to usurp human forms, and to invade earth with the practices of hell; or that the world from the seventh to the seventeenth century, had suffered a dark Millennium of diabolic possession.

But while we have outspread before us, at once the theory and the history of Popery, we are able, by using the latter as a comment upon the former, and the former as a key to the latter, to reconcile those notions of human nature and Divine Providence which we must devoutly cling to, with the hideous facts that admit, alas, of no dispute. The lesson we gain from such a digest is this—and one of more moment can hardly be found—That human nature, plastic as it is, and susceptible of all influences, may, by long exposure to the operation of a pernicious code, an immoral institute, and a despotic polity, become atrocious in a degree that confounds every distinction, between human and diabolical wickedness. If then, in any measure, we have gained advantage over such a system, and are actually driving it further and further towards the skirts of civilization, with how keen a jealousy should we look—not so much to the expiring remains of that same system, near us, as to those deep principles of ghostly usurpation which are very far from having been utterly crushed and destroyed, even in the freest of the European communities.

Yet in the heat of our indignation, let justice be done to Rome. This justice makes a demand upon us under several heads. The topics are trite, but must not here be omitted.

I. The specific guilt of the Papal tyranny is that of having converted to the purposes of its spiritual usurpation those congenial corruptions of faith and practice which it found in readiness, and which it received from a higher age, recommended by the unanimous approval of Saints, Doctors, and illustrious Writers. But neither popes, nor cardinals, nor councils, can fairly be accused, except in some single and less important instances, of originating (as if with malign ingenuity) the elements of the despotism which they administered. This main point of Church history has been too much obscured by Protestant controversialists.

II. At once as a relief to the sad impression of human nature made by the history of popery, and as a tribute too to the mighty efficacy of Christianity, even when most corrupted, we have to keep in view the actual amount of virtue, humanity, piety—and the learning, the intelligence, and the bright excellence of every name, which has existed in all ages under the Papacy. Let us call this amount large—and indeed it is so:—assuredly the proofs of its extent would not soon be exhausted. We denounce the Romish doctrine and polity, not on the charge that it excludes all religion and all virtue; or that it renders the whole of its hierarchical body as corrupt as it renders many; but only on this ground, that it generates a species of ferocity more malign than any other system has produced, and that it never fails to have at its service a formidable number of inhuman beings, who want nothing but occasion to cover kingdoms with sorrow and blood.

III. Yet the main article of the measure of equity which should be rendered to the Church of Rome is this—That even if unrivalled in cruelty, she is not alone in it; but has been, if not eclipsed, worthily followed by each offset Church, and by almost every Dissident community.*— Those that have gone off to the remotest point of doctrine and polity—whose rule of belief and duty has been—in every article, the antithesis of Rome, and those too that have filled the interval at every distance from the extremes;—all have wrought, in their day, the engine of spiritual oppression; all have shown themselves, in the hour of their pride, intolerant and merciless; and all should look with shame to their several histories:—while the Church of Rome looks, or might look, to hers with horror.

peccati mutant.—See the fifth chapter of the decrees of the Council of Trent.

The sacrament of confession, when it came to be thus explained and enjoined, naturally drew in upon the Church, in tenfold quantity, the impurities of licentious times. Heretofore, those chiefly had come to the priest who possessed some conscience and virtue, and whose disclosures were of a less flagrant sort. But afterwards, that is to say from the eleventh and twelfth centuries, the custom of confession became universal; and the most abandoned of men (and women) retained superstition enough to desire absolution and to seek it in this manner from the priest.—Accordingly we find from this time abundant indications of the bad proficiency which the clergy made in the knowledge of every horrible enormity. On this point it might be enough to refer to the writings of Albert, bishop of Ratisbon—if a book which bears his name has not unjustly been attributed to him. But even long before the time when the SEWERS of the Church were thus deepened and widened, it is clear from abundant evidence that the practice of receiving private confessions had had great influence in depraving, both the secular and regular clergy, and in spreading on all sides a shameless and boundless licentiousness. It would be very easy, could it be done without offending the just rules of propriety, to put this matter beyond dispute. Little more than the reputation and the conceit of sanctity could be left to men who, being themselves bound to single life (we must not call it chastity) were able to write what some noted fathers of the Church have written on offensive subjects. This sort of learning they frankly acknowledged themselves to have acquired at first or second hand from penitents ..... ὡς πρός ἐμέ τις τῶν αἰδεσίμων καὶ πολιᾶ καὶ βίῳ παλαιὸς ἀνὴρ, ἐξομολογησαμένης πρὸς αὐτὸν γυναικὸς, ἀτεφθέγξατο ..... nor is this a solitary instance in the same Father (as well unnamed). The replies given by Basil to his monks on certain points of discretion, sufficiently attest the evils involved in the practice, even in its infant state; who, by the way, goes all the length of the Council of Trent in demanding (from the monks at least) a discovery of even "the lightest movements of the soul," and of "every secret of the heart;" and by means of an apt illustration persuades them to a throwing forth from the inner man, whatever is noxious. Some of the interrogations addressed to Basil, and relating to confession, are highly significant; but they must be remitted to a more fit occasion.

How far, in the actual practice of the Romish Church, regard was paid to the temperament and character of the man, in appointing the confessarius, it is not easy to learn. But great care has been taken to prevent any but those duly appointed, from receiving confessions; and a cure also to prevent promiscuous confession. A priest leaving his care, or disabled by sickness from the discharges of his duties, named a substitute, to whom alone his penitents might unburden their consciences. Among the many instances that might be adduced in illustration of the rule, a somewhat curious one occurs in the minutes of the trial of the luckless Joan of Arc.—Interroguee si elle se confessoit tous les ans, dit qu'ouy a son propre cure, et s'il estoit empesche elle se confessoit a un autre prebstre, par le conge dudict cure; nevertheless, and although the heroine could prove qu'elle recevoit le corps de nostre Seigneur tous les ans a Pasques, she was, by her ferocious and hyprocritical judges, condamnee a estre arse et bruslee, not for having fought in the cause of her country, but—comme heretique.—L'Histoire et Cronique de Normandis.

We return for a moment to the influence of auricular confession upon the Priest, and conclude this note in the words of Bayle. Il arrive a ces Critiques (upon Catullus and Martial) ce qui arrive aux Medecins et aux Chirurgiens, qui a force de manier des ulceres, et de se trouver exposez a de mauvaises odeurs, se font une habitude de n'en etre point incommodez. Dieu veuille que les Confesseurs et les Casuistes, dont les oreilles sont l'EGOUT de toutes les immondices de le vie humaine, se pussent vanter d'un tel endurcissement. Il n'y en a que trop sans doute qui n'y parviennent jamais, et dont la vertu fait naufrage a l'ouie des dereglemens de leurs penitents.

* It would be an injustice not to say that the Quakers are clear of this guilt, and to their many peculiar merits, add the praise of being, not only as wise as serpents—but harmless as doves.

If nations, churches, and communities, as well as individuals, have a future retribution to fear; then has almost every existing religious body a just cause of alarm. If a day is to come when the Righteous Administrator of human affairs, and Head of the Church, is to make manifest his detestation of ecclesiastical bloodshed and torments, shall the Church of Rome stand alone at the bar, or have no companions in punishment? Ought we not to think more worthily of the Justice of Heaven than to suppose it?

Leaving so high a theme, let the general inference be fully and clearly drawn—That gloomy doctrines and pernicious schemes of polity are therefore to be execrated, because, even without them, or where every influence is the most favourable, human nature scarcely avoids abusing the profound excitements of religion as the incentives or the pretexts of its malignant passions.

SECTION VII.

FANATICISM OF THE BANNER.

In escaping from the Consistory to the Camp, we seem to breathe again. Without staying to inquire whether the greater sum of positive evil has been inflicted upon mankind by the fanatical priest or the fanatical soldier, it is certain that the sentiments with which we contemplate the one course of action are vastly less oppressive than those excited by the other.

Let but the energies of men be spent upon a broad field and under the open sky; and let them but have to do with interests not of one kind only, but of many; and let but their motives of action embrace the principal impulses of our nature, and especially, let those who run such a course freely expose themselves to the perils and sufferings of the enterprise, and then it will always happen that admirable talents and fine qualities find play;—talents and qualities such as are neither seen nor thought of within the shades of sacred seclusions, or in ecclesiastical halls.

None but minds imbued with the darkest fanaticism can feel any complacent sympathy with the character and deeds of sacerdotal despots; on the other hand there are few minds so frigid, or so pure, as not to kindle in following the story of exploits which (criminal as they may have been in their object and issue) yet sparkle with rare instances of valour, and are graced with the choicest examples of fortitude, mercy, and magnanimous contempt of selfish interests.

And besides; there is this capital disparity between the fanaticism of the Churchman and that of the Soldier—that while the oppressions and cruelties practised by the former are in all cases, and under every imaginable condition—an ATROCITY, destitute of palliation or excuse, the deeds of the other have often been instigated by motives which go far to soften our disapproval. In truth there are certain instances of this class of so mixed and ambiguous a kind, that we must shrink if called upon to say decisively whether the actors should be commended or condemned. It is easy and trite to affirm that aggressive and ambitious warfare is always immoral;—and how flagrant is the guilt of aggressive war, waged under sacred banners, or at the alleged bidding of Religion! But often the question of national existence has been inseparably connected with the question of faith; and the alternative of a people has been to crouch and to perish; or to defend by the sword at once their Homes and Altars. He must be a stern moralist indeed, who, in such cases would without reluctance pronounce a verdict which must make the oppressor exult, and the oppressed despond.

Compared with either of the two forms of fanaticism described in the preceding sections, that now to be considered is remarkable on account of its diversified combinations with other sentiments. Patriotism and national pride, calculations of policy, the motives of trade, the desire of plunder, and the impulse of personal passions—the resentments or the ambition of chiefs, have all come in to mingle themselves with that more profound excitement which gave the first impulse to wars on account of religion. On the ground we have hitherto traversed, every object almost has shown the darkest colours, and has repelled the eye by a sombre and horrid uniformity—we have been making way through a valley of grim shadows—or a region illumined only by the fires which cruelty has lit up:—

> Spelunca alta fuit, vastoque immanis hiatu,
> Scrupea, tuta lacu nigro nemorumque tenebris;
> Quam super haud ullæ poterant impune volantes
> Tendere iter pennis.—
> Vestibulum ante ipsum primisque in faucibus Orci, > Luctus et ultrices posuere cubilia Curæ;
> Pallentesque habitant Morbi, tristisque Senectus,
> Et Metus, et malesuada Fames, et turpis Egestas,
> Terribiles visu formæ; Letumque Labosque;
> Tum consanguineus Leti Sopor, et mala mentis
> Gaudia—

But from these regions of woe we are to emerge; and the prospect at once brightens with the pomp and movement of great enterprises. Empires are mustered on the ground, and the many nations of a continent, in the gaiety of their various attire, and with banners spread to the winds, are pouring on from side to side of the field. Or in other quarters, if clouds hang over the scene of action, yet there the constancy of human nature is showing itself in deeds such as no other fields of war can boast.

If then hitherto the danger has been lest we should admit feelings of disgust or of resentment toward our fellows, such as the spirit of the Gospel does not allow;—the danger now is, lest a complacency should be awakened which the inflexible maxims of its morality cannot but condemn.

The Romish Superstition has afforded the most signal instance which the page of history at all presents, of the fanaticism of cruelty. For an example equally signal of the fanaticism of martial zeal and religious ambition, we must turn to the first propagation of the doctrine of Mohammed.

To profess, or to feel a jealousy toward the Mohammedan faith, as if its rival merits might perhaps bring into question those of Christianity, would be a ridiculous affectation; or would indicate an extreme imbecility of judgment. The time surely is gone by in which it might be proper anxiously to demonstrate that the Bible exhibits every quality fitting a revelation from God—the Koran none;—or none after deducting the materials that its author stole from the Prophets and the Apostles. The balance of Truth is in no jeopardy in this instance; and therefore without solicitude we may do full justice as well to the founder as to the first propagators of the religion of the eastern world.

In fairness, it should never be attempted to bring Mohammed into comparison with Him who came, "not to destroy men's lives, but to save." Nothing but a summary condemnation of the military zealot and his Caliphs could be the issue of such a contrast; nor does it afford any needed advantage to Christianity. This contrast therefore being put out of view, many circumstances demand to be considered that should mitigate at least the feelings with which we are accustomed to regard the rise and spread of Islam.

Those tides of the northern nations which at length swept away the Roman greatness, might be spoken of as mere evolutions of the physical energies of the great social system; or as acts in the natural history of man, and acts too, the recurrence of which, at intervals longer or shorter, may be looked for, unless prevented by opposing causes of another order. Shall it be deemed utterly incredible that the very same regions which heretofore have poured their ruinous torrents over southern Europe and Asia, may again do so? Must it not be admitted as more than barely possible, that the decay of the commercial and military greatness of England and France—the only European nations that now efficiently sustain the civilization of the world, would, were it to take place, quickly be followed by a Scythian inundation, such as would leave (in this hemisphere at least) hardly a vestige of intelligence—and none of liberty?

Now certainly in this sense it must not be affirmed that the Saracenic conquests were only natural expansions of a superabundant power: for an eruption from the same quarter has happened but once in the history of the world; nor does it appear that it would have happened at all apart from the religious impulse whence actually it sprang. Had not the Merchant of Mecca penetrated the seventh heaven, and brought down thence a spark which set the ambition of Arabian bosoms in a blaze, the very name of Saracen—with all the splendours that surround it, had hardly found a place on the page of history. Without Mohammed the Bedoween horsemen had probably continued, age after age, to sweep their native deserts—a terror only to traders and pilgrims.

This being admitted, and while it is fully granted that the motive generated by the new religion was the proper incentive of Mohammedan warfare—the support of its fortitude, the spring of its courage, and the reason of its success; it is nevertheless true that a race so prince-like and so bold as that which occupied the Arabian wilderness, when once put in movement, and made to feel its actual and its relative strength, would necessarily conquer as it did conquer, and spread itself abroad where nothing existed that could match its force. The countries to the north, to the east, and to the west, lay as a rich inheritance of which the actual possessors had lost their title by extreme degeneracy, and which seemed to ask to be seized upon by men worthy to enjoy it. The Saracenic conquests, as we assume (though not in the same sense as those of the northern barbarians) partook of a physical quality, and if in the main, conquests of proselytism, were also the natural out-bursts of national energy over a surface which superstition and luxury had already, and long before vanquished.

But leaving this ground, there is good room to inquire whether the project of bringing or of driving the much corrupted nations by force and terror into the path of truth, might not, to an ardent spirit, seem in the age of Mohammed both lawful and noble.

Possessed of the first elements of theology (who shall say in what manner obtained?) and standing in the position which he occupied, surrounded at hand by polytheism, and, more remotely, by the ruins of three fallen religious systems, was it strange that Mohammed should have deemed the sword an instrument of necessary severity, and the only instrument which could be trusted to for efficaciously reforming the world?

In listening to the apology* which the Prophet himself offers for the use of arms as a means of conversion, the belief at least is suggested, that he had mused in a comprehensive manner upon the religious history and the actual state of mankind, and had deliberately come to the persuasion that the interests of the true God in this benighted world were utterly hopeless, unless at length they might be promoted and restored by the terrors of war.† Mohammed perhaps had convinced himself that so worthy and holy a purpose would well excuse any means that might bring it about. Christian doctors have entertained the same principle, and have made a worse use of it; for assuredly we must hold the fabrication of miracles to be a worse immorality than the use of force employed because the pretension to miracles was scorned: and again, are not the judicial murders perpetrated by Spiritual despots more horrid than the open carnage of the field?

Looking round upon the world, such as it was in the seventh century, what appeared to have been the result of the several successive endeavours to reclaim the nations from their inveterate superstitions, and their idolatries? Not to insist upon the then decayed state of the religion of Zoroaster, Mohammed saw his countrymen, as well as many of the more luxurious people of Asia, deep sunk in the follies of polytheism. And some of these nations had fallen back far from the position they once occupied.‡

The theology and institutions of Moses, after struggling to exist on a single and narrow spot through a long course of ages, were then to be discerned only here and there in fragments, scattered over the world, like the broken embellishments and gilded carvings of a sumptuous palace which some lawless rout has overtaken and pillaged—strewing the earth with shining atoms of the spoil. Did it indeed then appear as if Jehovah, the God of Abraham, had any purpose in reserve for converting the world by the agency of the Jewish people? Rather it seemed that the obdurate and infatuated race was, in every religious sense, thrown aside and forgotten as a broken instrument.*

Even a mind much more enlightened than that of Mohammed (as we are accustomed to think of him) might, while looking at Christendom in the seventh century, have come to the conclusion that the fate of the religion of Christ after an experiment on a large scale, carried on through six hundred years, forbade it to be any longer hoped that the mild means of mere instruction would permanently avail to support truth in the world. A pure theology and a pure morality, sanctioned by miracles, had, as a system, apparently spent itself; had become worse than impotent; had covered the territories of ancient civilization with the noxious growth of superstition, so that idolatries—more degrading than the ancient polytheism, because men not divinities were the objects of it, had taken full possession as well of the eastern as the western nations.† Could any other event, at that time, well be looked for but the speedy extinction of even the name of Christianity, and the giving way of the feeble barriers which still preserved the south from the savage forms of worship of the Scythian hordes? Mohammed—or if not he, any thoughtful observer, might with reason have regarded the human family as then hastening down a slippery descent towards the bottomless abyss of ignorance and utter atheism. He might thus have thought, and his inference would be strong, that the sudden use of even the most violent means, was lawful and good, if so the universal catastrophe of the race might be prevented.

It should now be regarded as a hopeless endeavour to determine, without doubt, the personal character of Mohammed; and it might perhaps be better to direct attention rather to the system, than to its author. The supposition that he was a sheer Fanatic is opposed, if not quite excluded, by the description given of the suppleness of his public conduct, of the courteousness of his manners, and of the ready and well-judged adaptation of his means of influence to the sudden and various occasions of the perilous enterprise he had taken in hand. The supposition, moreover, it is hard, we will not say impossible, to reconcile to the fact of his having sustained fraudulent pretensions, and of propagating delusions of which he could not have been himself the dupe. On the other hand, as well the Koran (although itself a vast plagiarism—a booty, rather than the fair fruit of mental labour) and the political and military conduct of Mohammed, bespeak an elevated and impassioned soul. Those have not looked into that book, and have not perused the story of the Prophet's public life, who can think him a vulgar impostor, or believe that subtlety and craft were the principle elements of his character. If it be true that the author of the Koran has stolen his materials, yet must a man have had greatness and elevation of soul to have stolen as he has done. If, on the rich fields of sacred literature, he plundered—he plundered like a prince. The spoil which he gathered so largely from the Jewish and Christian Scriptures‡ might be likened to that with which certain learned and munificent conquerors have graced their triumphs—they have indeed trampled upon and overthrown the ancient seats of arts and learning; but yet have first snatched from the devastations of war each signal monument of greatness and beauty.

Were it necessary at any rate to offer some solution of the ambiguous facts of Mohammed's character, recourse might be had to the principle that a mixture of incongruous moral elements does often take place by means of a sort of silent violence, done every day and hour to reason within the bosom. A wise and tranquil mind will not rest until it has adjusted its rules of action; has determined what are to be its objects; and (whether on the best model or not) yet brings the interior man into a condition of harmony and order. But there are minds, perhaps energetic, and rich in sentiment, that, conscious of the utter incompatibility of their leading impulses and principles, willfully abstain from the endeavour to recon-

* It is by no means always easy (especially through the medium of a translation) to follow the chain of the Prophet's reasonings or meditations: and the difficulty is increased by that ambiguity under which, from evident motives of policy, he skreened his real meaning when he had to speak of the Jewish and Christian economies, the votaries of which he aimed if possible to conciliate. Notwithstanding these obscurities, some such mode of thinking as that assumed above for Mohammed, makes itself dimly apparent in many passages of the Koran; among others, the 42d and the four following chapters may be referred to. An under-tone of apology, in which, without compromising his authority as the apostle of God, he excuses his measures as founder of a religion, runs through the rambling incoherencies of Mohammed.

† "And if God did not repel the violence of some men by others, verily monasteries, and churches, and synagogues, and the temples of the Moslems, wherein the name of God is frequently commemorated, would be utterly demolished. And God will certainly assist him who shall be on his side: for God is strong and mighty."—Koran, chap. 22.

‡ "Say, Go through the earth and see what hath been the end of those who have been before you; the greater part of them were idolators."—Koran, chap. 30.

* "The likeness of those who were charged with the observance of the law (the Jews) and then observed it not, is as the likeness of an ass laden with books."—Koran, chap. 62.

† The fifth chapter of the Koran affords evidence that Mohammed was well aware of the degeneracy of the Christian world. "The Christians have forgotten what they received from God."

‡ It has been questioned whether Mohammed had ever seen the Christian Scriptures. That they were familiar to him it is hard not to believe in reading the Koran. Or even if the actual books had not come under his eye, the phraseology and sentiments of the evangelists and apostles he was certainly not ignorant of; these were to be met with every where, both in the east and the west. The sort of garbled allusion to the very text of the New Testament which abounds in the Koran may be seen at the close of chap. 48.

cile the springs of action. Despairing to reach, or to set even wishing to reach, that unity of soul which virtue and wisdom delight in, they act, and think, and speak in alternate characters. Now the latter, and now the worst interest or passion assumes the heart, and sends upon the stage. Meanwhile the wondering world gaze perplexed, and disagree upon the enigma—whether the man be sage or sophist—hero or poltroon.*

Such perhaps was Mohammed: assuredly not truly wise and honest, any more than a sheer impostor. But whatever the Originator of the new profession might be, many of his companions and immediate successors—his vicars, possess an unquestionable claim to the praise of sincerity and genuine fervour; and they have left to the admiration of posterity some of the rarest examples of greatness of soul. If Christianity were at all implicated in the comparison—which it is not, even remotely, we should shrink from a contrast between the Crusaders of the twelfth century, and the Caliphs of the seventh and eighth.†

Without doubt (as we shall presently see), every essential characteristic of fanaticism belonged to the temper and conduct of the Moslem leaders; nevertheless it is certain that the military religious maxims, and the usages of war established and generally adhered to by the Saracenic conquerors, were by no means such as comport with the indiscriminate and unconditional ferocity of men thoroughly rancorous, or natively cruel;—far otherwise. Ordinarily (for instances must be excepted) the genuine zeal of proselytism prevailed over the fury of war: if fanaticism ran through the exploits and policy of the martial zealots, it was still a fanaticism that leant more to the side of enthusiasm than of malice, and that readily admitted a generosity which the ecclesiastic (when he takes the sword) seldom thinks of and which the soldier as seldom forgets. Or to speak a volume in a word, the fanaticism of the Mohammedan conquests was that of warriors, not that of monks.

Common motives of policy, to the exclusion of sincere motives of religion, will by no means suffice to account for the rule early adopted by Mohammed, and adhered to by his immediate successors, of offering to IDOLATORS no other choice than that of conversion or death;‡ while any who professed the worship of the one God—whether Jews or Christians, might purchase by tribute the liberty to go unhurt and at leisure on their own path to perdition.§ So long as the doctrine of the Divine Unity were but acknowledged, errors of profession were tolerated; and if the tribute laid upon conscience was heavy, it did not exceed the measure customary with Asiatic conquerors. The lenity thus shown by Mohammed to the followers of Moses and of Christ, places his conduct in contrast with that of most zealots, whose rule has been to spend their indulgence upon whoever stood most remote in faith from their standard; while all the stress of their inexorable spite was made to press upon the sectarists of the next shade. Let the Arabian prophet be called Heresiarch and Impostor;—yes, but a Reformer too. He kindled from side to side of the eastern world an extraordinary abhorrence of idol worship, and actually cleansed the plains of Asia from the long settled impurities of polytheism. Did he overthrow Christianity in Syria, in Africa, in Spain?—no, Superstition only; for Christianity had died away from those countries long before.

A respect for man, for nature—for God, a respect not characteristic of the frenzied zealot, was shown in the injunction so strictly laid upon the Moslem armies—not to destroy the fruits of the earth—not to disturb the labours of the husbandman—not to cut down the grateful palm or the olive—not to poison or to stop the wells—to spare the old and the young—the mother and her babes, and in a word, to abridge war, as far as might be done, of its horrors. In reading these military orders, and in following the march of the caliphs who received them, it is impossible to exclude from the mind the recollection of wars waged by Christians—most Christian kings, not against distant and equal foes, but upon their own unoffending and helpless subjects—wars which left nothing behind them but smoking ruins and a blood-sodden wilderness. Call Mohammed fanatic or impostor; but language wants a term—or if it might afford one, the rule of Christian propriety forbids it be used, which should fitly designate the Philips, the Ferdinands, the Louises of our modern European history.

The Caliphs possessed an incalulable advantage, as compared (for example) with the leaders of the Crusades, in not being the tools or agents of a sacerdotal class; but in uniting in their single persons every office that naturally commands the submission of mankind. The combination of the regal or patriarchal, the military and the sacred functions, in one office, whatever inconveniences it may have entailed, yet served to attemper and to invigorate each. The same venerated personage—now calmly administering justice as civil chief—now fired with valour and at the head of armies; and now—strange spectacle, in the pulpit, enforcing the principles and duties of religion, would be likely, in recollection of his alternate characters, to exercise the first office with at once a religious impartiality and a martial firmness—the second with humanity, and the third with a liberality of feeling larger than belongs to the mere ecclesiastic, and borrowed from the sentiments proper to the king and the captain. At the same time the people would be apt to look—to their civil Chief with a religious affection, to their General with the confidence of faith, and to their Teacher as to one whose words carried all the authority which Heaven and earth together can confer.

If Christianity be not answerable, as certainly it is not, for the arrogance and the crimes of princes and prelates bearing Christian titles; so neither should we call in question the religious system of Mohammed on account of the horrors and devastations that attended the Tartar conquests of a later period. This rule of equity kept in view, we have to look simply to the Koran and to the general conduct of its early promulgators.

And after every due extenuation has been admitted, nothing can be said but that the martial zeal of the Moslem was an egregious fanaticism. The rise and the characteristics of this vehement impulse is a proper object of curiosity.

In not generating a pure and universal philanthropy, Mohammedism was not worse than other false religions;—and in this respect it was not better. Notwithstanding its just praise of teaching, and teaching with much clearness and energy, the great and first principle of Theology, it quite failed of producing that unrestrained good-will to man which is the natural consequence of love to God. To profess to love God, while on any pretext we entertain a rancorous contempt of our fellow men, is the most enormous of all inconsistencies. No ingenuity of the theologian can make it seem reasonable that those, however depraved in faith or manners, toward whom the Universal Parent, as Creator and Preserver, is showing kindness, and whom He loads daily with his benefits, should be regarded by the true worshippers of God with a bitterness which God himself does not display. Men who, like ourselves, are inhaling the vital air—are enjoying animal existence—are receiving nourishment from food—are sleeping and are waking refreshed from their beds, such, whatever may be their errors or their crimes, are manifestly not yet shut out from the pale of the Divine Indulgence:—GOD has not yet cursed them:—how then can we dare anticipate His wrath? The feeling that would prompt us so to do, or the dogmas that would justify such a feeling, must be hideously false and wrong. Yet this capital flaw attached from the first to the religion of the Prophet.

A knowledge of God is found to avail little apart from a knowledge of ourselves, and unless some genuine emotions of contrition have broken down the pride of the heart, the abstract truth of the Divine Unity and perfections seems only to inflame our arrogance, and to prepare us to be inexorable

* Certain zealous—should we say jealous divines of our own age and country—have seemed to think Christianity safe only when Mohammed was crushed under the weight of the ir anathemas. This mode of feeling one does not so much wonder to meet with among those whose position placed them in actual rivalry with the Moslem faith. It is quite natural to hear a Spaniard—a Spanish priest—an inquisitor, speak of Mohammed as—enganador del mundo, Profeta falso, nuncio de Satanás, el peor precursor del Antichristo, cumplimiento de todas las heregías, y prodigio de toda falsedad; or to say all in a word—un demonio encarnado.—F. J. Bleda, Historia del Falso Profeta Mahoma. The same writer, Inquisitor as he was, does not wonder that pestilences, and earthquakes, and atmospheric prodigies attended the birth of an impostor who was to propagate his religion by violence, and to persecute the Church! The Church, at least the writer's Church, amply took its revenge in the same kind.

† The perusal of Mohammedan history has a useful tendency in breaking down the prejudice which leads us to appropriate the common virtues to certain modes of thinking. Genuine piety demands indeed a genuine belief as its source and support. But those excellencies of conduct and character which may exist apart from Absolute Truth are to be met with all the world over; and certainly the Moslem nations have produced their share of shining examples. That mixture, of crimes and virtues, which belongs to history generally, is met with as well in Ferishta as in William of Tyre.

§ Chap. 9.

and cruel. So it was in the system of Mohammed;—it had no true philanthropy, because it had no humiliation, no tenderness and penitence—no method of propitiation.*

The Koran does indeed teach and inspire a profound reverence toward God; and it has actually produced among its adherents in an eminent degree, that prostration of the soul in the presence of the Supreme Being which becomes all rational creatures. But at this point it stops. Moslem humiliation has no tears; and as it does not reach the depths of a heartfelt repentance, so neither is it cheered by that gratitude which springs from the consciousness of pardon. No sluices of sorrow are opened by its devotions;—the affections are not softened:—there is a feverish heat among the passions, but no moisture. Faith and confidence toward God are bold rather than submissive, and the soul of the believer, basking in a presumption of the divine favour, might be compared to the scorched Arabian desert, arid, as it is, and unproductive, and liable too to be heaved into billows by the hurricane.

No other religious system has gone so far in quashing that instinct of guilt and shame which belongs to man as a transgressor, and which impels him to look for some means of propitiation. The divine favour is secured by the Koran to whoever makes hearty profession of the unity of God and the apostleship of Mohammed. Almsdeeds, punctuality in devotions, and above all, valour in the field, exclude every doubt of salvation. No sentiment found a place that could open the heart to the upbraidings of conscience. Islam is the Religion of Pride;—the religion of the sword.†

We should not omit to notice the contrast which presents itself between the Moslem and Christian systems on this capital point. All religious history may be challenged to produce an exception to the rule, that the Christian doctrine of forgiveness of sins is the only one which has generated an efficacious and tender-spirited philanthropy.—It is this doctrine, and no other, that brings into combination the sensitiveness and the zeal necessary to the vigour of practical goodwill toward our fellow men. Exclude this truth, as it is excluded by sceptical philosophy, and then philanthropy becomes a vapid matter of theory and meditation. Distort it with the Church of Rome, and the zeal of charity is exchanged for the rancour of proselytism. Quash it, as the Koran does, and there springs up in the bosoms of men a hot and active intolerance. The Christian (and he alone) is expansively and assiduously compassionate; and this, not merely because he has been formally enjoined to perform the "seven works of mercy;" but because his own heart has been softened throughout its very substance—because tears have become a usage of his moral life, and because he has obtained a vivid consciousness of that divine compassion, rich and free, which sheds beams of hope upon all mankind.

The correspondence is natural and real, though it may not be obvious, between the notions entertained of the joys of heaven, and the conceptions that are formed of the world of punishment;—the latter article of belief takes its quality inversely from the former. Is it not seen in every country that the palace and the dungeon are correlatives? Wherever the one is filled with extravagant and shameless debauchery, the other is found to be furnished with racks, and will be the abode of forgotten despair. And so the sensualities of Mohammed's paradise are borne out by parallel horrors—gross and barbaric, which, in the speciality of the description given of them, could not fail highly to inflame the malignant passions.‡ This irritating influence reached a pitch of frenzy upon the field of battle; for there the question of salvation or damnation lay on the ground between the marshalled armies, to be fought for and carried by the stronger arm. Never perhaps in the history of mankind have the appalling ideas of the invisible world so much and so distinctly mingled with the fury of mortal strife as in the instance of Moslem warfare. To the eye of the Saracen the smoke of the infernal pit appeared to break up from the ground in the rear of the infidel lines, and its sulphurous steam obscured the embattled field. As the squadrons of the faithful moved on to the charge, that pit yawned to receive the miscreant host; and in chasing the foe, the champions of God and his prophet believed that they were driving their antagonists down the very slopes of perdition. When at length steel clashed upon steel, and the yell of death shook the air—the strife was not so much between arm and arm, as between spirit and spirit; and each deadly thrust was felt to pierce the life at once of the body and of the soul.

Hatred, which is softened by contempt toward a fallen and unresisting foe, is embittered by the same feeling so long as opposition is offered. To respect our adversary is to admit those sentiments of generosity which sprang from the interchanged sympathies of virtue; but to loathe him, is to resent his hostility as an impudent presumption that assails our personal honour. The Arabian armies, after the Peninsula itself had been conquered, scarcely encountered an enemy that they did not look upon with a just disdain. The prophet had already told them that misbelievers were dogs;—and every excursion they made beyond their native deserts served to verify his words. The human race had become in that age effeminate and debauched in an unexampled degree. Superstition, with its idle solicitudes, its mummeries, and its despotism, had at length thoroughly worked itself into the mind of the (once) Christian nations, both of the east and west.* The profligacy which attends a decaying empire, and the hypocrisy of monkish virtue had joined together in the work of debasing and enfeebling every principle of human action. The common sense and the virtue proper to that "common life" against which all the doctors of the Church, during four centuries, had inveighed, and from which they had effectively removed every corroborative and elevating motive, had disappeared; no healthy mean, no sound and solid foundation remained to support the social structure: The objects that met the eye in the countries swayed by the Byzantine emperors were the cowled tenants of the monastery—the debauched retainers of palaces, or the faithless and insubordinate soldiers of the mercenary legions.

When the princely men of the Arabian desert, great as they were in a steady physical courage—great in a condensed and sententious energy of understanding, and great in simplicity of manners—a simplicity not rude but poetic; when these heros-born, broke their limits and trod the open world, their feeling must have been like that of a veteran garrison which, having believed itself to be hemmed in by superior forces, at last descends from its citadel, and in scouring the plains and woods around, meets only with frightened herds and flocks. To dispossess nations so unworthy of the bounties of nature, to overthrow governments so corrupt; and especially, to rid the world of superstitions so absurd and foul, might seem to be a work worthy of the servants of God.

The martial fanaticism of the Saracenic armies presents a contrast on almost every point, if compared with that of the Crusaders. Both in the elements and in the circumstances, these religious enterprises are dissimilar. The zeal of the Moslem armies was a passion for proselyting the world; that of the Crusaders was a mixed sentiment, drawing its force from historic recollections, from the desire of revenge, from the influence of superstition, and from grosser reasons of cupidity and ambition. The Caliphs waged war upon Religious Error—wherever found; and the task they undertook was to vanquish the souls of men, and to drag them captive to the throne of the True God;—the intention of these chiefs, though misinformed, was elevated and comprehensive. But the Crusaders (so far as their motive was strictly religious) thought only of a local conquest, and of a definite triumph:—give them but possession of a certain cave in the suburb of an unimportant dilapidated town, and they wished no more. Moreover the enterprise to recover the Holy City, though aggressive in its aspect, was also in a sense defensive, for not merely did the Christian nations seek protection on behalf of their pilgrims, but desired to regain an inestimable possession which Christendom, by every claim of history and of feeling, might challenge as its own.

* The phrase "God will favour the true believers and forgive their sins," very often occurs in the Koran. But the doctrine of pardon, and the feelings connected with it, are nowhere expanded or defined. Final salvation turns entirely upon personal merit; see chap. 23. At the last day, "they whose balances shall be heavy with good works, shall be happy: but they whose balances shall be light, are those who shall lose their souls, and shall remain in hell for ever." Repentance, in the sense of the Koran, means turning from idolatry to the true faith, see chap. 9. Or if, as in chap. 4, the word be used in a broader sense, yet is the range allowed to contrition very limited. Nothing like a system of propitiation is contained in Mohammed's theology.

† "O prophet! God is thy support, and such of the true believers who follow thee.—O prophet! stir up the faithful to war: if twenty of you persevere with constancy, they shall overcome two hundred," &c. Koran, chap. 8. "Verily God loveth those who fight for his religion in battle array." Chap. 61.

‡ An adduction of the passages may be well excused.

* Mohammed, it is certain, drew his knowledge of Christianity and of Christians chiefly from the neighbouring country—Egypt, where perhaps more than any where else superstition had vilified humanity, and had converted every principle of religion into a preposterous folly. The conquest of Egypt fixed upon the minds of the Caliphs their contempt of the professors of the Gospel.

In attendant circumstances also the two enterprises greatly differed. As the one was an emanation from a centre over a wide surface, and the other, a rushing in from a wide surface toward a single point, so the characteristic of the first is the grandeur of simplicity; that of the second, the magnificence of accumulation. There was a harmony, sublime though terrible, in the early diffusion of the religion of Mohammed:—the high-minded and never-conquered Arab—the same being in all ages and climates, and much less liable than other men to admit modifications of his opinions or manners from foreign sources, presented himself haughtily on the frontiers of every land—Africa, Spain, Persia, India, China, and in the same stern and sententious language summoned all men to surrender faith, or liberty, or life.

But the Crusades poured a feculent deluge, upheaved from the long stagnant deeps of the European communities, upon the afflicted Palestine. The dregs, the scum, and the cream of the western world—its nobility and its rabble, in promiscuous rout, flowed toward the sepulchre at the foot of Calvary. The Saracenic conquests might be compared to a sunrise in the tropics, when the deep azured night, with its sparkling constellations, is almost in a moment exchanged for the glare of day, and when the fountain of light not only darts his beams over the heavens, putting the stars to shame, but, with a tyrannous fervour claims the world as his own. The Crusades might be better resembled to the tornado, which, sweeping over some rich Polynesian sea, and rending up all things in its course, heaps together upon a distant shore the confused wrecks of nature and of human industry.

The motley host that dragged its length across the plains of the lesser Asia was not more various in its blazonments and banners than were the motives of the crowd; and the many-coloured embellishments of the enterprise as they glittered in the sun under the walls of Nice, or of Antioch, might be regarded as symbolizing the heterogeneous impulses that had brought so many myriads from their homes. But the accessory motives, whether of the chiefs or the rabble, do not belong to our subjects;—the spirit of adventure, the secular ambition, the cupidity, or the sheer superstition are to be set off as accidents merely of that genuine infatuation which, at intervals during nearly two hundred years, convulsed the European nations.

If there had been no crusade in the age of ignorance, would there have been one in the age of knowledge? We dare not affirm such a conjecture to be probable; and yet would not grant it to be altogether groundless. The folies, the miseries, and the ill success that attended the endeavour of the European states to possess themselves of a land in which they had every right sentiment can confer, have branded with reprobation an enterprise that otherwise might have seemed not unreasonable, even to the men of more enlightened times. Let the case be stated abstractedly. That the most powerful nations of the world—a great community of nations, professing the same faith, should patiently see, on their very border, a land every foot of which had become memorable by association with the events of their religion, trodden down by an inimical superstition, while themselves were barely indulged with leave of setting foot upon it, is a fact that would not have been thought probable; and which, we almost believe, would not to the present time have been endured, if the phrenzy of the twelfth century had not affixed an indelible contempt upon the project of reclaiming the birth-place of Christianity for Christendom.

Had there been no crusade in the twelfth century, there might then we imagine have been one in the seventeenth:—not, assuredly, in the nineteenth; for Christianity at the present moment, although it commands too much regard, and is too well understood to allow of its giving sanction to religious warfare, yet is far from supporting that once powerful feeling which made the sacred sites objects of impassioned curiosity. The very reverse was true in the age of Urban II. Too little understood in its spirit and maxims to repress the enterprise, Christianity nevertheless then held an undisputed sway over the imaginations, the hopes and the fears of the mass of mankind throughout Europe. The idea of a conquest so desirable being once presented, nothing could be more natural than that the crusading zeal should flame out, and burn from year to year with a constant intensity. This ardour was in fact not to be quenched until a long series of unexampled miseries and misfortunes had rendered the design of maintaining the Christian power in the East hopeless. If the war had been so conducted as to have ensured early success—and success was at one time by no means impossible,—the history of all nations must have taken a different turn, and Asia, perhaps, and Europe might, after a while, have met in emulous friendship upon the spot which nature has marked out as the true metropolitan site of the world.

The fanaticism of the Crusades cannot be deemed any thing more than an out-burst of that exalted and imaginative superstition which had become ripe in every country of Europe. The military sentiment moreover, had then reached a pitch which demanded opportunity to spend itself; and the two vehement principles—the religious and the military, being alike under the control of the sacerdotal order,* nothing else could well happen than that some enterprise of conquest, directed and incited by the ministers of religion, should engage the energies of men. Perhaps the Church could not at all have retained her power over the western nations in the quickened condition they were just entering upon, if she had not at that very moment put herself at the head of the ruling passion of the age.

How far the Chiefs of the Church discerned her critical interests when the enterprise was first started, it is impossible certainly to know. But that the Crusades became at length a matter of policy and calculation at Rome, is abundantly evident. Still the genuine fanaticism continued to mingle itself, as it readily does, with sinister and mercenary views; and pontiffs and monks, without losing sight of those palpable objects which ordinarily ruled their conduct, surrendered themselves heartily to the current of the general enthusiasm.

In each succeeding Crusade there appears to have been, on the part of the hierarchy, less of the pure fanaticism of the enterprise, and more of political calculation; until at length the latter element had so nearly absorbed the former, that the Church could no longer even feign the zeal requisite for exciting and maintaining the ardour of the people. It was just in this languishing state of the crusading sentiment that a new virulence was shed into it by Innocent III. who finding that the effigy of the SARACEN would no longer serve to set the vindictive passions of Europe in a flame, substituted that of the HERETIC; and forthwith Albigenses, not Moslems, became the victims of the martial frenzy of the catholic world.

Already we have found occasion to regret that men who stood confessed as the intellectual leaders of the age in which they lived, and who, by right at once of ecclesiastical rank, of personal character, and of real mental power, enjoyed almost an unlimited influence, did not stop to ask whether the actual course of human affairs, and the tendency of opinions and practices was indeed good and rational, or preposterous and fatal. Were any such censorial function exercised by the ruling minds of every age, and were there a court of public conscience, wherein right and wrong, on a large scale, should be calmly examined, not only might single flagitious acts be prevented; but the insensible progression of degeneracy might be retarded; and even a happy return frequently made to the path of reason and virtue. In casting the eye over the busy scene of European affairs in the twelfth century, it is natural to ask if the great community of the western nations did not furnish at least some one eminent spirit, capable of applying the simple rules of Christian ethics, and the plain maxims of common sense, to the project of the Crusade. Or allowing the infatuation—plausible as it certainly appeared, to take its course unchecked at the first, and to run itself out through a full fifty years, was it not natural that the few accomplished spirits of the age should at length have brought the entire folly under review, and have stepped forward to disenchant the nations?

For performing such a work of reason and charity, whom better should we look to than to Bernard of Clairvaux? Is his personal ability to discharge such an office questioned? It was personal ability, unaided by adventitious means—it was mere power of mind and the momentum of individual character that raised him to a position, in the European community, of more extensive influence than any five human beings known to history have occupied. A simple monk, and then as abbot—emaciate, demure, downcast in look—a mere shadow or apparition of humanity, who, if seen in the choir among his companions, would have attracted no eye—this Bernard had come to such authority that he spoke law in the ears of sovereign pontiffs—made princes tremble, or rejoice, and so ruled the waves of the popular mind as to be able to raise or allay the storms of national tumult at pleasure. True indeed it is that no mind, how energetic soever, could have acquired or sustained any such power in an age of intelligence. It was the superstition of the times—at once profound and vehement, which afforded means and opportunity for the exercise of an autocracy of this sort. Yet assuredly he who could actually win and hold it, must be regarded as no ordinary being. And although the age was blind, credulous, and infatuated, Bernard reared his influence, in the main, not by cajolery and imposition, but by those arduous and genuine methods which an upright mind has recourse to.—Learned and laborious; self-denying, calm and disinterested, copious and accomplished, and, need it be said, eloquent, he could well support in personal intercourse with men of any rank, the reputation which he possessed by common fame. If in any thing his celebrity rested on fictitious pretensions, he might without hazard have renounced whatever was unsubstantial.*

Might not then this potent monk, who had fair opportunity of gathering up the lessons furnished by the history and calamities of the first Crusade, have discerned and have asserted truth and morality, as applicable to such an enterprise, and so have saved myriads of lives, and have prevented innumerable crimes? Alas, instead of thus standing in the breach, and effecting peace between Europe and Asia, St. Bernard, with the Gospel on his lips, incited again the western nations to make a furious assault upon their brethren of the East: and in so doing became actively the author of incalculable miseries and bloodshed!

However little analogy there may appear to be between our own position in the nineteenth century and that of the preachers and leaders of a Crusade in the twelfth, it may prove not uninstructive to examine somewhat more closely the remarkable instance before us.

The violence of rude minds spends itself soon, and commonly includes the means of its own correction. But when measures essentially unjust and absurd are promoted by men who, having under command their own passions, are able at leisure to work upon the passions of others—when the tones of moderation and the stores of learning are employed for perverse uses—it is then that the mischief spreads and endures. Peter the Hermit was indeed author of one Crusade; but could never have excited another. St. Bernard, who, with supercilious brevity† alludes to his predecessor as an extravagant fanatic, not merely kindled the Crusade of 1148, but gave so powerful a sanction to the desire of conquering the Holy Land, that without unfairness, the luckless expeditions which occupied the next century may, in great part, be charged to his influence.

If those of the epistles of St. Bernard which relate to the Crusade, and if his Exhortation to the Knights Templars, could be read without knowledge of the specific intention, or without recollection of the historical facts whereto they relate, one might easily believe that the project in question was one fully recommended by wisdom and benignity, and sanctioned by Religion. How sedate and measured is the language—how temperate the incitements—how discreet the particular advices—how full-fraught is every page with the serenity, the forethought, the circumspection becoming a chief!—and how copious is the adduction of Scripture! almost every sentence revolves upon a text:—the sighs of piety rise in fumes from every paragraph—ejaculatory prayer inspirits many a sonorous period. Yes, here we find the very substance of fanaticism quite stripped of whatever one would call fanatical; and graced too, by whatever appears wise and devout. Already we have turned aside to contemplate an instance of the madness of asceticism, gavely mantled and philosophic, in the person of the Cappadocian primate; now we have before us a form not less philosophic, or celestial;—it is that of the seraphic, the politic, and the accomplished Bernard—chief patron and mover of the madness of religious military ambition!

Those who will say that illusions and infatuations of this elaborate order, tranquilly affecting the very elements of the character, belong only to ages of mental slavery and superstition, and are not now to be looked for as possible, assuredly have something yet to learn of the philosophy of human nature; and, not improbably, are themselves the victims of some similar deep-spread error. St. Bernard, calmly seated in his cell—the Gospels open before him, and with the events of the first Crusades fresh in his recollection, thought that nothing was more praiseworthy or pious than to lash the passions of the western nations to a new fury for exterminating the infidel power in the East.*

That identity of sentiment, and even of language which characterises the same fanaticism under circumstantial differences, it is curious and instructive to notice. Mohammed doubts not a moment the lawfulness of propagating the true faith by the sword:—the very same plenary conviction runs through the pages of St. Bernard. The prophet of Mecca says—Fight for God, and he will pardon all your sins, and infallibly give you the delights of Paradise. The monk of Clairvaux, on behalf of the Church, and in her name, assures to every Crusard a full remission of all sins, and the blessedness of a martyr, beyond doubt, if he fell in the holy war.† To be slain, says the saint, is to benefit yourself;—to slay, is to benefit Christ! Impartially balanced, whom shall we first excuse, or whom rigorously condemn? The one, by violence and carnage would fain vanquish the world to God: the other, by the like means, thought to achieve a revenge for the Church, and to effect a clearance of a single superstition from a single spot.‡ Both egregiously misunderstood the Divine Character; both frightfully abused the language and the motives of religion:—the difference is only in the terms and style, and in the magnitude and grandeur of the project.

* Not the slightest historical difficulty attaches to the great mass of Church wonders. Folly, fraud, and preposterous credulity are stamped upon them in the plainest characters. The perplexity arises in those few exceptive instances in which men of sense (although superstitious) and men whose honesty and piety, in the main, we cannot readily grant to be questionable, acted a prominent part in the drama of miracles. Not that this perplexity at all implies evidence to which we should listen in favour of the miracle itself; for this is altogether wanting; but a real enigma presents itself when we endeavour to set an esteemed and respectable name quite free from the charge of collusion with knaves. St. Bernard—if we take the word of his biographers, wrought many more miracles than Paul probably had done. And it appears from certain expressions in his letters and tracts that he did not disclaim the reputation of a wonder-worker. His personal credit is therefore implicated in the business. We must at present leave the riddle as we find it; only saying that Bernard's real and indubitable merits were such as might well have borne the deduction of all the prodigies with which his encomiasts have burdened his fame.

† Fuit enim in priore expeditione, antequam Jerosolyma caperetur, vir quidam, Petrus nomine, cujus et vos (nisi fallor) sæpe mentionem audistis. Is populum qui sibi crediderat, solum cum suis incedens tantis periculis dedit, ut aut nulli, aut paucissimi eorum evaserint, qui non corruerint, aut fame, aut gladio.—Ep. 363.

* Though carried away by the specific fanaticism of the Crusade, St. Bernard did not forget mercy and justice in all instances. In several of his epistles he decisively condemns the violences of which the Jews were at that time the victims. Audivimus et gaudemus, ut in vobis ferveat zelus Dei: sed oportet omnino temperamentum scientiæ non deesse. Non sunt persequendi Judæi, non sunt trucidandi, sed nec effugandi quidem.—Ep. 363.

† Habes nunc fortis miles, habes vir bellicose, ubi dimices absque periculo: ubi et vincere gloria, et mori lucrum. Si prudens mercator es, si conquisitor hujus sæculi; magnas tibi nundinas indico; vide ne pereant. Suscipe crucis signum, et omnium pariter, de quibus corde contrito confessionem feceris, indulgentiam obtinebis. Materia ipsa si emitur, parvi constat: si devoto assumitur humero, valet sine dubio regnum Dei.—Ep. 363. The English barons, (Ep. 423,) are told by St. Bernard that the messenger he had despatched would not only explain the business of the Crusade at large, and narrate what had been effected, but exhibit to them—largissimam veniam quæ in literis domini Papæ, super eos qui cruces susceperunt, continetur. The Book, de Laude Novæ Militiæ, ad Milites Templi, exhibits, page after page, elevated and impassioned religious sentiments, thick-set with Scriptural quotations, and the whole purport of this eloquence is to stimulate the murderous passions of mankind. The lawfulness of the enterprise, and its merit, and the certainty of salvation to those who should fall in the attempt, are every where, and in the boldest terms, affirmed. Securi igitur procedite milites, et intrepido animo inimicos crucis Christi propellite, certi quia neque mors, neque vita poterunt vos seperare a caritate Dei, quæ est in Christo Jesu; illud sane vobiscum in omni periculo replicantes: Sive vivimus, sive morimur Domini sumus! Quam gloriosi revertuntur victores de prœlio! quam beati moriuntur martyres in prœlio! . . . Miles, inquam, Christi, SECURUS INTERIMIT, INTERIT SECURIOR. Sibi præstat cum interit; Christo cum interimit! This might well be given as a pointed version of more than one passage in the Koran: so like is fanaticism to fanaticism, all the world over.

‡ Commota est et contremuit terra, quia Rex cœli perdidit terram suam, terram ubi steterunt pedes ejus. Inimici crucis ejus . . . . officinas redemptionis nostræ evertere moliuntur, et loca Christi sanguine dedicata profanare contendunt. Præcipue autem illud Christianæ religionis insigne, sepulcrum, inquam, in quo sepultus est Dominus majestatis, ubi facies ejus sudario ligata est, omni nisu nituntur evellere.—Ep. 423.

The eloquence of St. Bernard was every where triumphant. France and Germany listened in rapture to his sermons: England* yielded to his epistles: Europe again drew the sword, and devoted herself to God, vowing to crush his enemies.† Moreover the faults and precipitancy of the former expedition were prudently avoided in this:—the counsels of the preacher, as well as his declamations, were duly regarded.‡ Visions and miracles, also, not a few,§ sanctioned the zeal with which the preacher had inspired princes and knights. Even to think ill success possible was an impiety. Heaven audibly blessed the enterprise, and assured a prosperous issue!‖ Luckless confidence! the intentions of heaven in this, as in so many other instances, had been utterly misinterpreted. Disaster attended the expedition throughout its course, and a failure in all its objects disgraced its conclusion. But it is unjust, say some of the contemporary religious historians, to affirm that St. Bernard's Crusade, though calamitous to the eye of sense, produced no fruits, such as might be held to redeem the saint's reputation;—for how many thousand soldiers of the cross did it send with a prosperous gale to heaven, to claim the promised rewards of martyrdom!¶

This ingenious solution of the perplexing event did not satisfy St. Bernard himself. After declaring with a piety we should admire, that he would rather himself sustain in silent patience the reproaches of the profane, than that the glory of God should be assailed, and would think himself happy to serve as "the shield of God," receiving in his person every shaft of the adversary; he labours to find cases parallel to his own among the histories of the Old Testament:—he obliquely refers to the miracles wrought by him in attestation of the Predication of the Cross; and then, as the last and best recourse, alleges the inscrutable profundity of the Divine Providence, which, as he scruples not to affirm, often leads men on only to disappoint and thwart them; and commands that to be done which it intends to frustrate! Alas how much, even by the religious, is the Divine Providence outraged, and the Divine attributes vilified! Every thing is understood sooner than the simplest principles of morality and religion. We passionately plunge into enterprises that are wholly unjustifiable or absurd—enterprises clearly incompatible at once with the dictates of common sense, and the precepts of the gospel. What may be wanting on the side of reason we largely supply from the stock of faith:—texts and fervours fill out the bubble of our confidence. But in due season the folly bursts:—natural causes produce natural effects:—the seed we had sown springs up in its proper kind. How reasonable, then, and how becoming would it be to retract our presumption, and to confess our fault. Instead of admitting any such pious ingenuousness, we fretfully talk of the unfathomable depths and the inscrutable mysteries of the ways of God! and sum up the matter perhaps, as does St. Bernard, with a grossly misapplied text—"Blessed is every one that is not offended in Him,"—as much as to say, God's ways are such that it is a vast merit not to resent them!*

Of the second crusade to the Holy Land the Abbot of Clairvaux was personally the author. Another far more murderous, and more fatally successful, may justly be attributed, though indirectly, to his influence. About half a century after the death of their Founder, the Bernardins, with the zealous Arnold Amalric at their head, and too well authorized by the language and conduct of their spiritual father, charged themselves with the business of assembling the catholic world for the extermination of the heretics of Languedoc. With how much of horrid glory these labours were crowned, the histories of the times attest. The Romanist of the present day confides in the truth of the miracles recorded to have been performed by St. Bernard;—indeed he cannot question them without discarding at the same time the whole of that evidence upon which his church rests her pretensions as the perpetual organ of Christ on earth.—But now it was on the credit of these very miracles (should we not rather with Paul call them "lying wonders")—it was on this warranty expressly, that the preachers of the Albigensian Crusade incited that detestable expedition, and justified the massacres and tortures that attended its course. With the maxims of the New Testament before him, is there then nothing that should stagger the faith of the Romanist in these blood-stained prodigies? If the direct and immediate use to which they were applied was carnage, rape, and unutterable ferocities;—if the clew of miracle runs throughout the story of abominable murder, shall a man who owns common powers of reason and conscience, swallow, with a blind voraciousness, at once the wonders and the murders; or shall he do so, and claim to be any longer respected among Men and Christians?†

The fanaticism of religious war has seldom if ever been

* The Epistle just quoted, was addressed to the English Barons, and the abbot does not omit the blandishments that might conciliate the parties. Et quia terra vestra fœcunda est virorum fortium, et militari juventute referta; decet vos inter primos, et cum primis, ad sanctum opus accedere, et armatos ascendere ad serviendum Deo viventi.

† The apologist of St. Bernard may allege that he acted on this occasion in obedience to the sovereign Pontiff, Eugenius III., in writing to whom, on the subject, he says—De cetero mandastis, et obedivi. Yet even this same pope was his creature: he goes on to declare the success of his labours.—Et fœcundavit obedientiam præcipientis auctoritas. Siquidem annunciavi et locutus sum, multiplicati sunt super numerum. Vacuantur urbes et castella, et pæne jam non inveniunt quem apprehendant septem mulieres virum unum, adeo ubique viduæ vivis remanent viris.—Ep. 247.

‡ Beside other instances of prudence, St. Bernard gave proof of his good sense in utterly declining the honour of leading in person the Crusade. His fanaticism savoured far more of the cell and the pulpit, than of the field.—Quomodo videlicet in Carnotensi conventu (quonam judicio satis miror) me quasi in ducem et principem militiæ elegerunt: certum sit vobis nec consilii mei, nec voluntatis meæ fuisse vel esse. . . . Quis sum ego, &c.—Ep. 256.

§ . . . . nimirum, says the Saint's Notary, cum aliquando vigenti, seu etiam plures ab incommodis variis sanarentur, nec facile ab hujusmodi dies ulla vacaret.

‖ Fanatics may safely enough perform miracles—among their followers; but they commit a fatal blunder when they turn prophets. It was here that St. Bernard made shipwreck, and on the very same rock his imitators in every age have split. The infatuations of the present day are meeting a like fate.

¶ Nec tamen ex illa profectione Orientalis Ecclesia liberari, sed cœlestis meruit impleri et lætari. And was not the lot of those who survived and returned to sin, more lamentable than that of those qui in fructibus pœnitentiæ purgatas variis tribulationibus Christo animas reddiderunt?—Vita. S. Bern. l. iii. c. 4. If the Crusade effected no visible good, yet did it secure the salvation of a multitude of souls, says the Abbot Otho; while another writer assures us, on infallible testimony, that a multitude of the fallen angels were restored on the occasion!

 See Epistle 288, and especially the Apology he addressed to the Pope, De Consideratione, l. ii. c. 1. Scorners asked for evidence that the Crusade was from God. Non est quod ad ista ipse respondeam, parcendum verecundiæ meæ. Responde tu pro me et pro te ipso, secundem ea quæ audisti et vidisti; aut certe secundum quod tibi inspiraverit Deus! . . . . Etsi necesse sit unum fieri e duobus, malo in nos murmur hominum, quam in Deum esse. Bonum mihi, si dignetur me uti pro clypeo.

† An inconsistency not easy to adjust, belongs to St. Bernard's statements of the duty of the Church towards heretics. In some places he seems to disallow measures of violence; while in others he plainly recommends the use of force. These two points at least are pretty certain: 1st. That whatever he might say or sanction in compliance with the practices of the age, or in submission to authority, his personal or original dispositions were not of a ferocious kind; but the reverse: and 2d. That whatever his personal dispositions might be, he had become so thoroughly the slave of the Romish despotism, that he held himself ready to promote whatever it approved and enjoined. So it is commonly that men of mild tempers are employed by the arrogant and the tyrannous as their fittest tools in giving effect to oppressive or sanguinary acts. In commenting upon Canticles ii. 15. "Take us the foxes, the little foxes, that spoil the vines, for our vines have tender grapes:" this Father observes, that the little foxes are insidious heresies, or rather the heretics themselves, and adds, Capiantur, dico, non armis, sed argumentis, quibus refellantur errores eorum: ipsi vero, si fieri potest reconcilientur Catholicæ;—this is all very well:—the Church says, Capite eas nobis, catch them for us. Yet his doctrine in other places is of a different sort. With a slippery ambiguity of phrases, he gives room for the use of the most extreme means—approves the zeal of those who, in tumultuous fury had fallen upon heretics; though he will not advise the deed;—factum non suademus;—but concludes that the sword is to be employed against those who persist in propagating their errors.—In Cantica, Serm. 66. But in an epistle to Hildefond, count of Toulouse, whom he accuses of favouring the heretics of his states, all the truculent rancour of the genuine churchman flows forth; and in addressing the clergy of the province after his return, he seems quite to pant from the labours of extermination; and thus concludes his advices.—Deprehensi sunt lupi . . . deprehensi, sed non comprehensi. Propterea dilectissimi, persequimini et comprehendite eos: et nolite desistere, donec PENITUS DEPEREANT, et diffugiant de cunctis finibus vestris, quia non est tutum dormire vicinis serpentibus.—Ep. 242 ad Tolosanos, post reditum suum. Such are the strains of ecclesiastics, even some of the best of them, when irritated by opposition. The reader will not fail to notice the indulgent distinction which the good abbot observes between wolves and foxes. In the sense of Bishop Fouquet, the men, women, and children of a city belonged indiscriminately to the former class, if heresy was harboured at all among them graced and recommended more remarkably than in the instance of the canonized hero of France, whose disasters and death may be said to have brought the crusading enterprise to a close;—for that which the magnanimous Godfrey began, the saint-like Louis concluded. The extant effigies of this good and valiant prince so well correspond with his recorded actions, that we cannot but look upon them as authentic.* What mildness and dignity—goodness, humility, and yet fire and strength beam from the countenance! It is a face which for suavity might belong to the most refined ages;—a face shining with a religious elevation seldom indeed exhibited in the series of royal portraits. And such in truth was Louis IX. Disinterested to a fault in his conduct toward neighbouring powers;—a peace-maker, and an arbitrator inflexibly just. Industrious in the discharge of public business, lenient and moderate in exacting dues, accessible and gracious to the poor:—firm toward the proud and powerful. Irreproachable in private life—temperate and chaste. And withal, a warrior of no mean reputation—justly admired as well on account or his personal valour, as of his conduct in the field:—chivalrous in the best sense of the term; and pious in a sense at which the severity of modern notions must not cavil.†

What then does our hero want—unless it be that integrity and vigor of reason of which the superstition of his age had cashiered him? If one might bring St. Louis into parallel with the statesmen and warriors of classical history—an Epaminondas or Timoleon, a Scipio or a Marius, though he claims over them the advantage of some higher sentiments and purer morals, he must yield to them all the prerogatives of that erect position of the soul which belonged to them (although superstitious in their way) as exempt from the humiliation inflicted by sacerdotal despotism. The Grecian and Roman public worship stood subservient to the civil and military powers of the state; while that of the Christian nations (of the middle ages) not merely usurped every kind of influence, but with the arrogance fitting infinite pretensions, trod the very souls of men in the dust. Strong emotions of shame and indignation spring up in the mind—shame for the degradations of humanity, shame for the abused religion of Christ, when one suddenly turns from the sculptures that have brought down to our times the forms of the Grecian chiefs, and inspects the mosaics, the parchments, the painted windows, and the bas-reliefs, in which the magnanimous Louis is shown, stripped to the waist like a vagabond thief, and patiently receiving from the hands of emasculate monks the discipline of the whip! Or shall we contemplate the monarch of France—not only king, but soldier and statesman, followed by the bevy of his court, and a swarm of ecclesiactics, on the road before Sens, pacing the rugged ground barefoot, on his way to meet—was it some delegate from the upper world—some minister of heaven before whom mortality must tremble, and the pride of kings fall in the dust?—No—nothing but a relic, and this relic, not a relic; but the palpable work of monkish knavery.‡

Far from being a farcical or a politic compliance with the usages of the times, these acts of devotion were, on the part of Louis IX. unquestionably the result of his sincere and profound convictions. So likewise were his Crusades;—the infatuation had thoroughly worked itself into his soul; and every part of his conduct in the two disastrous expeditions—the one to Egypt and Syria, and the other to the African coast, exhibits the resolution, the consistency, and the greatness which distinguish vigorous minds when ruled by some single and paramount motive. This motive was, in many important respects, unlike that which had impelled the Crusaders of the preceding century. The course of events had insensibly given to the oriental war another and a new character. With Godfrey, Robert of Normandy, and Tancred, the project was aggressive and spontaneous; but after the Christian powers had made a permanent lodgement in Palestine, and naturalized themselves there, it became at once a duty of humanity, and a demand of public justice to defend the oriental colonies. Accordingly we now hear much more than at first, of the obligation to protect and to rescue the afflicted Christians of the eastern church; and it is this plea, rather than any motive of a fanatical or superstitious kind, which was employed in the time of St. Louis to quicken the zeal of princes and adventurers.*

In this light mainly did the French monarch regard the expeditions he conducted; and it would be harsh indeed to affirm that those attempts might not appear to him in the fullest degree justifiable. And moreover, as the final motive had gradually become of a different sort, so were the immediate excitements very unlike that which impelled the earlier invasions of the Holy Land. Then the torrent of war poured on directly to the revered centre of devotion. Although the route was unavoidably circuitous, still the line of movement tended always towards the sacred sites. The enthusiasm of the enterprise mounted up therefore at every step of the march; nor did it abate until the soldiers of the cross had waded through rivers of Moslem blood in their way to the foot of Zion.

But how much must the crusading zeal have sunk, and how much must it have mingled with secondary motives, when, instead of rushing on to the endeared and outraged city of human redemption, the crusards had first to assail the enemy in some quarter far remote from those spots; for instance, along the banks of the Nile, or upon the burning sands of the Numidian coast, and fifteen hundred miles from the Holy City! and as the impulse was by this means slackened, so probably room might be left for emotions of a better and a calmer sort. This was certainly the case with the French king. The superstitions of his times apart, for which St. Louis was not responsible, his last hours exhibited whatever is becoming to the faith and temper of a dying Christian.

As well royal pride (if any sparks of such a feeling lingered in the bosom of this religious king) as the ordinary excitements attendant upon a martial enterprise, were fallen at that moment to the very lowest ebb. After winning some laurels of little value, the crusaders, at the season of insufferable heat, had encamped upon the desert within sight of Tunis. But they had scarcely began to rest when pestilence broke out, and threatened to leave the residue of the army at the mercy of an infuriated foe. One of the first to fall was the son of the king—designated from his cradle to sorrow.† Over his grave Louis himself sickened, and his frame, already wasted by a long course of austerities, at once gave way. Earthly hopes of every kind were waning fast. This second expedition, which should have redeemed the calamities of the first, it was now certain must be frustrated:—even whether space would be secured for giving Christian rites to the dying and the dead was doubtful:—whether a wreck of the flower of France would return to tell the tale of disaster seemed uncertain. Horrors thickened on every side; and worse horrors impended. But though the earth itself should remove, and the foundations of things sublunary be broken, the dying monarch admitted no despondency:—the surrounding gloom did not darken his soul. His energies as a man, his solicitudes as a king, his affection as a father, his zeal as a Christian, were not relaxed. Whatever the exigency of the time demanded to be done or arranged, he completed. His last acts as a sovereign were directed to the long desired object of reconciling the Latin and Greek churches; and having surrendered his kingdom, with wise and pious advices, to his son, he closed his eyes on worldly pomps, in calm, if not assured hope of entering, in due season, upon the joys of eternity.

So is the grace of heaven wont to relieve the darkest histories of the follies and crimes of nations, by unsullied instances of piety and goodness.

The rule of analogy leads on by natural transitions from scene to scene, making it necessary to traverse the order of Time. Commencing with the most complete instance of spontaneous or aggressive religious warfare, we have passed

* Several portraits of St. Louis, and some of them well executed, are extant (or were so before the revolution) in the Churches dedicated to him, as well as in MSS. These are to be seen in Montfaucon's Antiquities of France.

† Louis IX. succeeded his father in 1226, and was only in his fourteenth year, and subject to the queen mother, when he acted his part in the Abominable conduct of the Church and Court towards Raymond VII.

‡ St. Louis, receiving the grace of penitence, is one of the subjects represented upon the windows of the vestry of St. Denis. Baldwin II. Latin emperor of Constantinople, in acknowledgment of the French king's bounties to the Christians of Palestine, sent him—the crown of thorns, which had been preserved in the imperial palace; but which the Venetians had lately held as a pledge for a loan. Louis discharged this debt, and received the sacred treasure. Single thorns broken off, were forthwith conferred upon several of the Churches and Abbeys of France.

* We must revert to St. Bernard to do him the justice of saying, that, even a full century before the time of Louis IX. the plea of relieving and defending the Syrian Christians was employed as an auxiliary motive for undertaking the Crusade. to those enterprises that were of a mixed kind, and have followed them until they assumed a defensive aspect. We start anew then from this point to contemplate the memorable example of a nation gathering its strength to a convulsive and frenzied effort for the rescue of its ancient and impassioned religious hopes.

As the terrible catastrophe of the Jewish city and people is fraught with horrors beyond perhaps any other scene of history, so did the sentiments then called up—the fanaticism of national pride, reach a height to which no parallel can be found. An examination of the moral condition and political circumstances of the Jewish community at the time is quite necessary if we would either read the dismal story with intelligence, or afford to the infatuated sufferers that measure of sympathy which they may well claim. And with this view it is moreover indispensable that we should dismiss, for a moment at least, those special feelings with which, as CHRISTIANS, we are accustomed to contemplate the vengeance that overtook the betrayers and murderers of the Lord, and the obdurate enemies of his gospel.

Yet is it difficult to disengage the mind from those impressions which give to the events of the Jewish war their supernatural character; in truth, this stamp of extraordinary interposition is imprinted upon every transaction of the time: the rebellion itself—the madness of the endeavour, on the part of so feeble a state, to resist the undivided force of the Roman empire—the pertinacity of the resistance—the frenzy of the intense feuds, and the delirium of the last struggle, bear the marks of a judicial abandonment: while, on the other side, the singular conduct of the Roman authorities, as well as many incidents of the siege and capture of the city, exhibit visibly—must we not admit, the irresistible control of a hand from above. Looking upon the city, overshadowed by the bursting cloud of fate, the seals of Divine wrath are seen upon its palaces; and one believes to hear the sullen thunder that announces the departure of Jehovah from the ancient place of His rest. Or turning toward the encircling armies, the Roman banners appear to bear an inscription, bespeaking Titus as the minister of the predicted wrath of God.

It need not be feared lest, while affording in this instance a due commiseration to an unhappy people, we should make ourselves sharers in their peculiar guilt. Every reader of Jewish history learns to distinguish between the ordinary and the theological aspect of the calamities that have followed the race. Who that has the heart of a man hesitates to take part with the persecuted Israelites against the inquisitor; or who would stand aloof a moment, if an occasion offered for defending him from the wanton ferocity of the feudal baron or the Romish priest? And yet these very sufferings, and all the miseries that have pursued the people in the lands of their dispersion, are as truly a retribution from heaven of their national unbelief, as were the famine, the pestilence, and the carnage that attended the overthrow of Jerusalem. If it be lawful to think and speak with indulgence and compassion of the Jew of the tenth and fifteenth centuries, it is so to feel the same in regard to his ancestor of the age of Vespasian. Do we want a sanction for sentiments of this kind?—we receive one that is absolute and conclusive from the example of the Messiah himself, who when, with prophetic eye, he beheld the city as if then torrents of blood were pouring down from its gates, "wept over it;" and without forgetting its crimes, lamented its miseries.

The fanaticism which came to its paroxysm in the Jewish war demands to be traced in its growth, and watched in its several stages of enhancement. To do so is nothing more than an act of justice toward the fallen people; and moreover the subject has (as we shall afterwards see), a special and very important bearing upon a question which arises concerning the influence of the Mosaic and prophetic dispensation in forming the national character.

After a schooling of almost a thousand years (from Moses to Daniel), a discipline in which was mingled every means of grace and judgment; yet attended with only partial or temporary success, the Hebrew people had at length firmly embraced—never again to lose it, that first lesson of theology which it was the main design of the Mosaic institution to convey. Ever propense to the degrading service of fictitious divinities while secluded among the glens of Palestine, and while their obedience might have insured their peace, the nation, when at last transported to the very Pandemonium of idol-worship, sickened, as in a moment, of its inveterate error, and with a sudden and final revulsion of heart, learned to loathe the very names of the gods of the nations. Singular revolution!—the Jew in Babylon, while losing the ancient and sacred language of his religion—the language of the law and the prophets, and while acquiring in its stead a dialect which, according to the ordinary course of human affairs, should have infected him more deeply than ever with polythetic notions, learned the true sense of Moses and the prophets! Thus, in forgetting the letter of Scripture, he got possession of its spirit.

Become at length devoted and sincere worshippers of the God of their fathers, and punctilious observers of the ancient ritual, and now restored to their city and land, it seemed as if the Jewish people was setting out under auspicious circumstances to run that course of national obedience and consequent prosperity which should render it a visible and perpetual witness in the eye of all nations for a pure theology. Now were bright predictions to be fulfilled, and now was the world to admire a people loved of God—a royal priesthood—an exemplar of wisdom, virtue, and felicity!

So it might have been thought; but the hour was come for an occult law of retribution—a latent principle of the spiritual economy, to take effect upon the chosen race. Those who, age after age, had contemned the Divine promise of temporal prosperity as the reward of religious obedience, and had so long and so perversely "sinned against their own mercies," were now to be dealt with on a different rule—a rule which drew its reason from higher purposes than heretofore had been regarded. The Jewish people were indeed at this time willing to maintain the honours of Jehovah; and they were allowed to do so:—yet it must be under the condition (for the most part) of tribulation and oppression. The economy of earthly benefits which had remained in force under Solomon, Asa, Jehosaphat, Hezekiah, was superannuated, and was displaced by an economy of motives of a more elevated order. Antiochus is suffered to try the faith and constancy of those whose faithless fathers had been given into the hand of Assyrian and Babylonian oppressors.

This change in the character of events cannot be contemplated without perceiving that the dawn of a day of immortal hope was just then breaking upon the mountains of Judæa; a precursive trial was therefore to be made of that higher order of things, and of that more perfect discipline wherein the welfare of the soul was to take precedence of that of the body—the spiritual to be preferred to the natural—and Eternity to be more accounted of than Time.

A marked, and a correspondent change took place at this era of Jewish history in the sentiments of the people, and especially of their chiefs. Instead of talking exclusively (as heretofore) of immediate and political deliverance, and of national aggrandizement, they mixed with such secular hopes, views of a more refined and prospective sort. They had gradually learned to look through the dim shadows of death for the rewards of piety;—they turned their eye from the hills of Palestine, and with a steady courage endured torments and met death—that they might obtain "a better resurrection"* Not a less remarkable revolution of feeling was this than that of their final abandonment of polytheism. It was in truth a progression of the national mind; and a progression that involved the remote and universal destinies of the human family; for in the history and fate of the race of Abraham the history and fate of all nations are bound up.

The acquisition of the belief of a future life, and of its infinite rewards and punishments as a popular dogma, deepened and expanded to an immense extent the range of the religious emotions. The Jew of the Asmonean era had become capable of sustaining a part of spiritual heroism such as his ancestors of the time of David had never thought of. The "mighty threes"† of that pristine age were indeed valiant as warriors, and faithful too as champions of the God of Israel; but Judas Maccabeus, his companions and his successors, drew the motives of their constancy from considerations far more recondite and potent; and they fought and bled not merely as soldiers, but as martyrs."‡

* 2 Mac. vii. † 2 Sam. xxiii.

‡ The spirit of the Jews of this period, and their religious opinions, are to be learned much better from the two books of Maccabees, than from the polite pages of Josephus, who takes vast pains so to dress up the homely piety of his ancestors in hellenic phrases, as should render it offensive to his Gentile friends and readers. The simple language of faith and pious hope—hope of a better life, the learned author of the Antiquities translates into the dialect of Grecian philosophy and Grecian heroism. This is especially to be observed in the speeches of the Jewish worthies. With no other materials than what he obtained from the books of the Maccabees, he expands and embellishes the simple, affecting, and vigorous expressions of devout patriotism which he there found, and is fain to pre-

It was natural, as this expansion of the religious notions of the Jews took place under circumstances of extreme national trouble, and reached its maturity while they were struggling for their political and religious existence, that it should bring with it those tumultuary feelings which are provoked, as well in vulgar as in noble minds, by witnessing wanton violations of sacred things, persons, places, and usages. During the three centuries preceding the destruction of Jerusalem, and while, with transient intermissions, this nation of true worshippers was contending against the Macedonian, Syrian, and Egyptian kings, or fretting under the pressure of the Roman power, there was going on a slow accumulation upon the national mind of those emotions—intense, profound, and ungovernable, which, after many a portentous heave, at last burst forth and spread an universal ruin.

But this progression of religious feeling passed beyond its sound state; the ripening reached corruption. The people, while they firmly retained whatever was acrimonious in their national ideas, and whatever might engender spiritual arrogance, cast off those purer and nobler sentiments that had once imparted to their character the dignity and moderation of true virtue. Thus, although their external allegiance to Jehovah, the God of Abraham, remained irritably steadfast, and although they haughtily challenged every point of honour that belonged to them as the only depositaries in the world of an unsullied religion, they renounced those expansive sentiments, so frequently introduced by the prophets, which have a benign aspect toward all the families of mankind.*

Nor was this all—though indeed it might have been enough; for the zealot nation, scrupulous practitioners of whatever in the Mosaic institutions tended to insulate them from the community of mankind, loaded those institutions with offensive exaggerations; and moreover to a great extent superseded the genuine precepts of the Pentateuch by a comment and tradition abominably perverse. So it was that the whole repulsive rigidity of sectarism wrapped them about as a garment; while they held few or none of the compensations of a purer morality. At once, and in an extreme degree, sanctimonious and debauched, the Jews (of the Christian era) were in that very state which, more than any other, is liable to pass into violence. Who so furious and rabid as the scrupulous, immoral religionist, heated by a sense of injury and insult?

One element more, and only one remained to fit the Jewish people for the terrible part they were to act in bringing on the catastrophe of the state. This was the spirit of faction, and this they had addmitted to the full. The rise of the rancour of religious strife is a subject too extensive to be entered upon in this place; but it is one that might well claim deliberate attention; and the more so, because these virulent and peculiar feelings which seemed for the first time to break out upon human nature about a century before the birth of Christ, have ever since (and to the present day) kept their place, and have had a great share in determining the course of events throughout Christendom. At present it may suffice to advert to the fact that, at the time we are speaking of, the bosom of almost every Jew, besides the common malevolence or murky pride which then characterized the race, harboured a still more definite and vivid animosity against some rival party: each mind, while revolving around the one gloomy centre of national feeling, revolved also about the centre of its sect. Unhappy people, thus to exist and move in an element of hatred, at once diffusive and condensed.†

Such were the pungent sentiments which prepared the Jewish people for the horrors of its catastrophe. Then there was added to these feelings a specific and extraordinary excitement, which gave intensity to every passion of a political or religious sort. This was the fond, and now desperate expectation of the appearance of their Messiah.

The two principles, namely, the belief of a future life, with its rewards and punishments, and the hope of national deliverance and universal empire under the conduct of the promised Son of David, had kept pace one with the other, and both had gradually become more and more distinct, had mingled more in the popular sentiments, and had settled into familiar forms of expression, so that what, in the remoter times, was a mystery, or an esoteric doctrine—conserved by seers, and hidden under symbols, had now reached the populace, and was in every mouth. The hope of redemption under the Messiah, which existed in a warm and natural state at the time of the advent of Him who was indeed the Lord's Christ, underwent a pernicious revulsion from the disappointment that ensued when the Son of Mary was rejected. Pious desire turned then into a wild and frenzied wistfulness—the prey of every delusion. The articulate language of prophecy—the awakened expectations of mankind at large, and the portents of the times, all concurred to fix, beyond mistake, the then passing years as the destined era of deliverance.—Scripture and the comments upon it, marked almost the moment,—while the events of the age, the balancings of human affairs, declared the times to be fulfilled. Yet these years hastened on, and no Saviour; no Saviour from Gentile tyranny appeared. In the interim the sacrilegious foreign power advanced every day nearer and nearer to the sanctuary of God. Unutterable profanations had been threatened, and even perpetrated: but a little more, and the very heart of the Israelitish polity must receive a fatal wound. Yet the heavens were not rent; Jehovah and his Anointed stood afar from the help of his inheritance. Must it not be to try the constancy of Israel to the extremest point, and to enhance the arrogance of the oppressor to the highest degree; so that, on the one side, the coming deliverance should be the more welcome, and on the other, the vengeance so much the more signal? Doubtless God would, at the last, visit his chosen people.—Suddenly, and in the blaze of his power would he descend to his temple, unfurl on the heights of Zion the Banner of his love and wrath; and thence advancing, followed by the tribes of Jacob, would go forth, King of kings, to trample on the necks of all mankind.*

Fond, and yet not—as it seemed, irrational hope! Proof could be advanced in support of every portion of this vast conception. No expectation comparable to this; none so great, so bright, and at the same time so distinct, had ever been indulged by any people: no analogous instance stands upon the records of history: an ambition so dazzling was known only to the Jew, and this hope had been rendered the more vigorous by compression; the weight of all visible probabilities weighed it down; nothing less than the Power of Rome, with all her legions, bore upon the expectation of Israel; and yet did not crush it. Judæa against the world: no, rather God and his Messiah, against the potsherds of the earth!

Often must it have happened to the haughty Jew to gaze, in sinister contempt, upon the military pomp of the Empire (at Rome or in the provinces) and to meditate the hour when all this splendour should fade before the throne and car of the sent his readers with rhetorical harangues, after the fashion of Thucydides. The same intention is copiously displayed in the Book of the Government of Reason.

* Josephus, who never forgets his solicitude to propitiate the Roman government, and to conciliate Gentile readers, takes pains to conceal that contempt which his countrymen indulged toward the polytheistic world. He even denies in a formal manner that the Jews allowed themselves to condemn or ridicule other modes of worship. "For my own part, I do not bring into question other men's religious practices. In truth, it belongs to us as a people to preserve our own usages;—not to inculpate those of other nations. And our legislator expressly forbade our either ridiculing or defaming those whom the nations around us regard as divinities."—Against Apion, b. 2. This was a bold assertion, and one which his adversary might have easily refuted. Are not the gods of the heathen contemptuously handled by David and the prophets? and are not the worshippers of stocks and stones declared to be stupid and absurd? This scorn of idols and idolators had increased, not diminished, among the Jews.

† When he refers to the factions that distracted the Jewish people, Josephus employs the strongest terms which language affords. —"One might justly say sedition grew upon sedition; or the state might be compared to a rabid beast that, in want of sustenance from without, rends and devours its own entrails." Τί τηλικοῦτον, exclaims the historian, ὦ τλημονεστάτη πόλις, πέπουθας ὑπὸ Ῥωμαίων, εἰ σου τὰ ἐμμυελια μύσῃ περικαθαρσοῦντες εἰσπλεύσιν.

* Josephus, from obvious motives of policy, draws a veil over the subject of the hope his countrymen entertained of a Prince and Deliverer who should rule the world. To have given its just prominence to this theme would have been highly dangerous both to himself and to his people. His allusion to it is brief and cautious, and is accompanied by a comment designed to exclude all suspicion.—"But what chiefly incited the Jews to the war was an ambiguous prediction χρησμὸς ὑμρίβολος, found in their sacred writings, the purport of which was, that, about that time, some one of their country should rule the world. This prediction they appropriated to their own race; and many of their Rabbis were led astray by the interpretation. In truth the oracle pointed to Vespasian, who was declared Emperor in Judæa."—De Bello Jud. L. VI. c. 12. If this were indeed the "chief incentive" of the war, it doubtless held a much larger place in the sentiments and harangues of the people and their leaders than appears from the narrative of the historian. Josephus knew more of this "ambiguous prophecy," and of its mighty influence over the national feelings, than he thought it prudent to avow.

Messiah. Yes, many a time had he brooded upon the thought that Rome and her pride should ere long lie in the dust at the gate of Jerusalem; and suppliants from the capitol kiss the feet of the princes of Zion!

How then shall we measure the desperation of the rage when a hope so ancient and so vast was drawing to its crisis! At length a terrible surmise stole upon the dismayed heart of the people; that the very foundations of their belief were illusory! The dark consummation which this wretched people, now hemmed in by an irresistible enemy, had to fear, was not the famine and thirst of a siege, or massacres within their walls, or the carnage to be expected from the irritated legions; it was not the overthrow of their city, the ruin of their temple, the devastation of their land, the extinction of the race; a worse catastrophe was before them: nothing less than a plunge into the bottomless gulf of atheism: it was the death of a nation's soul that was at hand. If indeed at the last the promise should fail, if the Gentile sword should be suffered to cut off root and branch of the people of Abraham, what then were the Scriptures; what Moses and the Prophets; what Sinai and its thunders; what the long series of signs and miracles which had conveyed to this people, and to this alone, a genuine faith in one God? By a false concatenation of inferences, the religious convictions of the Jewish people, the whole of their belief of things unseen, was made to hang upon the event of the siege of the holy city. Let but the abominable signals of the Roman legions be planted upon the walls of the temple, and then Israel, carrying with him all his hopes—the anticipated splendours of time, and the glories of eternity, must leap from the height into the shoreless abyss of despair!

Under the pressure of emotions so supernatural and extreme, if more could have been endured by man than was then suffered, or more effected than was performed, it had actually been sustained and done. The feeling of the people was far more profound than that it should measure itself against any pains or dangers mortality can undergo. The visible and sensible woe of the siege did but faintly symbolize the convulsive anguish of every Jewish heart. It was as when a guilt-stricken wretch approaching his last hour, though torn by the pangs of death, forgets the wrench of bodily pain in the torment of the soul;—the writhing of the limbs, the contortions of the features, the livid hue, the glare of the eye, the sighs, the groans, are imperfect expressions only of the misery and terror of the spirit.

To attribute an absolute authenticity to the long and elaborate speeches which the Jewish historian puts into the mouth of the chiefs of the factions would be idle; and especially so where, according to his own account, all or most of those who were actually present on the occasion soon afterwards perished. Nevertheless there is a sense in which these harangues deserve attention; for Josephus, familiarly acquainted as he was with the sentiments of his countrymen, and with their style of thinking, no doubt adhered to dramatic truth in composing these orations, and would assign to the speakers language proper to the character of the persons. Although graced with not a few Grecian turns, the matter of these compositions is unquestionably national. Nay, it may be granted as probable that broken portions of an actual address, on some signal occasion, were reported, and had come to the knowledge of the historian. By the same rule it is acknowledged that while the speeches of Roman Generals and Senators, as given by Livy, are Livy's speeches, they may still be regarded, although fictitious in a strict or historical sense, as authentic and characteristic examples of Roman feeling.

With this caution in view, it is a matter of some curiosity to examine the harangues of those of the Jewish leaders who survived the destruction of the city, and whose fate it was to receive in their persons the last strokes of Roman vengeance. Supposing it to float somewhere between truth and fiction—true in elements—fictitious in form, the address of Eleazar, chief of the Assassins, to his companions, when shut up in Masada,* and unable longer to hold out against the Romans, may be adduced as a highly characteristic exhibition of the ultimate, or fallen and melancholic stage of martial fanaticism. With the extinction of the specific hope whence it had sprung, the heat and vivacity of the feeling had passed away, leaving only its desperation:—the fury is gone, but not the folly. The once boisterous passion assumes even something of the serenity of good sense; but yet entirely wants the consistency of true wisdom. So terrible a commotion of the soul of a people could not instantly subside; and a while after the roaring of the storm is hushed, the billows continue to fling their huge masses sullenly upon the shore.

The secular hope of national deliverance and military glory was that which had inspired the constancy of the people up to the moment when they beheld their temple in flames; but then, of necessity, their ill-placed confidence dissolved. It was that very temple which should have received the Messiah:—that building, as they firmly believed, no power in earth or heaven could overthrow; for it was destined to endure to the consummation of all things. But the temple was now actually levelled to the ground; the people's hope disappeared also, and with it, as we cannot doubt, the religious faith of multitudes of those who perished in the carnage that followed. In that last hour of anguish did not many a warm Pharisaic heart become suddenly cold with Sadducean despair? Yet others there were whose feelings underwent a revulsion, and in whom, when the worldly seduction had lost its power, the better religious sentiment would regain its influence. So (if we may regard as in any sense genuine the last and fatal discourse of Eleazar) was it with that desperate leader.

"Such, brave comrades, such is our immemorial resolution, that to God alone—the true and righteous Lord of men, homage is to be rendered; and that neither from the Romans, nor from any other earthly power, is servitude to be endured. The day is now come in which we are called upon to seal our profession by our deeds; unless we be ourselves unworthy of that profession. And this is certain, that if the servitude we have in past times submitted to was grievous, what awaits us, should we fall alive into the hands of the Roman, will be aggravated by intolerable torments. Were not we (the Sicarii) the first to revolt?—are we not also the last to resist? I hold it then to be a special grace of Heaven, to us accorded, that we possess as we do at this time, the means of dying honourably and free, while others of our nation, betrayed by their fallacious hopes, enjoyed no such option.

"No one can now doubt that to-morrow's sun must see this fortress in the hands of the enemy. But there remains to us the undisputed choice of a noble death; and a death in the arms of those most dear to us. No, ardently as he desires to take us alive, he is as unable to deprive us of this choice, as we are to resist him in the field. Resist the Roman in the field! no, this we should long ago, and from the first of our revolt have understood, when peradventure it might have availed us to know it, that the Divine irrevocable decree has sealed our destruction as a people. The Jewish race, once so dear to God, He has consigned to perdition. Do we want proof of the fact; let us look to the site of the sacred city, at this moment smoking in its ruins, and strewed with the bodies of thousands of the people.

"And now, my companions, indulge not any such presumption as if we, who hitherto have escaped the common ruin, were not sharers in the common guilt; and might yet evade the universal sentence that is to annihilate the race. Look about you, and see how God himself has been stripping us of the vain hope we had clung to. What avails us the possession of this inaccessible fortress? what the abundance of provisions, and our ample stock of weapons? God's outstretched arm has rent from us our fond conceit of safety. Think you that the flames yesterday, which at first bore upon the enemy, did of their own accord suddenly turn round upon our newly-raised defences? No, this reverting fire was blown by Almighty wrath—the punishment of our presumption; and we find that the vengeance of God, provoked by our sins, is more inexorable than even the malice of the Romans.

"Already therefore doomed, as we are, by God—let us die:—die—our wives exempt from abuse—our children unknowing bondage; and then, these delivered by our hands, we shall have only to discharge, one for another, a generous office and mutually ensure the death and sepulture of freemen? Our treasures we will consume. How will the Roman vex to be defrauded at once of our persons and of our wealth; both of which he thinks his prey! Yes, but we will leave him our stock of food—an evidence that we were not urged by famine, but that from the impulse of a steady purpose, we had preferred death to slavery."

* A precipitous and strongly fortified height, overlooking the northern extremity of the Dead Sea. The Maccabees first, and afterwards Herod, had constructed on this hill-top what was deemed an impregnable fortress. As such it had been always held by the latter in a state of readiness to serve him as a place of refuge in the event of a rebellion.

Thus, says the historian, spoke Eleazar.* But many of his auditors quavered. Some indeed met the ardour of their chief with a kindred resolution, and would at once have given it effect. Others, held by the tenderness of nature, and gazing upon their wives and children, doomed thus to die, burst into tears, and refused assent to the fatal resolution. The leader beheld with anxiety their trepidation, fearing lest it might shake even the more courageous, and disappoint his design. As if inspired with high thoughts, his eyes fixed, and in energetic tones, he again addressed the crowd, bringing before them the brightness of immortality.

"Was I deceived then in believing that the brave had rather die than live dishonoured? Comrades, do you fear to die even to escape evils worse than death? In an extremity like this ye should neither hesitate, nor want a prompter. But let me remind you of that which from childhood we have learned—which our fathers and the sacred writings teach, and which our ancestors have so often authenticated by their deeds—that it is life, rather than death, which should be thought of as calamitous.† Death, is it not the liberator of souls? does it not dismiss them to the pure abodes where none of the ill chances of mortality can enter? So long as we are bound to this mortal frame, and liable to the evils it inherits, our life is but a death. Oh unworthy alliance of the divine essence with a fabric that must die? Organ of the soul's power and will, yet does the body weigh it down to earth, from which freed, it soars to its native region; regains a blessed and unbounded liberty, and like God himself, evades the sight of mortals. Yes, unseen does it enter the body; and unseen depart—a pure and unmingled essence; yet potent—the cause of life, and itself immortal. Witness the independence and activity of the soul in sleep, when discharged for a while from the warfare of flesh, it enjoys its proper delights, and taking the privilege of its affinity to God, freely pervades all places, and even penetrates futurity!

"With what reason then can we fear to die, who court the refreshment of sleep? Preposterous surely for those to grudge themselves perpetual freedom, who prefer liberty to any other of the goods of life? This readiness to put off mortality we, as Jews, ought especially to exhibit; or if indeed we must go to learn such a lesson from strangers, let us look to those Indian sages who loathingly live a while to fulfil the purposes of nature, and hasten to die that they may shake off the ills of animal existence. None hinder them in their purpose; none lament their exit; but rather account them happy, and commit to their hand epistles of love to their kindred in the skies. Gladly do they ascend the pyre where all the grossness of the body is to disappear. Shall we then—better taught as we are than they, be less prompt to urge our course to immortality? This were indeed a shame.

"But even if we had been taught to think the present life the chief good, and death the greatest evil, it would still be certain, that, placed as we are, we should manfully meet our fate; since, as well the will of God, as the necessity of the moment, commands us to die. Believe it, countrymen, that long ago heaven sealed the fatal decree which none of the Jewish race can evade, and which consigns us—guilty as we have been, to utter extinction. Our nation has fallen, not by the power of Rome—not even by our errors in conducting the war; no, a stronger hand has crushed us—we perish beneath the stroke of the Almighty!

"Time would fail me if I were to recount the many signal instances in which, contrary to all probability, and even against or beyond the intention of our enemies, we have fallen the victims of Divine vengeance. Or when any of our race has escaped immediate carnage, who would not deplore their lot as far more grievous; who would not rather die than endure what such have suffered? Some, torn of the lash; some, tormented with fire; some, half eaten of beasts, and rescued, to be thrown to them alive for a second repast! Or were they permitted to live? yes, but only to be made the sport of their adversaries. How do those now desire to die who are yet compelled to breathe!

"Alas! where now is that city of ours, the mother-city of Juda,* where—with her many circling ramparts—her lofty towers and castles; where, filled as she was with the means of war, and crowded with mayriads of valiant men, eager to defend her! What has become of the city which we fondly believed to be the abode of God? Rased to the ground? nothing now marks the spot where once stood Jerusalem; nothing but the tents of her destroyer! Ah, and you may find there, as relics of the Jewish people, some miserable ancients, seated in the dust; or a few women, reserved to dishonour.

"Which of us then, even if he could do so unhurt, should endure to behold another sun? Who is there so false to his country—who so imbecile—who so chary of life, that does not vex to have survived so long as this? Would we had all died rather than have seen the Holy City rased by the axe of the enemy—and the Temple, with horrible impiety, upheaved from its foundations! Our souls, indeed, have lately been fed by the generous hope of speedily avenging the fall of our city upon the foe.† But that hope now vanishes, and leaves us no option: let us rush then upon an unsullied death. Let us have pity upon ourselves; upon our wives; upon our children, while yet we have the power to do so. Death indeed all must undergo; but not injuries, bonds, insults;—or not unless our cowardice drives us to meet these greater evils. And what evils are they? Elate with confidence, we at first defied the Roman power: once and again we have scorned the proffered terms of our exasperated enemy: dare we think then of his rage if he takes us living? Wretched shall the younger of us be whose strength lasts out longer torment! wretched the elders who have no power to sustain the trial! One shall see his wife led away to suffer violence; another, with his arms bound, shall hear the cries of a son, vainly imploring a father's aid. No, this shall not be:—now, now are our hands free; now are our swords our own: let them then do for us the kindly office! Free from the thrall of our enemies, we die; free with our wives and children, we launch from life. Our law enjoins the deed; our wives and our children implore this grace at our hands; God himself throws the necessity upon us. The Roman would fain prevent it, and is all alarm lest any of us should perish before he can scale our defences. We hasten then to offer to him, instead of his desired revenge, amazement at the boldness of our death."

All started up as if seized with frenzy, or possessed with demons, to give instant effect to the advice of their chief. Each man embraced his wife, his child, and in the midst of fond kisses, his arm unknowing what it did, gave the fatal plunge. Each thought a moment of the miseries from which that stroke redeemed his loved companion and progeny; and all, without exception, dared the horrid act. Pitiable fate of men to whom it seemed the least of evils thus to make a carnage of their women and babes! The husbands and fathers, feeling as if every moment they now survived was an injury done to the dead, hurried on what was yet to be effected. Fire was put to whatever the fortress contained. Ten of the survivors, chosen by lot, fell upon their companions: every man in dying embraced the bloody remains of his own. One then chosen from the ten, slays the nine, and he, taking a last look around to ascertain that the work of death was complete, rushed on his sword.

There is yet a form of popular fury which ought here to find a place, although its peculiarity may seem to disconnect it with any other kind. We mean the atheistic fanaticism when it affects a community, and impels it to assault every mode of worship with intent to exterminate religious profession. Of this dire infatuation modern times have given us an example—the first in the history of mankind; may it be the last!

Atheism, when it spreads among a people in the form of an active and positive opinion—vauntingly professed and eagerly disseminated, is something very different from ordinary irreligion, or reckless and profligate impiety; and it will be found to display each well known characteristic of a virulent religious creed: it is in truth nothing else than a heresy; and the proselyting Atheist, how much soever his pride may resent the imputation, is a mere zealot; yes, and a zealot surpassing others in blind malignancy. Is the bigot religionist dogmatical, acrimonious, impudent? is he a demagogue, and a noisy predicator of monstrous paradoxes? Just such is the Atheist. And if the one readily seizes the occasion to act the persecutor, and to dip his hands in blood, so, as we have found, does the other.

* The historian's method of expanding immensely his materials, is shown by a comparison of the succinct speeches reported in the Book of Maccabees, with the elaborate orations that embellish his work. In the present instance a license of abridgment and compression is freely used, the result of which may perhaps be a nearer approach to historic truth. So long a discourse as that which Josephus attributes to Eleazar (occupying five folio pages) would certainly not have been uttered or listened to, under such circumstances.

† If this speech be regarded as nothing more than the composition of Josephus, it will not the less serve to prove a fact, important in its bearings—That a distinct belief of immortality—a belief far more distinct than appears on the face of the canonical prophetic writings, had long been entertained among the Jews, and had constituted a main article of that body of tradition, which, rather than the Scriptures, governed the opinions, the sentiments, and the practices of the nation.

* Philo, Legat ad Caium, well calls Jerusalem, not the metropolis of one land, Judæa only, but of many.

An opinion that attaches only to scattered individuals, displays nothing more than a sample of its genuine properties: but let it affect large masses of a people, or take possession of a community, and then its real qualities come into play. Every age has produced a few petulant sophists, who would fain persuade themselves and the world that they had at length rid their natures of the very rudiments of belief, and that they held nothing to exist which could not be handled and seen, tasted or smelt. But an affectation so extreme does not readily overthrow the common sense of mankind at large; nor would it ever do so without the aid of peculiar and accidental incitements of a political kind. In fact all imaginable forms of monstrous error had been turned up in the chances of four thousand years before this of national Atheism—more monstrous than any, made its appearance. That the great body of an instructed people should yield itself a prey to the madness of Atheism, and should deliberately endeavour to rear the social structure upon the site whence every vestige of worship and religious fear had been removed, was indeed a novelty that would not have been reckoned among things possible, or in any degree likely to take place.

Yet the French revolutionary frenzy actually reached this pitch; and it is well remembered what was the temper of this last prodigy of the human mind, when it burst the shell. Its parents had announced that it would be rational, just, and moderate, as the beautiful creature of Philosophy; but it instantly proved itself to be rabid and blood-thirsty like an offspring of the Furies? As the Atheism of the philosophers would not have spread over the land, unaided by political impulses, so neither would the political passions that attended the course of the revolution, alone have sustained, and for so long a time, that sanguinary exasperation which raged through France year after year; and in fact the massacres and the executions of the republican era were, in almost every instance, hurried on by an embittered hatred of whatever appertained to religion: legions of blasphemy were inscribed on all the banners of blood. The civil war was a crusade against God; and those who at the commencement had professed it to be their ambition to blot out the name of Christ, were borne along by the impulse to which they had yielded, and could not stop until they had spent all their spite in the endeavour to dethrone the Most High.

We need only change the phrases current among the populace, and substitute one set of emblematic embellishments for another, and then the horrid scenes of the French revolutionary civil war are repetitions, on a larger scale, of those exterminating frenzies that so often have desolated the fair provinces of that country. A super-human spectator of terrene affairs—ignorant of the dialect, and of the circumstantials, would quite have failed to distinguish the bloodshed and devastations of one era from those of another; and far from suspecting that the truculent savages of the Revolution were the disciples of philosophers, might have deemed them only superstitious friars, and templars, of a new and more intolerant order.

The authors of this confusion discerned, just in time, the jeopardy into which they had led the country:—they hastily retraced their steps, and so mankind lost the benefit of the spectacle which must soon have been witnessed if the Intolerance of Impiety had been left to run its round. Leave was given to the Maker and Ruler of the Universe to resume his place in the fears—though not in the affections of the people; for it had been found that without the stay of religion the social machine could not safely perform its movements. The public heralds therefore proclaimed anew the Eternal; and leave was granted, to the credulous at least, to expect a future life, and to fear retribution.

The lesson perhaps may long serve the European nations, and no second attempt be made of a like kind. Yet what has once happened must no longer be spoken of as utterly beyond probability. This assuredly ought to be confessed, on the ground now of actual experiment, that if in any instance the ordinary or common and sensual impiety of the mass of mankind comes to be quickened by a stirring spirit of disbelief—if the irreligion which hitherto has been sluggish or frivolous, kindles into a petulant bigotry, and utters itself in acrid blasphemies; and especially, if the same atheistic zeal lurks in the bosoms of the upper classes, and ferments at the centre of government—then little will be wanted to put these forces in movement, or to direct them against the institutions and the parties that uphold the worship of God. A slight and accidental political excitement would be enough to bring on the crisis. Whenever—if ever—such a train of events shall in any country have room, it will be seen that, if Popery be a bad instigator of the malignant passions of the people, Atheism is a worse; and that the fanaticism of impiety should be dreaded even more than that of superstition.

The history of modern Europe, and of our own country especially, would have afforded many, and striking examples of that order of Fanaticism which brings the military and religious sentiments into combination. The instances are present to the recollection of every reader. And beside that a universal enumeration could subserve no important purpose, and would fill volumes, some of these cases are of that ambiguous and perplexing kind, which a writer may well desire to evade, rather than meet the dilemma of either giving a sanction to what it would be unsafe to approve, or of sternly condemning what we ought not to think ourselves competent to adjudge as altogether immoral. Moreover, other cases of this order involve the political and religious prejudices of existing parties; and are not to be spoken of without kindling the embers of faction. To call the originator of this or that body—a fanatic, would be, according to the interpretation of some, to become the champion of the opposite system of opinions. Or to brand with the same epithet the leaders on both sides, would be to wound (and still more deeply) the fond predilections of all. There are pages of our British history—English, Scottish, and Irish, which will need to be written anew, when our religious factions shall have come to their end.

SECTION VIII.

FANATICISM OF THE SYMBOL.

The arduous part of our subject now meets us. In reviewing those phases of error which have long ago passed away, we occupy a vantage ground, and may at leisure measure the proportions of the distant object. But every circumstance of the inquiry is of another sort when it is the extant form of religion which comes to be examined, and when what we should calmly and impartially speak of, are practices, opinions and modes of feeling, regarded as excellent, or leniently dealt with as venial, by our contemporaries—our friends—our co-adjutors—ourselves.

It were an arrogance in any man to assume that he can exercise an absolutely impartial judgment concerning the things of his own age. No human mind has ever reached such serene elevation. If the characteristic and prevailing errors of the day have been discerned by here and there an individual, himself has not escaped that depressing influence wich attends a long-continued and anxious meditation of objects that show a frowning face to whoever refuses them his homage. Conscious then of a disadvantage not to be avoided, and careful to maintain that modesty which the knowledge of it should engender, we may yet advance, enheartened by the anticipation of an era, perhaps not very remote, when the religion of the Scriptures, having at length passed through the cycle of its degradations, shall, without any more hindrance, bless the human family.

In contemplating the errors of past ages, no point more important presents itself, nothing which should so fix our attention as the fact that certain extravagant modes of feeling, or certain pernicious practices—the offspring of an active and virulent fanaticism, have, after a while, subsided into a fixed and tranquil form, such as has allowed them to win the approval and to secure the support of the calmest and most enlightened minds; and so to be transmitted through successive ages—accredited, unquestioned, admired. The turbulent stage of fanaticism would do the church little harm if it were not succeeded by a tame and moderate fanaticism—seemingly wise and temperate. The parent in these instances is an ephemeron; but the progeny has had a longer term than that of the phœnix. The rugged surface of our globe, such as it is seen among the Alps or Andes, imposes awe, as if those stupendous piles of primeval rock, capped with the snows of thousands of winters, were the very symbols of protracted unchanging duration—or of eternity itself; and yet is it not true that the huge masses owe their stern grandeur and their lofty pride to terrible powers of commotion?—these mountains were upheaved when our world was in her fit of boisterous frenzy—when convulsions shook her centre. Instead then of regarding the now motionless forms as emblems of repose, we should deem them rather the relics and the portents too of confusion.

Nothing, or nothing favourable, should be inferred on the behalf of any system or constitution of things from its present tranquillity, or from the moderation and the wisdom that invest it; or from the accidental benefits which it may claim to have produced. The blackest superstitions have shown an exterior mildly magnificent: the extravagances of personal torture have worn the garb of seraphic piety: the Fanaticism of intolerance has shown in combination with great qualities; and the zeal of military proselytism has made alliance with substantial virtues. There is nothing, then, to wonder at if even genuine piety and the brightest personal excellence are found to exist under a state of things which owes its origin to an impulse essentially fanatical. The question is always, not whether accomplishments and virtues and piety exist within this or that system; but simply—whether the system itself be good or evil.

The Fanaticism of the Symbol—or a malign and turbulent zeal for the honour of a creed, supposes, of course, the possession of a written and authoritative canon of faith. But then this rule has to be interpreted; and the interpretation, in each instance, insensibly draws to itself those profound emotions which the sacred importance of the canon calls into play.

It does not appear that sectarian rancour, in any distinct form, had shown itself before the time when the Jewish prophetic economy having been sealed, and the written Testimony of God consigned, in a defunct dialect, to INTERPRETERS, a field was opened to diversities of opinion, each of which challenged to itself entire, the prerogatives that attach of right to the original document. From the period when exposition of Scripture became the business of a class of men, the Jewish community parted into sects which, in an exasperated condition, were the main causes of the ruin of the state, the destruction of the city, and the dispersion of the race.

In this instance what we assume to have been new in the history of human nature, was not the existence or the breaking forth of the diversities of opinion; for these have disturbed all countries in all ages; nor was it the alliance of certain modes of thinking on abstract subjects with temporary and political interests; for nothing has been more common than such associations. But the novelty was precisely this—that the tremendous weight of God's sanction—truly believed to belong to the Canon of Faith, was claimed by each party in behalf of its special exposition of the rule. So fatal an assumption effected a firm coalescence of every religious sentiment with the passionate workings of self-love, pride, jealousy, and the sense of personal and corporate welfare.

Within the circle of these feelings every proper element of Fanaticism finds room, and no species of Fanaticism has been altogether so compact or so permanent. The other kinds (as we have seen) have had their hour and have vanished; this has settled down upon Religion—documentary religion, as well in Europe as in Asia, and now in America, and has become the inseparable condition of all forms of worship.

We say every proper element of Fanaticism displays itself in the Fanaticism of the Symbol. As for example:—The Divine Being, when so outraged as to be made the patron of a virulent faction, appears to the votary altogether under a malign aspect, and can no more be thought of such as He is. Again, the irritation excited by opposition in matters of opinion, when heightened by a vindictive forethought of future judgment, brings with it the most peculiar species of misanthropy known to the human bosom; and an arrogance too, that far transcends other kinds of aristocratic pride. With an anathematizing Deity—an anathematized world, and himself safe in the heart of the only Church, the zealot wants nothing that can render him malign and insolent.

Mere diversities of opinion by no means necessarily involve virulent or acrimonious sentiments. Sad indeed would it be if Christian amity, and that true unison of hearts and hands which the church should exhibit, could not be hoped for until an absolute uniformity of notions and practices is brought about; for it is plain that so long as one mind possesses more native power and more accomplishments than another, there must be inequalities of knowledge, and varieties of apprehension. Nothing less than the imparting of omniscience to every human being could remedy the inconveniences that arise from this source. Nor in fact are such differences ever found to throw a cloud over private friendships, or to disturb the harmony of general society, while angry exaggerations and the swellings of wounded pride are avoided.

There can therefore be no need whatever that, as a resource against the evils of sectarian virulence, we should either throw ourselves into the arms of Church despotism, and renounce the liberty of reason; or give way to the relaxation and the apathy which would render us altogether indifferent to truth and error. This indeed were miserably to degrade human nature, and to quash its noblest ambition. We subtract the premium from mental industry, we remove the crown from the goal on the course of knowledge, when we discourage the zeal with which vigorous minds pursue Truth. How should mankind ever emerge from barbarism, or how free themselves from the tyranny of superstition, if the first lesson we are to teach them is, that error has no noxious quality, and truth no prerogative?

To affirm or to insinuate that a just and accurate knowledge of Religion avails little to our welfare, is not only a rank absurdity, but must be regarded as a pernicious tampering with that fatal insensibility which, alas, envelopes human nature. Instead of teaching the indifferency of opinion, rather let every man's anxiety to obtain for himself the inestimable pearl of genuine knowledge be stimulated to the utmost; and then, not only will this jewel be individually secured, but the strange illusion will be broken up whence fanatical zeal takes its rise.—Strange illusion indeed, which impels a man who has bestowed little or no industry upon the business of seeking truth for himself, to use efforts so prodigious for forcing it upon others! An anomaly surely is this in the common law of self-love. But the temper and conduct of the zealot are made up of inconsistencies. It is, he says, the well-being of his fellow men which incites his endeavours; and yet nothing in his style or mien bespeaks philanthropy. A disposition the very reverse of good-will one would assuredly assign to him. Besides; while thus anxious to hear a faultless creed uttered by all lips, this champion of the faith walks up and down in a much corrupted world, scarcely heeding the many grievous degradations under which humanity is suffering. His eye can glare upon wretchedness and upon vice in their most melancholy forms—and forget what it sees. Nay, into the cup of human woe he can himself pour the bitterest ingredients; he can afflict his fellow men with the whip, with the brand; he can cast them into dungeons, and leave them there to die in the pestilent damps of his charity; all this he can do, and still persuade himself that it is zeal for God and love to man which prompts his labours.

Thus absurd is the human mind when fairly surrendered to religious delusions. The power of the infatuation in these cases seems to result from a combination of the opposite feelings belonging to full persuasion and secret misgiving. The controvertist owes the heat of his zeal as well to firm conviction as to a mistrustful anxiety concerning the truth of his dogmas: and the faith and the doubt are alternately attached to the authoritative document of his belief, and to his special interpretation of it. It is this very oscillation of the mind which produces the turbulence of his emotions. If the imagination be liable to high excitement from a pressing sense of the reality and the impending nearness of the objects that engage it, this excitement may be furnished either by a vivid faith in the original CANON, or by confidence in the CREED that has been derived from it. Then—as fear and jealousy bring the irascible passions into play, these will not fail to take occasion from—the obscurity of the subject in dispute—from the cogency of an opponent's argument—from a conscious incompetency to deal with matters so difficult, and not least, from those qualms which follow a too highly stimulated exertion of the faculties.

In matters of belief, and especially when the powerful motives of religion take full possession of the mind, we involuntarily lean very much one upon another. This social instinct is perhaps stronger than is ordinarily supposed; and it is very likely to be lost sight of where the prevalence of angry passions appears to deny its existence. And yet it is in those very instances most intensely at work. Man proves himself to be constituted for society, as well by his hatreds as by his affections. Amid the dimness and the intricacy of the present scene, wherein Truth evades pursuit, and Error uses a thousand artifices to get herself courted, the perplexed spirit fondly looks for a numerous companionship in the path it takes. Our belief, and the comfort of belief, mount with the tens, and hundreds, and thousands, that are seen to be joining us on the road:—we cannot believe alone; and our doubts too are in the power of others. To assail our convictions is not merely to wound our self-love, and to irritate our pride, but it is to withdraw something from the interior warmth and vigour of the soul. Without formally confessing it as a fact, that an antagonist has robbed us of our assurance—for the contrary would be affirmed, our feelings are the same as if we had been despoiled of that precious possession; and these feelings prompt us not merely to resent the injury, but to recover the property lost.

Putting out of view then certain accessory motives which will presently claim to be mentioned, the zealous champion and propagator of a Creed has an interest to promote that deeply engages his passions. Pride and secular advantages out of the question, it is a matter of sincere anxiety with him to secure, to maintain, and to extend the pale of his party. He looks aghast at the danger of being deserted, or of seeing a host on the opposite heights. No endeavours are too great therefore which may arrest defection while it is small and feeble. Under the pressure of this solicitude it is no wonder that the defender of the Creed should avail himself of the extreme means of persuasion. Or if measures of violence are not at hand, he snatches up the weapons of spiritual hostility. And first, a strenuous endeavour is made so to identify the special interpretation with the Authoritative Canon of faith, as that whoever impugns the former shall stand declared—the enemy of God. Instead of for a moment admitting the reasonable and modest supposition that the Interpretation may perhaps contain more than the Canon will support, and that therefore caution should be used in doling out anathemas, every artifice of an elaborate sophistry is employed to keep such a supposition out of view. Nothing less than the peculiar exigency of the occasion could drive the zealot into so egregious a dogmatism, for he feels that if he were to give ground but an inch, he must forfeit his usurped right to fling the bolts of heaven. If the Interpretation be not indeed divine, it is merely human—a simple opinion; and if so, must be submitted to the common conditions of argument. The headlong champion would not go so far as he does, if he knew how to stop short, or if there were any middle ground. It may well be believed that, in many an instance, the acrimony and the blasphemous arrogance of sectarists have scandalized even themselves in their more sober moments.—But what could be done?—As well surrender the controversy and confess defeat, as relinquish the right to curse in the name of God. This right laid down, and how meagre, how cold, how powerless a thing is the argument, reduced to its naked merits! The punishment affixed by the laws of the moral world to the first offence of entertaining malignant exaggerations, is the necessity it involves of running on to still worse excesses. Once madly insult reason and charity, and we are abandoned, perhaps for ever, by both.

The transition is rapid and almost involuntary from the first stage of fanatical intemperance to its last:—the ground in these regions is precipitous, and whoever leaps, leaps into an abyss. The facility with which a specific gratification may be procured is a main circumstance in giving impetuosity to sordid desires: for while it is difficulty that enhances the nobler passions, it is facility that enhances the baser. So, especially, does it happen with rancorous and vindictive emotions. Only allow them a ready means of reaching their consummation, and they rush on ungovernably. Now the peculiarity of the position which the religionist occupies, offers always to his hand the most tremendous missiles revenge can covet. On the field of common life many obstacles happily stand in the way to prevent the completion of an angry resolve:—the dark purpose of the moment postponed, dies away, and is forgotten. But it is not so in the spiritual world. The revenge which the irritated zealot meditates is ready—it is safe, and it is ample:—how then should it be foregone? He has only to mutter perdition—and the stab is given. A murky revenge analogous to this of the religionist has been common among barbarous and superstitious hordes. The malign sorcerer—intimate of demons, thinking himself full fraught with venom borrowed from the infernal world, is well content to dart a look only at his enemy; sure that the mere glance of the evil eye of hatred would in due time take effect—that the florid cheek must fade—the strength decay, and the victim fall.

Yet Conscience claims her hour with all men, even the most debauched; and it must especially be so with those whose habits make them conversant with the divine rule of morality. Such, although every day indulging the darkest malignity, are continually reading that "whosoever hateth his brother is not of God." They may abstain from distinctly bringing the criterion home upon themselves; and yet are fain to have recourse to pleas that are intended to parry the condemnatory inference from the rule. The pretexts of zeal are many:—and if, as we have seen, tormentors, murderers, devastators of kingdoms, can quote chapter and verse in justification of their barbarities, those who only curse, but do not kill their opponents, may easily do the same.

Many, as is evident from the peculiar character of their devotional sentiments, have taken a somewhat more circuitous, but a still more effectual method for lulling conscience, and for turning aside from themselves the rules of charity. This method has been (alas the inconsistencies of human nature!) so to cherish the fervours of piety, and so to straiten the pattern of their external behaviour, as should seem to remove all suspicion of the genuineness and elevation of their personal religion. By amassing to a prodigious height the evidences of sanctity, a commensurate licence has been obtained for the indulgence of hideous passions. A man who every day ascends the mount of ecstasy, and holds intimate converse with heaven, surely should not be called in question, when he comes down to earth, on account of an inexorable or vindictive temper! Examples of this very sort are abundant (and some have already been referred to) on the pages of Romish pietism; and we may find on the calendar men whose breath was pestilence, whose every word was a fiery bolt, persuading themselves and their admirers that they enjoyed celestial favours, such as Gabriel and Michael might envy! To assume that the accident of a protestant creed quite excludes any parallel enormity, were indeed to be blind. What we are now speaking of is—human nature, and the mysteries of its delusions; not the question of transubstantiation, or of the pope's pretensions.

Among those who make themselves conspicuous as the chiefs and leaders of the fanaticism of dogmas and creeds, many marked distinctions, arising from natural temper, might be pointed out; but it must suffice here to mention the two orders of character that stand foremost. These are—The Despotic and the Ambitious.

There have been Bajazets and Zingis Khans on the field where the quill is the only weapon that is wielded. But how difficult is it to analyse satisfactorily the emotions that constitute the lust of power where nothing that is secular or tangible—nothing that is intelligibly advantageous—nothing that makes a man richer or better, is to spring from the attainment of his purpose! While the earlier and immature stages of a dominant passion retain many alliances with other motives, and are found to be mixed up with various ingredients, so as to afford several points of connexion, whence they may easily be traced to their sources, and brought to view; it is the characteristic of the last stage of such passions that, having let go every such alliance, they become inexplicable, and defy scrutiny: a simple element admit of no analysis. The passion that has at length made itself exclusive master of the breast, closes the avenues, and enjoys its solitude. Thus it is with avarice. So long as any one purpose for which money avails is kept in view, we may conceive of the miser's avidity: but after every ordinary desire has been excluded and renounced, the love of hoarding can be described only as an insanity, to which it is vain to apply the principles of reason. When the wretch, shutting out the pleasures of life, its pride, and its hopes, clasps his shapeless bags as a sovereign good—we lose hold of him—the last link of human sympathy is snapt, and he seems to go adrift from his species.

A similar mystery belongs to the lust of power in those cases where it prevails exclusively of the hope of secular or palpable benefits accruing to the individual. The passion which leads a man to subjugate kingdoms is intelligible; but how shall we explain the feeling that makes a man pant to bring the realms of mind under bondage, and when it is not himself that is to enjoy the homage of the vanquished world? Now it is a curious fact, that the individuals who have exhibited in the extremest degree this species of insatiable arrogance have themselves occupied a subaltern position in the hierarchy or polity to which they rendered their services; and have not shown any very active personal ambition, as if the attainment of visible supremacy had been their ultimate motive.

Minds in an eminent degree fervent and energetic never occupy the common ground of vulgar interests: their native region is a higher one—or a lower; and although they may seem to be busy, and perhaps are so, with the ordinary concerns that fall under their management, these palpable elements are but so many ciphers of a more important intellectual process that is going on: the matters handled are dice, by means of which a great game is played. Such spirits, conversing with the ideal rather than with the actual world, see every thing in symbol. The revolutions and advancements, the perils or the increase of a hierarchy, mean, to such, more than can be given account of in common modes of computation. While the poet descries on the face of nature the types of a world of unsullied beauty, and while the metaphysician gathers from the things around him nothing but abstract truth, there is a class of men whose conceptions of ideal perfection turn upon order—government, and the unison of wills. Add to this peculiar intellectual taste a haughty asperity of temper, and bring the individual to his position within some vast edifice of despotism; and he will exhibit the singular passion we are speaking of. Or shall we adduce an actual instance, and name the learned, irascible, dogmatic Jerom? All his great merits duly admitted,* and in truth Jerom stands unrivalled in his age, both for accomplishments and force of intellect, it can yet be no injustice thus to point him out as a proper specimen of that theological despotic temper, which, irrespectively of personal advantages or aggrandizement, impels a man to refuse to others the liberty of thought and utterance, and which would, if it were possible, impose eternal silence upon the world of mind—so that all should bow, not indeed to himself, but to the authentic standard of belief which he admires and defends.

With the fairest opportunities again and again presented to him of ascending to whatever position he might please of ecclesiastical greatness, and of grasping the fattest things of the Church, this extraordinary man broke away from the world, and from the pontifical court, and freely, and without affectation, took up his abode in a narrow cell at Bethlehem.† If at length a little sphere of personal influence gathered about him, it was by no efforts of his own that he thus came to be courted as chief of a community.‡ Jerom was, in the most complete sense—an intellectualist: it cost him nothing to tread the pomps of the world under foot. Few perhaps have relished with a keener taste the delights of a literary course. Upon the books and parchments that crammed his cloister he gazed, pen in hand, with fond and greedy satisfaction; the king of Babylon looking down from his gardens upon the gilded roofs of palaces, all his own, might have thought himself less happy.§

Yet Jerom wanted, not only the serenity of the Christian temper, which may render a man happy in seclusion, though conscious of powers that might enable him to shine in the first ranks of life; but even that philosophic placidity which belongs to the genuine lover of physical or abstruse science. He was the Theologue—and the word is designation enough. So long as there might be heard, from any quarter of the wide world, a dissentient whisper—a breath of opposition to the authentic decisions of the Church, no rest could be enjoyed, and no mercy could be shown: the gainsayer must be crushed. "Never have I spared the heretic," is the boast of this doctor, "but have always reckoned and treated the enemies of the Church as my own."*

None could dispute Jerom's merit in this instance.† Was there any where displayed a disposition to call in question, even in the most modest style, the immaculate creed or the faultless usages of the Church? Jerom started up from his pallet, and with the iron rod of his merciless eloquence pursued the offender from side to side of the empire; from Egypt to Britain; from Syria to Spain; from Numidia to Gaul.‡ It is edifying to follow this defender of a perfect Church on those peculiar occasions in which the whole forces of his mind are employed—not to sustain some one of the capital principles of faith—nor some article of discipline apparently good and sanatory; but a confessed and egregious abuse; an abuse against which moderate and reasonable men had already raised their voices; an abuse to which public opinion was then actually administering a partial remedy; an abuse moreover, which presently afterwards the very chiefs of the Church themselves found they could no longer uphold, and were compelled to denounce. It appears that scandalous irregularities had long attended the nocturnal services, or vigils, with which certain festivals were honoured. Yes; but the usage was "a venerable" one; it had been authenticated:—The Church—the Church approved it:—popes pronounced it good: but more than all, a bold and contumacious dissident had come forward to impugn it. The night vigils therefore, with all their debaucheries, were to be valiantly maintained, and maintained too by the most inexorable ascetic of the age! Amazing solecism! this doctor, who would himself cheerfully have burned rather than sanction the marriage of a priest, is now heard pouring execrations upon an opponent whose extent of crime was to assert on the one hand the lawfulness of clerical matrimony, and to deny on the other the expediency of promiscuous nocturnal assemblages in churches!§

Athanasius, with a magnanimity that has extorted praise even from Gibbon, suffering, preaching and writing in defence of a doctrine that constituted the very foundation of the Christian system, is well entitled to indulgence if at any time the heat or the anxieties of a momentous controversy lead him into intemperance of language. But what indulgence can be due to the despotic Jerom, whose arrogance bursts all bounds on an occasion in which a wise man would either have silently listened to rebuke, or have candidly and openly admitted the propriety and seasonableness of his opponent's objection?

An important lesson might be gathered from a review of the circumstances of each of the controversies in which this learned writer engaged; but we must at least pause a moment upon the one carried on against first, Jovinian, and then Vigilantius.‖

If any such exchange were practicable, we might well consent to throw into the gulf of oblivion one of the most vo-

* The power of miracles was not reckoned among this saint's endowments, and it is singular that few men of superior understanding made any boast of the sort. Erasmus balances the disparagement ingeniously:—Quod si cui nihil absque miraculorum portentis placere potest, is legat Hieronymianos libros, in quibus tot pene miracula sunt, quod sententiæ. No attention is due to a spurious Life of Jerom, in which miraculous powers are largely claimed for him.

† Jerom's accomplished biographer (above quoted), will not allow the stupid monks of his own age to suppose that this illustrious man—monk as he is called—led a life in any sense like their own—cæremoniis obstrictam. And he subjoins an animated description of the ancient monastic institute—its liberty, its elevation, its purity. Such, we grant, it might be when a Basil or Jerom presided; but assuredly not so when the feeble and the fanatical were left to themselves. Let Palladius bear witness.

‡ Though ordained Presbyter, and nominally charged, as Sulpitius testifies (Dialog. I.), with the care of the Church of Bethlehem; he held office under the stipulation that he should not be burdened with the pastoral duties. His only external care seems to have been that of the consciences of the ladies who put their spiritual interests under his direction. Of the mode in which he acquitted himself of this duty the Epistles to Marcella, Eustochium, Paula, &c. give evidence. It should be added that not the slightest suspicion attaches to Jerom in these instances. Those who would indulge railleries on the occasion prove that they judge of the characters of men by the rule of their own vulgar knowledge of human nature.

§ A great part of his patrimony Jerom expended in the collection of a library, which his writings prove to have included the principal literature of the age. These, purchased at Rome and in Egypt, he carried with him when the second time he abandoned public life and retired to Bethlehem.

* Procem. adversus Pelagianos.

† Erasmus in one place seems to deny Jerom's acerbity of temper, and appeals to certain mild expostulatory epistles addressed to his friends. But the proof of a man's disposition is to be gathered from his behaviour towards his enemies. Yet the same writer on another occasion says, speaking of his controversial and apologetical pieces—In utroque vehemens et acer Hieronymus, ut nonnullis parum memor Christianæ modestiæ videri possit. But, says he, it is not to be wondered at that a man of so pure and holy a life should show some impatience toward gainsayers.

‡ He protests however that it was Error, not Men, that he hated. Aut certe, si in errore voluerint permanere, non nostram culpam esse, qui scripsimus, sed eorum, &c. His opponents attributed the warmth of his zeal to envy—Ego solus sum, qui cunctorum gloria mordear: et tam miser, ut his quoque invideam, qui non merentur invidiam!

§ The candle-light processions and nocturnal services which formed part of the ceremonial of the Church, were, like very many of its pomps and superstitions, adaptations only of idolatrous practices which it was found more easy to transmute than to abrogate. The Paschal vigils were the Thesmophoria, under a change of names. Who shall say whether decency has been most violated by the worshippers of Ceres, or the observers of candlemas! The derivation of the nocturnal illuminations from Egypt to the Grecian worship, and the adoption of the custom by the church, is traced at length by Ciampinus, Vetera Monimenta, Pars I. p. 190. Eusebius tells us that splendid illuminations were employed by Constantine as a means of bringing over the populace of Byzantium to Christianity.

‖ Jerom does not abstain from the pun which the name of his opponent so naturally suggests.—"Vigilantius? no, call him rather Dormitantius."

luminous of the Fathers—even Jerom himself, as the price of recovering an authentic statement of the opinions and arguments of these two early dissidents, of whom in fact we can now learn nothing more trustworthy than what a good catholic of Spain or Ireland may know of the doctrines of Luther and Calvin by the favour of his priest. That they were men of unblemished faith and piety, as well as of vigorous understanding, cannot be absolutely ascertained, nor are even their specific opinions to be clearly determined. Contumelious exaggeration swells every sentence of the passages in which their opponents depict them.* It may however be inferred pretty clearly that the one, as well as the other, inveighed against each of the principal superstitions of the times;—especially against the vow of virginity, and the merits of monkery—the mediation of saints—the worship of relics, and the usage of promiscuous vigils. It seems also that the absolving power assumed by the clergy, and the secular usurpations of the hierarchy were called in question by them. No valid suspicion attaches to the proper orthodoxy of these men;† but it is plain that the assault they made, though directed against single points only, or adjuncts of the faith and practice of the Church, involved inseparably the fate of the entire edifice of Religion—religion such as doctors and monks have made it. Every thing must have fallen to the ground—the polity, the creeds, the power of Rome, the monasteries: not a stone could have been left upon another, if Jovinian and Vigilantius had succeeded in awakening the people of Christendom from their trance, and had brought emperors and secular men of rank to listen to them favourably. Had these Reformers led back the minds of men to the Scriptures, and to the simplicity of faith and the soundness of morality—the horrors of more than a thousand years of superstition might have been saved.

Alas! another destiny awaited the nations. The Church had reached, at the close of the fourth century, the edge of a steep; but it yet stood upon ground whence a return was practicable. Learning and intelligence were widely diffused; and of the aliment of knowledge there was no dearth: a seal had not yet been set upon the volume of Scripture. The separate existence and independence of the Eastern and Western—the Greek and the Latin Churches, secured, or might have secured, an asylum to liberty. Indications too may be discerned of the fact, that although high personages and dignitaries and eloquent writers, held together, and understood their common interest, there were individuals—perhaps multitudes, who were far from assenting to the superstitions of the age, and who, with the scriptures in their hands, dared to doubt, though hardly to speak or act.‡

The regeneration of the Church was in that age hypothetically possible, and actually attempted; yet it utterly failed. The men whose intelligence and expansion of mind should have taught them to listen to reproof, and who should have entertained—if it had been but for a moment, the suspicion that the course of things might be unsafe—these, with a headlong intemperance, rushed upon the objectors, and triumphed. Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerom, the three illustrious leaders of the age, joined their giant strength, and gave to the Church the plunge which sent it down to the abyss. Whatever of degrading superstition, whatever of sanguinary fanaticism, whatever folly, whatever corruption, whatever cruelty belonged to the religious condition of Europe under the sway of Hildebrand, may be assigned (as a true consequence) to the part taken and the course pursued by the great men we have named: the fate of mankind through a long night of ignorance and malign tyranny was sealed when Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerom, combined to crush dissent.

Shall we apportion the blame among the three? If it were attempted to do so, a distinction, often requisite, must be made between personal criminality, and the actual ill consequence of a fatal course of conduct; for while it is Jerom who must bear almost alone the blame of indulging a despotic and malignant temper, it was the opposite qualities of Augustine—his mildness and his piety, that gave to his influence a permanent efficacy. Mankind would have sickened at the arrogance of the one, if the other had not stood by his side. The bishop of Milan perhaps should take station between the two.*

Fanaticism, as we assume, combines always malign and imaginative sentiments, and in some instances the former, in others the latter, predominate. Thus, in the case of the despotic champion of existing establishments, the darker ingredient prevails over the brighter, or quite excludes it. But with the ambitious propagator of novel dogmas, or the factious chief of a sect, the imaginative element is ordinarily paramount; and it is not until after the temper has been impaired by exposure to irritation that the irascible and vindictive passions take the lead in the character. The religious demagogue is at first an Enthusiast only, and rises to fanaticism upon the winds of strife. Moreover the natural progression of his sentiments involves another unfavourable turn; for the public course he pursues, and the emergencies which, as head of a party, he encounters, present many occasions wherein neither his enthusiasm nor his fanaticism—neither poetry nor tragedy, will bear him clear of the perplexing embarrassments that surround him. He has recourse therefore to guile; and from that fatal moment every sentiment assumes a new relative position, or itself undergoes transformation. It is as when a single drop of some potent essence is suffused in a chemical compound; what just before was colourless, or of a brilliant hue, is now, and in a moment, turgid; the splendour of the rainbow is gone; an earthly feculence clouds the liquor; heat too is evolved, and noxious fumes rise from the surface.

The despot remains nearly the same from the commencement to the close of his career; for pride and hatred are steady qualities, and arrogance is stagnant. But the demagogue, or factious leader, passes through three stages of character at least; and when he come to the goal is often hardly to be recognized as the being who started. The despot, too, is very nearly thes ome personage under every diversity of ecclesiastical system. But the sectarist or schismatic receives a specific character from the circumstances that surround him, and from the qualities of the body from which he breaks off. This accidental influence may be either for the worse or the better; and in truth when the body is in an extreme degree corrupt, and the objection insisted upon by the separatist is in the main reasonable, we cannot be justified on the ground merely of some extravagance or vehemence of conduct, to designate the objector as a fanatic. A man who takes up a righteous cause may speak or act fanatically, and yet well deserve our respect and gratitude. He alone should be called fanatic, whose course of conduct was at first prompted by impetuous passions; and who throughout it, shrinks from the calm ordeal of reason.

Protestantism has been reproached on account of its fruitfulness in factions: the same reproach unquestionably attaches, and in an equal degree, to the ancient Church, and especially in the era of its highest secular prosperity. But the Church of Rome boasts of her unity; and she may be allowed to do so. Not now to mention the terrible means she has employed to quash rising schism, we should bear in mind that main principle of her polity which has left a wide field

* Ais Vigilantius os fœtidum rursus aperire, et putorem spurcissimum contra sanctorum martyrum proferre reliquias.

† Jerom, in his Catalogue of Church Writers, assigns Vigilantius a place among heretics, only on the ground of his opposition to the points above mentioned: had his orthodoxy been assailable, there is no doubt we should have heard of his delinquency.

‡ The frequency and the seriousness of Augustine's references to the heresy of Jovinian prove that it had spread to an alarming extent: the same may be gathered from the anxiety of Jerom. The former, De Bono Conjugali, and Retract. b. ii. c. 22, says—Joviniani hæresis sacrarum virginum meritum æquando pudicitiæ conjugali tantum valuit in urbe Roma, ut nonnullas etiam sanctimoniales, de quarum pudicitia suspicio nulla præcesserat, dejecisse in nuptias diceretur. Although repressed by the Church, the monstrous doctrine continued, it is added, to be whispered and insinuated during several years. Jovinian himself was exiled to the island of Boa—a rock on the Illyrian coast, where he died:—such was the tolerance of the fourth century!

* Jerom had much more to do with these dissidents than either Ambrose or Augustine. The bishop of Milan, in an epistle to pope Syricius, reporting the result of a council of seven or eight bishops, held there for the condemnation of certain heretics, assures his holiness of their perfect concurrence with the papal court:—Jovinianum, &c. &c. quos Sanctitas Tua damnavit, sciasapud nos quoque, secundum judicium tuum, esse damnatos. All were no better than Manichees, whose impious doctrine—clementissimus exsecratus est imperator (Theodosius)—and whose sectators had been expelled from Milan.

The allusions made by Augustine to Jovinian are in a somewhat better style; and it appears from them that his opinion was formed upon hearsay. See De Pec. Merit. et remis. b. iii. c. 7, and De Nupt. b. ii. c. 5; where we learn that Jovinian had first dared to call Ambrose—Manichee—the common epithet then of theological contempt, and flung from side to side like Methodist or Calvinist. Taking Augustine's own account of the matter, as stated a little further on, in the same treatise, it must be granted that Jovinian had some reason on his side when he charged the Church with favouring Manichæism by her idolatry of virginity. To the same purport see Contra duas epist. Pelag. b. i. c. 1. Contra Julian. b. i. c. 2.

open always to spiritual enterprise and ambition. Protestant Churches have failed to calculate upon certain unalterable tendencies of human nature, and have made no provision for giving vent to exuberant zeal. The very same minds which, during the first four centuries, or among ourselves, would have headed a faction, and given their name to a hostile and separate communion, have, under the fostering care of the Papacy, lent their extravagance to the Church itself, and have proved its most efficient supporters.

Either as Founder of a new order, or as Regenerator of an old one, energetic and ungovernable spirits saw before them at all times an open field. It is true that a curbing hand was held by the popes upon this species of ambition; yet the restraint was not more than enough to enhance, by difficulty, the passion for enterprise. The young and frenzied devotee, after astounding the monasteries of his native province by unheard-of severities—by portentous whims—by wastings, whippings, visions, ecstacies; and after imposing upon his superiors an unfeigned terror by turbulences of behaviour—always thoroughly catholic, and therefore so much the more difficult to be dealt with, obtained their ready leave (with flaming credentials in his hand) to beg his way bare-foot from Spain, France, or Germany, to Rome. At the foot of the Sovereign Pontiff he threw himself in the dust—prostrate, body and soul:—there he wept and raved his season:—already he had vowed himself the "dauntless Chevalier of the Virgin," and only waited permission to fight her battles, and those of the Church, under sanction of its Head. During the weeks or months of suspense, his austerities and his pretensions roused a hundred jealousies among the comers and goers of the papal court: feuds and seditions made a perpetual din under the windows of the Vatican; and it seemed as if all the demons had flocked together to thwart if possible the holy purpose of the new adventurer, from whose hand they expected many a terrible buffet. At length the Holy See, having proved the constancy of the candidate; or shall we rather say, having ascertained that his frenzy was of the sort which, though it might be managed, could not be repressed, and glad to rid itself of the importunity, granted the desired sanction, and signed the Brief.*

The Founder or the Reformer, now big with a licence that would reach all extents of absurdity, paced his way back—patrician mendicant! to his native mountains. Monasteries spring up about him in each cleft of the rocks:—his rule attracts every moon-stricken brain of the province; and in a year or two he moves about, the admired patron of insanity—far and near. Such, in substance, has been the history of scores of adventurers who, had it been their ill luck to be born on protestant ground, could have done nothing more illustrious than give an ignoble name to an ignoble sect—have troubled their own age by angry divisions, and have conferred upon three centuries after them, the burden of some hard-to-be-uttered epithet of faction.

Deprived of its monkish apparatus (considered only as a means of drawing off restless ambition) the Romish hierarchy could not have stood its ground so long. Only let us follow up to its consequences the supposition that it had had, age after age, to contend with the dauntless spirits that originated or restored the several orders—with St. Dominic, and St. Francis; with St. Bernard, with Loyola, and with De Rance; in that case it had long ago been rent and scattered to the winds.

So far as considerations of this sort should be allowed to influence spiritual affairs, the question would deserve to be entertained, Whether a permanent and readily available provision should not be made within the arms of a protestant church for giving a range to those extraordinary dispositions and talents which in all times make their appearance, and which, if not preoccupied, do not fail grievously to trouble the community that neglects them.

Fanaticism, we have said, has first an active or turbulent, and then a settled and moderated form; for that which begins with inflammatory symptoms, subsides into a chronic derangement. In its earlier state it attaches chiefly to minds of inferior quality; but in its latter it insidiously invades the most generous, vigorous, and accomplished; and from these it draws a thousand recommendations that ensure to it credit and perpetuity. So was it (as we have seen) with the frenzy of asceticism, which, after raging among the vulgar—the Anthonys and the Symeons of Egypt and Syria, became epidemic in the high places of the Church, and overpowered the sense and piety of Basil, Gregory, Chrysostom, Jerom. So again the fanatic cruelty of intolerance, at first entertained only by the basest natures, crept at length upon the noble; and a Ximenes is seen to take up the tools of a Torquemada. And so with the fanaticism of religious war; where Peter the Hermit and Walter the Pennyless led the way, Godfrey and Louis follow, with Bernard as their guide.

The very same kind of progression has had place, and even with worse consequences, in the history of the Fanaticism of dogmas and creeds. The authors and prime agitators of controversy—the men whose plebeian names descend as an obloquy to after ages, have (with a few exceptions) possessed but a poor title to celebrity; and, apart from the turbulence of their tempers, or their insatiable ambition, could never have attracted the attention of mankind. But the agitation so engendered spreads; and at length none can well avoid ranging themselves on this side or on that of the question: great talents and solid virtues are drawn into the vortex; and so it happens that, while the ostensible mischiefs of strife—the rancour and the violence of the feud are moderated, its essential evils are deepened, and rendered permanent. A christian country, or a community, is in this manner cast into a factious condition, and in that state abides age after age.—But factious religionism, how much soever it may have been tamed and curbed, will not fail to be encircled by wide spread impiety, and infidelity, as the direct effects of the scandal of division. Factions, moreover, benumb the expansive powers of Christianity, and prevent its spread. They create too a universal confusion, entanglement, and perversion of religious notions. No inquiry can be calmly prosecuted, no results of solitary meditation can be safely reported, nothing can be looked at in its native form, so long as the jealousies and the interests of eight or ten ancient and corporate factions spread themselves over the field of theology. Even those few insulated articles of Christian belief or speculation, or of abstruse science, which have not been claimed by party zeal, are often found to alarm the wakeful fears of this or that guardian of sectarism, merely because the method of argument which may have been employed in such instances, is foreseen to have a bearing upon matters that are to be held inviolable. The opinion in itself may be innocent enough; but the logic that sustains it is dangerous. Better then quash at once the suspicious novelty, which, though it may be good and true, is not momentous, than favour it, and so open the door to no one can say what innovations!

So poor, so timid, so feeble, so inert, so grovelling, so infatuated is the human mind! Truth, which alone can be permanently advantageous, and which alone can reward labour or compensate losses, is looked at and listened to with eagle-eyed alarm; nor is entertained until she has protested, ten times over, that she means to rob us of nothing we dote upon.

Less than two hundred years ago—even so late as the close of the seventeenth century, this very same sectarian infatuation, this fanaticism of the creed and symbol, enthralled the physical and abstruse sciences, throughout Europe. No process of nature, no mechanic law, could be investigated or discussed apart from the interference of the fierce jealousies of rival schools. A chemical mixture could not change from blue to red, from transparent to opaque—an apple could not fall to the ground, nay, the planets might not swing through their orbits, without kindling angry feuds in colleges. Not only was the method of obtaining knowledge utterly misunderstood; but it was not believed, or not felt, that Knowledge is always the friend of man, and his coadjutor; Error his ene-

* The career of Ignatius Loyola combines, in the most complete manner, all the proper elements of ambitious sectarian fanaticism; and a well written life of this illustrious founder might subserve other purposes than that of exhibiting the folly, knavery, and superstition, that are encouraged by the papacy. We much need—protestants as we are, to have placed before us, and for our instruction, those vivid instances of delusion and extravagance which the annals of the Romish Church so abundantly furnish. Whoever has closely and calmly watched the growth and maturity of fanatical illusion in the case of certain noted individuals that still figure on the stage of ghostly ambition, must have become convinced that nothing but accidents and names—costume and phrase, often distinguishes canonized from uncanonized heroes. Might it be hoped that the parties themselves, or at least their well-read chiefs, would look into the glass of history, and catching there their own resemblances, draw an inference of incalculable importance! Would any one who retains a particle of good sense or sober Christian feeling wish to find that his public course has been, in its essential motives, and in very many of its circumstances, the counterpart of that of men whose names are signalized as the spiritual fathers of innumerable cruelties, impostures, and corruptions? Let Gonzales and Ribadeneira be read and digested by any who, while panting for the notoriety of miracle, are forgetting truth, honour, reason, faith, virtue.

my. This degraded condition of the human mind was at last remedied by nothing but the bringing to bear upon the METAPHYSIC-PHYSICS of Des Cartes and Aristotle, a method of reasoning so absolutely conclusive that resistance was found to be useless. Prejudice and antiquated jealousy did not freely yield themselves up and dissolve:—they were undermined, they fell in, and were seen no more.

This deliverance of Philosophy—a very recent deliverance, though effected within a particular precinct of inquiry only, rapidly extended itself over the entire field of the sciences. Whether or not immediate success attended the pursuit of knowledge, every thing was scouted but its attainment. The scientific community blushed at the fond folly of ranging itself under rival leaders;—it coalesced as one body or phalanx, advancing under one banner.

Can it be conceived of as a thing even possible that pure reason should have had sway in philosophy so long as the interests of sects were to be cared for? Those two powers, Truth and Party, were not in fact contemporary scarcely a year: or contemporary only as Night and Day are so, through the hasty moments of twilight. Indeed the mere existence of factions in any department of opinion, is a conclusive proof that the method of inquiry, in that department, has not yet been found; or at least is not generally understood.

Causes which need hardly be specified, have hitherto excluded from the precincts of Theology the reform that has spread through every department of natural science. The dogmatic fanaticism which raged at the time of the Reformation, passed down uncorrected upon the political and ecclesiastical constitutions of the northern nations of Europe, and especially upon those of England, and it now firmly grasps the religious commonwealth. The violence of religious strife has indeed long died away; or it breaks out only for a moment; but no relief has yet been administered to the settled ill consequences of that delirium. So far as we are religious at all, the English people is a nation of sects, and our theology is necessarily the theology of faction. Not a false theology—thank God; but a theology that is confused, entangled, and imperfect, gloomy; a theology which, while it abundantly breeds infidelity among the educated classes, fails to spread through the body of the population, and but dimly, or only as a flickering candle, illumines the world.

The recent consolidation of religious liberty, while it may fairly be hailed as an auspicious event, and likely to bring about at length the disappearance of faction, is utterly misunderstood by those who regard it as equivalent to the emancipation of Christianity. Far from being the same thing, this overthrow of ecclesiastical despotism has, in its immediate effects, as was natural, highly inflamed the sectarian sentiment, or has given it a new birth. The exultation of the triumphant party, and the discontent of the defeated party, have, in different modes, infused an energy into the virulence of both, which seems not unlikely to prolong the existence of our absurd divisions, perhaps a fifty years.

A happier destiny may sooner break upon us! But whether it does or not, it is certain that an unobtrusive power has been some while at work beneath the entire ground of our sectarian edifices—a power which must (unless arrested) inevitably in the end bring them down to the abyss. The philosophy of the schools sunk to rise no more when the true method of science gained its first indisputable triumph. But although the same method is not formally applicable to theology, yet the principle of it is so, and is actually in its incipient stage of application—or perhaps has gone a step beyond that stage.* The art of criticism and the true logic of Interpretation must restore to the church (under that guidance which is never denied when ingenuously sought) the pure meaning of Scripture. The charm that cements petty communions will then dissolve; the excellence of Truth will be felt, and the fanaticism of dogmas will die away, when all men learn to hold in contempt every thing in religion, but the ascertained sense of God's Revelation. Diversities of opinion must indeed remain so long as there are differences of intellectual and moral power; but these will engender no heat, and will produce no divisions, when all minds shall be moving on toward one and the same centre.

It would not have been anticipated as possible, that among those who reverenced the Scriptures, a superstition such as that of the papacy should at all have had existence. But history, in two many instances, and in this, contradicts reasonable calculations, and shows that the perversity of man may thwart every beneficient provision of heaven. In like manner it might have been thought that the internal constitution of the Inspired Volume, as well as its express precepts, would have precluded the factions that have rent the Church in every age. It has not been so; nevertheless this internal constitution well deserves our attention. It is only while we distinctly regard it that we can see in a proper light the folly of those disorders which fill out the volume of Church history.

Let it then be assumed that two main purposes were to be secured in giving a written rule of faith to mankind, namely, first, an infallible conveyance of that PRINCIPAL SENSE of Revelation which is essential to genuine piety; and secondly, such a conveyance of the ADJUNCTIVE or secondary portions of religious truth as should render despotic determinations on the one side, and scrupulous schisms on the other, manifestly unreasonable. We have to see in what manner both these ends are provided for by the actual constitution of the canon of Scripture.

It is saying little to affirm that no composition, whether historical or didactic (if the language in which it is written be understood) fails to convey to readers of ordinary intelligence the Principal Intention of the writer, unless indeed he himself be wanting in sense, or designedly conceals his meaning under ambiguous or enigmatic terms. This is plainly implied when it is granted that language is a good and sufficient means of communication between mind and mind. To affirm any thing less were to stultify humanity, and to break up and derange the entire machinery of the social system. All men might as well become anchorets at once, if indeed language is found to be a fallacious medium of intellectual exchange.

And what is true of oral communication, is true also (with a very small deduction) of written communication. Moreover what may be affirmed concerning the written conveyance of thoughts among contemporaries, becomes liable only to an inconsiderable discount, when we have to do with the writings of past ages. This discount is much reduced if the composition in question forms part of a vast collection of contemporary literature. As it is certain that men must be fools or knaves when permanent misunderstandings arise among them in regard to the main intention of their personal communications; so is it certain that the principal scope of a book, ancient or modern, is always to be known where both writer and reader are ingenuous.

Nothing less then than an extreme perversity of judgment, such as renders the powers of language nugatory, can, in any case, give rise an entire misunderstanding of an author's principal sense. Admit only these ordinary conditions—that the writer was honest and of sound mind—that he was master of the language he employs, and that he made it his serious business to convey to his reader in the best way he could, certain capital articles of information—historical or moral, and then it follows, without an exceptive case, that his meaning on those prime articles is readily attainable by whoever himself owns common sense and a competent acquaintance with the writer's langüge. To take apart, for example, any one of the canonical writers, it is absolutely certain that the leading facts or dogmas which he means to teach, stand upon the surface of his composition. Has disagreement arisen in regard to these main facts or dogmas?—

* Many more talk of the Baconian method than seem to be masters of it; or than have probably ever read ten pages of the Novum Organon. The assertion may be hazarded that, even in the walks of physical science, multitudes of those who are pretty well versed in the actual products of the modern philosophy, have not a conception of the principle of investigation as set on foot by Bacon. This ignorance is still more prevalent on the side of Intellectual, Ethical, and Theological Science. To speak only of the latter, it is deemed a thoroughly Baconian process to adduce, in series, all the texts that bear upon a certain article of faith, and at the end to sum up the evidence. This is called Induction. But now if we look a little closely to the method and principle of interpretation, as applied to each passage, we shall find that the prime maxim of the dogmatic and scholastic divinity, which demands that every thing should be judged of according to THE ANALOGY OF FAITH, and nothing admitted which cannot be reconciled thereto, or which may by inference give countenance to a known heresy, rules throughout. This surely is not to learn from prophets and apostles, but to teach them; and it is precisely the method which swayed so long the dark realms of pseudo-philosophy. In theology we have the forms of the inductive method often where there is little or nothing of its substance. A good work would it be to deduce from the Novum Organon those capital and universal principles which are indeed applicable to Intellectual and Sacred Science. Etiam dubitavit quispiam potius quam objiciet, utrum nos de naturali tantum Philosophia, an etiam de Scientiis reliquis, Logicis, Ethicis, Politicis, secundum viam nostram perficiendis loquamur. AT NOS CERTE, DE UNIVERSIS HÆC, QUÆ DICTA SUNT, INTELLIGIMUS.

On the ground of the admitted principles of language and of historic evidence, any one of the Gospels, with the Acts, and any one of the larger epistles, would amply and indubitably have handed down to us the SUBSTANCE of apostolic Christianity. If it be not so—a thousand tomes cannot do it. If it be not so, we might stand by with indifference and see another Amrou throwing his brand upon a pyre that should contain every existing relic of antiquity.

But the Divine indulgence has far exceeded necessary bounds in affording to mankind the materials of sacred knowledge. No parsimony is to be complained of on the part of the Instructor: nothing is wanted but ingenuousness in the scholar. The great articles of belief and duty have come to us through the instrumentality of nearly forty writers, to each of whom was allowed his entire and undisturbed mental individuality—his personal temper and taste, his own stlye, both of sentiment and of language, together with whatever speciality, either of sentiment or of language, he might draw from the influence of time and country. Each writer, while the track of his thoughts is steered by an unseen hand, moves on in a spontaneous course. Can any provision be added to this arrangement which should promise to exclude the possibility of a failure in transmitting the elements of religious knowledge? Let it be imagined that, out of the forty, two or three, or even seven, were obscure, abrupt, elliptical, mystic: yet all will not be so: for one whose style is emblematic or difficult, there will (on common principles of probability) be five that are natural and perspicuous.

But we have asked for another security against failure in the conveyance of the main points of religion; and we find it in the fact that this congeries of witnesses has been drawn, not from one century, but from the course of fifteen. Whatever diversity time can impart is by this means included—so broad is the base of that pyramid which was to stand through all ages, pointing man to the skies! Are we then to be told that what prophets and apostles believed, and what they taught to their contemporaries, and what they intended to transmit to posterity, comes down to us under an impenetrable obscurity? No miracle would be so hard of belief as this.

It need not be added that the correlative security of ancient versions and interpretations, in endless abundance and variety, surrounds these documents of our faith, and every way precludes the chances of capital error in relation to the principal sense of the whole.

There is an infirmity of the mind which impels us, on many occasions, to overlook or distrust those special circumstances whereon our welfare really depends, while we anxiously search for provisions of safety that either are utterly unattainable, or that would be pernicious if possessed. How often have feeble minds (and perhaps some strong minds) wished that a perpetual miraculous interposition had been accorded, such as should have exempted the Inspired Writings from the accidents and ordinary conditions that attend other compositions, and that affect ancient literature in the course of its transmission from age to age. Given at first by supernatural means—why has it not been accompanied and preserved by miracle through the periods of its descent to our times?

Need we reply—because it is from these very diparagements (if such they should be deemed), that are to be gathered the best evidences of the genuineness of the document itself. And it might be added—because the accidental difficulties or obscurities that belong to the Scriptures in common with all other literary remains of antiquity, have a direct tendency (if we will but admit it) to disturb and put to shame the senseless superstition—the doting upon particles, and worshipping of iotas, which makes duty and faith to hang upon this or that etymology or syllable.*

Of all impracticable miracles (if the solecism may be pardoned), the most impracticable and inconceivable would be that which should exempt a mass of ancient writing from those accidents whence ambiguity or difficulty of interpretation, in single instances, arises. Any such interposition, to have been effectual, must not only have extended through the original document, imparting to each sentence, phrase and word, an insulated perfection, and imbuing each verse with a sort of phosphorescence; but must have pervaded all times and places, guiding the hand of every drowsy copyist, and inspiring every translator. Nor would even this have been enough; for the miracle, to have subserved any practical purpose, must have reached as well to the reader of Scripture, as to the writers and transcribers:—all minds must have enjoyed the very same measure of native power—must have possessed the same preparatory knowledge, the same simplicity of purpose, the same temper, industry and power of retention. First the book a perpetual miracle; and then every reader a prophet! The simpler method surely would have been for a voice to have sounded incessantly from the sky, repeating every hour the monotony of truth!

The Divine machinery is of another sort; and our gratitude, informed by reason, should follow the steps of that wisdom which adapts common instruments as well to extraordinary as to ordinary occasions; and so adapts them, as to include various ends in one and the same system of means.

Do we possess the rational satisfaction of perusing the history of our Lord's ministry in the words of four writers? Yes, but this important advantage is taxed with the inconvenience (if such it be) of presenting frequent diversities of circumstance, order and phraseology. Now can we really wish that the evangelic records had been so exempted from the operation of ordinary causes as would have been requisite for excluding every diversity? Are we willing that these, the most important of all historical compositions, should forfeit the special characteristics that mark them as original and genuine writings, for the sake of our being saved the infirm disquietudes of a superstitious temper? Those who will, with a blind and perilous pertinacity, rest their belief upon a verbal exactitude, meet a proper rebuke when they find that evangelists and apostles, with the freedom that is natural to truth and honesty, are negligent of matters that in no way affect the vast affairs committed to their trust. If critics are sometimes frivolous, the Apostles were no triflers.

Who—or who that understands and respects the laws of testimony, does not gladly turn from secondary evidence, though more methodical and perspicuous, to original evidence, even though charged, as it almost always is when genuine, with incompleteness in the details, with apparent inconsistencies, and with a hundred unexplained allusions? The compiler of history is an INTERPRETER of the story: not so the contemporary and original narrator of facts, who seldom or never turns aside from the vivid objects that fill his mind, to provide for the ignorance, or to prevent the cavils of posterity. Unless we be slaves of superstition, we shall then hail with pleasure those very imperfections (imperfections they are not) which mark the canonical books—historical, didactic and epistolatory, as unquestionably genuine. Thankfully shall we embrace those obscurities which are the seal of truth. Deprived of its difficulties, every well informed mind would be staggered in admitting the Bible to be what it professes.

And yet from this distinctive glory of the documents of our religion are drawn, by the superstition and the overweening dogmatism of zealots, endless occasions of strife. That abrupt form which belongs to original evidence, is a rock whereon wranglers of every age have split. Some usage—some circumstance or ceremonial, infinitely trivial, but which a compiler of history might probably have supplied or ex-

* It is perhaps quite unnecessary to point out the conspicuous distinction between an overweening zeal for this or that interpretation of single passages or phrases—and the laudable endeavour of the critic to ascertain, first, the real text of an inspired writer; and then the actual sense in which his words were understood by the persons to whom they were addressed. We have affirmed above, that the Scriptures, like all other rational compositions, will not fail to convey their principal sense to every ingenuous mind, if the language in which they were written is really and fully known to the reader. Now the important labours of the Biblical critic are directed to this very purpose of putting the modern reader (so far as is possible) into the position of the ancient reader. Dogmatic interpretation should not—cannot reasonably commence, until the language, with all its essential proprieties, is brought under our familiar cognizance. If there be any usage of words, any principle of construction, any special sense of terms, the knowledge of which is important to an exact grammatical rendering of the sacred text, the utmost diligence should be employed in fixing beyond doubt the rule, with its exceptions. When erudition has done its utmost on such occasions, it has done nothing more than bring our modern mind into contact with the mind of the writer. Thus, for example, the inestimable labours of Bishop Middleton, and others, have just served to annul the disadvantage of receiving the testimony of the apostles on the most important doctrine of the New Testament, through the medium of a dead language. The critic, in such a case, and so far as his labours extend, resuscitates the Greek of the apostolic age; and gives us the benefit of listening to the living voice of Paul, Peter and John. Preposterous then, as well as illiberal, is the objection of those who endeavour to evade the force of irresistible evidence by saying that the doctrine of the article is a trivial matter.

plained, is left open to conjecture in the apostolic record. Alas the lamentable omission! Why did the inspired writers grudge us the single decisive particle which must have excluded doubt! So does the zealot repine in secret over the sacred page. But in public he loudly denies any such deficiency of evidence in reference to the disputed point. Among his followers, and in presence of the simple, he becomes hoarse in protesting the demonstrable certainty of his assumptions. Language, he assures us, has no means left for making plainer than it is, what was the apostolic usage in this matter!

A signal advantage it is that the Scriptures (of the New Testament especially) have traversed the wide and perilous waters of Time, not on one keel only, but a thousand. No ancient text has been so abundantly secured from important corruption as the text of the New Testament: in the present state of critical science, who entertains a doubt of its substantial integrity? But the consequence, the inevitable consequence of this multifarious transmission of copies has been the origination of innumerable verbal variations. Here again the superstition which dotes upon jots and tittles, is broken in upon. Heaven has treated us as Men; and it supposes that we shall prefer what is truly valuable to what is trivial. We receive a most important confirmation of our faith; but are denied the fond and idle satisfaction of posessing a Text for every particle of which, and for the position of every syllable and letter, Divine authority might challenged. Are we still disquieted and discontented? It is manifest then that our estimate of what is desirable differs widely from that of the Author of Revelation. He has bestowed upon us the better and the greater advantage; we fretfully demand the less.

Entertainment (and instruction too) might be drawn from an exhibition of certain instances in which, if we had actually possessed fewer means of information than we do, we might have pronounced decisively upon points that are made questionable by the additional evidence. If one apostle only had spoken, we should have been free to dogmatize stoutly; but two have glanced at the matter; and we are plunged into doubt! Sometimes, as we have seen, the sacred writers say too little; and anon too much! The very copiousness of our means of knowledge deducts in such cases from our certainty; that is to say, it disturbs the presumption of ignorance and baffles the arrogance of bigotry. Are there those—one might almost believe it from their temper, who so love darkness rather that light, that they would willingly surrender the three testimonies, or the five, which bear upon a controversy, so that they might, with unrebuked fervour, assume and assert their factious opinion?

While it is certain that the Scriptures will, like all other rational compositions, convey their principal purport to every ingenuous mind, it is not less certain that these books, in common with other remains of ancient literature, must present thousands and tens of thousands of questionable points, critical, historical, or dogmatic. On this ground industry and erudition find their field; and what labour can be more noble or more worthy than that of endeavouring to fix or to elucidate the sense of writings in which (beside their unparalleled merits as human compositions) are imbedded the inexhaustible treasures of heavenly wisdom! How honourable are our modern Christian Rabbis employed in bringing to light, from day to day, some hitherto neglected particle of the "true riches;" and how thankfully should we—the unlearned, receive these products of the diligence of our Teachers! One might properly notice here the benificent provision made for perpetually supplying new matter of instruction to the Biblical teacher, so that the zest and expectation of the taught need never become languid. Sacred Science, in all its departments, having been diffused miscellaneously through the substance of a volume so large as the Bible—and an ancient volume too, the time will perhaps never come (certainly it has not yet come) in which it might be said that the sense of every portion has been determined.—All would be well if the simple principle could be remembered—That although the perfection of knowledge in matters of religion is an object of the most worthy ambition to every Christian for himself, something immensely less than the perfection of religious knowledge is all we are entitled to demand from others as the condition of holding with them Christian fellowship.

The vexatious question of Terms of Communion presents one of those instances—and there are many such, in which, while formidable difficulties attach to the Theory of the affair, none whatever, or none that are serious, are found (unless created) to belong to the Practical operation. Science often stands embarrassed, where Art moves on at ease. Science is indeed the proper mistress of Art; nevertheless she should have discretion enough to be willing to receive lessons of homely dexterity from her menial. Men of speculation are always splitting upon the reefs in these shallows. Presuming that the Abstract is always purer, and of more avail than the Concrete, they reform—not for the better, but the worse; and, impatient of ideal faults, plunge themselves and others into real and fatal perplexities. How often does the unthinking artisan employ simple expedients which the philosopher could never have taught him; and actually carries his work triumphantly through theoretic impossibilities, and how often, in the business of government, does common sense, with ancient usage as its guardian, prove itself a vastly better mistress of affairs than abstruse calculation.

A Consistory of Divines might spend a century in digesting, first a profession of faith, and then a code of morals and a rule of discipline, such as should stand as a universal law of Church communion. In the mean time a Christian society fraught with the vital principle of piety, and faithful to itself, and to its trust, far from awaiting impatiently the result of the conference, might rather hail demur after demur, and fervently hope that the sittings of this Sanhedrim of Christendom might be protracted to the consummation of all things. Nothing that is truly important need be foregone until the creed and code should be brought to perfection; nothing that we need sigh for would be conferred upon us by the boon when at length it should be granted.

The question—How may the Church be preserved from desecration?—if propounded in cases where nothing exists that is indeed holy—nothing but the rites and semblances of Christianity, is one which may well be reserved for an idle day. And no such question need be discussed at all where the religion of the New Testament—its faith, and its morality, actually subsist.

The distinction between Christians and others is obvious—or obvious enough for the practical purposes of ecclesiastical government, if looked at in the concrete, and under the daylight of common sense; but it quite eludes research if submitted to analysis. The living are never much at a loss in recognizing the living; and no artificial process will avail to enable the dead to exercise any such discriminative office. Is it demanded to frame a creed and a rule by the due application of which secular men—frivolous and perfunctory, shall be able to keep charge of the fold of Christ, and to open and shut the doors of the Church? Absurd problem! Idle endeavour! The Church wants no such rule, and needs no such guardianship; and a better employment may easily be found than that of sitting a watch and putting a seal at the mouth of a Sepulchre!

The duty of those, whether they be the few or the many, to whose hands are entrusted ecclesiastical powers, is not that of a Rhadamanthus. Responsibility does not stretch beyond natural powers, and it is quite certain that men have no power to search each other's bosoms; nor should they think themselves charged with any such endeavour. The pretender and the hyprocrite belong always to the Divine Jurisdiction; the Church will be asked to give no account of them so long as they successfully conceal the fatal fact of their insincerity. The exceptive case of the hypocrite therefore excluded, not a shadow of difficulty—of practical difficulty, attends the discharge of Church guardianship. Let but a community, whether more or less extended in its sphere, be pure in manners—Pure, not sanctimonious; let the Scriptures be universally and devoutly read by its private members, and honestly expounded by its teachers; and in this case it will be very little annoyed by the intrusion either of heretical or licentious candidates. A Church of this order offers nothing which such persons are ambitious to possess: they will stand aloof. Tests will be superseded; and the rod of discipline brought out only on the rarest occasions.

It is the heat of controversy between sect and sect, that ordinarily generates the malevolence which (according to our definition) is essential to fanaticism, and which distinguishes it from enthusiasm. Yet there are cases where, without this extrinsic excitement, modes of opinion such as must be deemed extravagant, have assumed a gloomy and irritated aspect. Instances of this sort have of late abounded, and some reference to them seems proper.

A singular revolution has marked the progress of religious sentiment among us within the last few years; and it is this, that while the tendency to admit enthusiastic or fanatical sentiments belonged, till of late, almost exclusively to the lower and uneducated classes, it has recently deserted the quarters of poverty and ignorance, and taken hold of those who are clothed in purple, and frequent palaces. The fanaticism of Want, and the fanaticism of Plenty, though identical in substance, naturally differ much in form. The characteristics of each are worthy of notice.

We know and think far too little of the feelings that are working in the bosoms of the abject and wretched poor: if we knew and thought more on this subject we should look with dread and wonder at the placid surface which, in common, the social mass exhibits. The personal endurance of famine, cold, and discomfort, from day to day, and the worse anguish of seeing these evils endured by children, breeds a feeling which, did it but get vent, would heave the firmest political edifices from their foundations: but the writhings of tortured hearts are repressed, diverted, and only on rare occasions burst forth in tumultuous acts. With many, indeed, all sentiment and moral consciousness gives way under the pressure of woe; or is dissipated by debauchery:—the soul sinks even below the level of the wretchedness of the body: hope, the spring of life, long ago took her flight, and is totally forgotten: every ember of joy and virtue is quenched.

But with some of the Pariah class (numerous in every community) enough of the remembrance of hope survives to impart sensitiveness to despair. The poor man, though he feels every day that he has given ground a little in his combat with Want, and must renew the strife to-morrow with wasted strength, and from a worse position, and although, when he throws himself on his pallet, he knows that the Misery that haunts his hut does not sleep while he sleeps, but will be busy from the evening till the morning, in sapping the broken fabric of his comfort; although he knows and feels this, yet the faint conception of a happier lot still haunts him, and he asks—Might not I also be blessed? If he does not distinctly expect a reverse of his doom, he still meditates the abstract possibility of an amended condition. He is like the shipwrecked mariner who takes his seat day after day on the highest point of his rocky prison, and from sun-rise to sun-set, peruses the horizon, not certain but what a sail may appear, and may make toward the islet of his despair. Such things (let us believe it) are felt and born by myriads near us, even while we are gaily gliding from scene to scene of gain or festivity!

It is upon elements like these that political agitations work; and our amasement should be, not that once and again in the course of years tumult and outrage break forth; but rather that the public peace is so seldom violated; and that when disturbed, any bounds are set to the vindictive passions of the million who have so long suffered in silence.

Experience has abundantly proved, even to the conviction of irreligious statesmen, that the influence of religious motives upon the lowest rank—taken at large, is decisively favourable to public order, and is the most powerful prop of civil government. None now call this capital political truth in question, but those—the few, whose enormous usurpations are of a kind that can be secured only by imposing brutalizing degradations upon the helot class. None now deny this first axiom of political science—that religion is the bond of peace; none deny it, we say, but the Planter and his Patron.

The cases are very rare in which a just and patriotic government (or even a despotic one) might not calculate its security by the rule of the amount of religion among the labouring population of the country. There have been momentary exceptions; but they are quite intelligible, and when properly understood confirm the rule which makes it the interest and duty, as well of the legislative as of the administrative powers, to maintain, and to extend, and to invigorate, by all proper means, the Public Religion.

The fanaticism of poverty, which only under very unusual provocations takes a political turn, or threatens civil institutions, somewhat more frequently offers itself to view within its proper circle of religious sentiment. The Gospel is the chartered patrimony of the poor; and to affirm that the motives of religion, as they bear upon the cares, privations, and contempt of a low condition, ordinarily pass into a malign state, would be the same thing as to deny the divine origin of this Gospel. The contrary is most decisively the fact. The partial evil has existence only when the theology that is promulgated among the people is of a murky and arrogant kind; when one set of ideas singly, and those of the least benign, is presented to the mind of the people; and when, either by abstruse dogmas, or by rigid and repulsive usages—by the monotonous assertion of mysterious exclusive privilege, and by a stern, scrupulous, and sanctimonious discipline—a discipline more careful of faith than of morals—it is only by such means, that the melancholy impatience belonging to social degradation and distress, gives a dark colour to the poor man's piety.

Those will be at no loss in verifying or in rebutting our present allegation, who have been personally conversant with the religious sentiments of the lower classes in certain departments of our ecclesiastical commonwealth. To such might be recommended an inquiry of this sort, namely—How far those forms of doctrine among us which tend to favour malign spiritual arrogance, and which confessedly are of ambiguous moral tendency, and how far certain strait and abhorrent rules of communion, and how far an excessive leaning to the democratic principle in the management of Church affairs—a leaning wholly incompatible with pastoral independence, how far these evils—if they any where exist, savour of what may be termed plebeian fanaticism.

But the favourites of Fortune, as well as her outcasts, have sometimes their Fanaticism: there is a sleek and well-bred religious delirium, as well as one that is rude and squalid.

Christianity rarely affects the opulent and the noble, except during disastrous epochs; or in those gloomy hours of a nation's history, when all things earthly are in jeopardy. It would seem as if nothing else than the most vehement agitations could be enough to dispel the illusions that beset luxury and honour. Be this as it may, the coincidence of causes deserves to be taken account of, which, in such seasons of fear and tumult, affords to the Christian of elevated rank a necessary counterpoise for his religious emotions, and tends to impart soberness to his piety. This indispensable counterpoise is furnished to Christians of lower station by the cares and labours of vulgar life. But the perils and vicissitudes of a revolutionary era bring home to the patrician orders a sense of the precariousness of earthly good such as, during the tranquil flow of events, they are hardly ever conscious of. At these times a difficult part is to be performed, and dangerous measures are often to be attempted, which fully engage every energy of the soul. It is then that public persons are thrown upon their principles, are compelled to look to the ultimate reasons of their conduct: and are in fact taught certain severe lessons of virtue, such as are never dreamed of in the summer seasons of the world's affairs. It is at such times that religious sentiments, if they exist at all in the bosoms of the great, are brought into act, and are, by that means, preserved from exaggeration.

This general order of things being kept in view, we may the more readily understand the somewhat singular appearance which serious piety has assumed of late in a portion of the upper classes of England. The time we have lived through has indeed been a season of momentous change, and has furnished excitements of the most unusual kind. And yet, to the people of the British Islands, the throes of the world and the sanguinary convulsions of the nations, have offered a Spectacle, rather than an arena of action and trial. During a full forty years, the English have stood crowding their cliffs in mute astonishment, and have gazed upon the distant prospect of blazing palaces, or demolished thrones—of embattled fields, or of cities deluged by civil feud;—they have caught the muttering thunders of war and revolution; but still have been able to turn the eye homeward, and have seen the smiling serenity of order and plenty spread over all their land. We have indeed entertained momentary alarms, and have groaned under burdens; but have hardly been called to meet the brunt of danger:—the stress of affairs has not lain upon us, so as to engage the higher virtues.

The excitements of an era of commotion have been felt;—yet apart from its proper correctives. The spread of religious feeling among the rich and noble may fairly be attributed (in measure) to the salutary impression which the magnitude and portentous aspect of events has made upon all minds. Yet it has been an impression without a conflict—an awe, but not an exercise. There has been no arduous part to perform, no sacrifice to make, no privation to be endured. All this while the religious nobles have reclined upon a couch as soft as that of the irreligious noble; the silken banner of their ease has floated in a summer's sky:—they have fared as daintily, and have been served as sumptuously, as if their portion were all in this world:—they have undulated from theatre to theatre of pious entertainment, and have met acclamations and smiles; yet nothing has compelled them to act or to suffer like men.

There can be little room then for surprise if the result of this peculiar conjunction of influences has been to give play to exorbitances of opinion, and absurdities of conduct, among those of the rich and noble who have admitted religious impressions. Some, we cannot doubt, the ferment of whose piety has brought our Christianity into contempt, would have honoured their profession of it by exhibiting the courage and devotion of confessors, had public events been of a kind to lead them into any such arduous sphere of action: these persons have been fain to yearn for miracles in easy times, that offer no crowns of martyrdom.

Religious sentiments in a highly excited state, and not counterpoised by the vulgar cares and sorrows of humble life—not taught common sense by common occasions, is little likely to stop short at mere enthusiasm:—the fervour almost of necessity becomes fanatical. The progress of the feelings in such cases is not difficult to be divined. That sensitiveness to public opinion, and that nice regard to personal reputation, and that keen consciousness of ridicule, which belong to the upper classes, and upon which their morality is chiefly founded, tend, in the instance of the pious oligarch, to generate vivid resentments when he feels that, having over-stepped the boundaries of good sense and sobriety, he has drawn upon himself the public laugh. The intolerable glance of scorn from his peers, to which he has found himself exposed, must be—not retorted indeed—not avenged; but yet returned in some manner compatible with religious ideas. It is at this very point of commuted revenge that fanaticism takes its rise. Interpretations the most excessive, expectations the most dire, comminations the most terrible, and a line of conduct arrogantly absurd, set wounded patrician pride again upon its due elevation—repair the damage it has sustained; and surround it with a hedge of thorns.

If (national prejudice apart) it may be said that the English character possesses a peculiar nobleness; and if it be true that the English aristocracy stands foremost as by emphasis the aristocracy of Europe; and if moreover it may be believed that Christianity has a stronger hold of the English than of any other people, may not a time reasonably be looked for, when the special excellences of the national character, illustrated by rank and high culture, shall admit (without taint of fanaticism) the elevating influence of unfeigned piety, and so shall exhibit to the world, under the very fairest and the brightest forms, the true magnanimity of virtue.

To what extent the advance of Christianity among the nations has been obstructed by the absurd or the hostile form into which it has been thrown by its professors, none can presume to determine. None know how many perplexed and hesitating minds, distracted with doubts, have received their final and fatal shock from the spectacle of folly, pride, and strife which the Church has exhibited. None can calculate what might have been achieved by the zeal and energy that have been consumed in dissentions, or quashed by despotism. Much less can any mortal dare to surmise how far the outraged clemency of heaven has, by these same means, been averted altogether from the theatre of human affairs, so that blessings have been withheld—the efficacious influence denied, and the world abandoned through long ages, to its melancholy course of superstition and of crime!

The dependency of cause upon cause in the vast and occult machinery of the moral system, lies far beyond the reach of human curiosity. That day must be waited for which is to reveal the springs of the movements that now meet the eye, and perplex our meditations. But might not a time come when those who readily confess themselves to sustain as Christians, a responsibility toward the world at large, and who are even forward in claiming their several shares of this responsibility—when such, pausing a moment on their course of zealous enterprise, shall, with an ingenuous dread of meeting at last the Divine reproof instead of approval, set themselves to inquire whether the Christianity they are sending from land to land, is not loaded with some fatal disparagement, such as forbids its wide extension?

But it is asked—who is competent, or who commands the means of regenerating our ecclesiastical existence? Where rests a blame, of which no man has the power to rid himself? The answer to such an inquiry is not difficult; for the individual culpability which rests upon Christians, living under a corrupted or perverted state of things, is that of resisting the appeals of common sense. The personal guilt is that of harbouring fond predilections, and of jealousy quashing any course of inquiry that is foreseen as likely to bring sectarian interests into jeopardy. The personal blame is of the very same kind that attaches to the maintenance of other species of vicious infatuation. If the actual amount of this criminality be small in the instance of the untaught and the unthinking multitude, it reaches a height we will not estimate, with the few whose duty it is to care for, and lead the many. Thus it has been in every age. Evils grievous in themselves, and frightful in their ultimate consequences, have been palliated by those who should have checked them; have been admired, or have been cloaked; have been trumpeted, or have been excused; but never honestly and unsparingly dealt with.

No principle of morals can be more unsound than that which would excuse a man from guilt who cares not to rid himself of prejudices or of scruples that are ruinous to his fellows. If we do not owe the cultivation of common sense to ourselves, we assuredly owe it to those around us. No man can play the fool without peril to his neighbours; and when the Christian does so, he flings perdition on every side of him.

Those questions of ecclesiastical polity (if such there be,) which involve real difficulties, and which wise men might hesitate to touch—uncertain and complicated as are all human affairs, may well be reserved until other points have been disposed of that demand nothing but the putting in force of the plainest principles of reason and piety. Who shall say how much light would suddenly come in upon the obscurer matters, if once the simpler were taken out of the way?

To adduce the specific instances, and to deal with them equitably, would consist neither with the limits nor the purpose of this volume. It is principles only we have to do with; and in the establishment of general truths, must still adhere to the rule of drawing examples from the remotest quarters. In closing then this section, let a single instance, illustrative of the purport of it, be glanced at.

The ancient Church might stand excused from the blame of defending, with too much acrimony, the great elements of Christian faith, assailed as they were by a hundred heresies, audacious and absurd; and let indulgence be afforded in relation to those divisions in matters of discipline which might fairly perplex honest minds. We look now to instances of that sort which entailed extreme contempt upon Christianity, and sullied all its glory, for the sake of pertinacious scruples ineffably trivial. If the case adduced be thought altogether without parallel in modern times, let it be rejected as impertinent.

Be it imagined that the accomplished author of the treatise "on the Sublime," hitherto imperfectly informed of the Christian doctrine, and doubtful of its claims, had at length resolved to obtain a more intimate acquaintance with a religion which was then spreading through all parts of the world, and spreading in defiance of imperial edicts and popular fury. The philosophic Longinus has learned in a vague manner that the Christians profess the hope of a glorious immortality—that they hold elevated opinions concerning the Divine nature, and that they treat with derision the idle mythologies and immoral superstitions of all nations;* and he is told that this system is affirmed to have been imparted immediately from God. He expects then that whether the alleged revelation be true or false, it will offer nothing but what is momentous and simply great:—he is justified in expecting nothing else. While he yet revolves his purpose of inquiry, there falls by chance into his hands an epistle addressed by a distinguished contemporary—a Christian bishop, to a colleague. The writer, known to him already by common fame, stands entitled on every ground to respect. Head of the Alexandrian Church, and therefore second to few or none in official importance, a man of extensive learning too—no barbarian; but versed, like
